Income arising therefrom; but must be used as a support of himself. In the event of his death leaving no family, then this entire share to belong to his sister, Mrs. John H. Hull, and at her death to her children subject to the same directions as the shares belonging to her." The will further provided: "I direct my son Thomas C. De Loney's certificates of stock or bonds, deeds, and all other business papers to be kept in bank safe. I appoint my daughter Rosa, the wife of John H. Hull, executrix of this my last will." After the executrix had qualified and before completely administering the estate, Thomas C. De Loney brought suit in Clarke superior court against her for his part of the property, alleging that she refused to deliver it to him on the ground that she was trustee for him, and as such had the right to hold the property. That suit resulted in a decree, which, so far as pertinent to the question made in the present case, provided "that, under the terms of the will of Mrs. Rosa E. De Loney, a trust was created for Thomas C. De Loney as for the share of said estate left him in said will; that said Thomas C. De Loney is a male of full age and was at the time the will took effect; that since that time the health of said Thomas C. De Loney has improved to such an extent as to vacate said trust under the laws of this state, and said trust is hereby vacated and set aside, and said Mrs. Rosa Hull, executrix, shall at once turn over and deliver to said Thomas C. De Loney the property bequeathed and devised to him in said will, to be held by said Thomas C. De Loney under the will, and in the event of his death, leaving no family, as provided in said will, then his entire share is to belong to Rosa Hull for life, and, at her death, to her children." After the rendition of that decree, the executrix proceeded to deliver to Thomas C. De Loney a certain certificate of indebtedness of the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, and likewise certain certificates of stock in the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company and in the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company, respectively, but upon which she indorsed the following: (a) Upon the certificate of indebtedness, the words: "To be held by him under the terms contained in the last will of Mrs. Rosa E. De Loney, of record in Clarke county, Georgia." (b) Upon each of the two certificates of stock, the words: "Under the will of Mrs. Rosa E. De Loney." In addition to these certificates, there were other certificates to which the said Thomas C. De Loney was entitled. The indorsements by the executrix were unsatisfactory, and Thomas C. De Loney instituted suit, complaining that the indorsements created such limitations as rendered it impossible for him to dispose of the property or handle it in any way whatever, thereby rendering the property worthless to him. The petition contained the following, among other prayers: "That the said Rosa Hull, as executrix of Rosa E. De Loney, be decreed to carry out the spirit and terms of the decree hereinbefore mentioned, and to that end should be required to have transferred to petitioner his 16 shares in the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company, his five shares in the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, and his debenture for $500 in the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, without any terms or limitations in the certificates," and that petitioner "have the right to sell any of said script or property when he thinks advisable and make a good title to the purchaser." The defendant answered at length; but it is not necessary to state any more of the defendant's contentions than that she insisted that inasmuch as she and her children had a contingent remainder interest in the certificates under the will of Mrs. Rosa E. De Loney, and under the former decree of the court, to which reference has been made, it was her right to indorse the certificates in the manner indicated. The case was submitted to the presiding judge, who was authorized by consent to pass upon all questions of law and fact, trying the case upon the pleadings, which were to be taken as true and without the introduction of further evidence. Upon consideration, the judge entered judgment, refusing to grant the relief prayed. Exception was taken to this ruling, and the only question argued by counsel for the plaintiff in error is whether or not, under the facts stated, the executrix had the right to refuse to deliver the certificates of stock without indorsement of the character hereinbefore indicated. We will deal only with that question.

The decree did not undertake to diminish or increase the quantity of interest which Thomas C. De Loney had in the certificates in question. It simply recognized the existence of his interest in the property under the will, and directed that the executrix should at once turn over and deliver to said Thomas C. De Loney "the property bequeathed and devised to him in said will." There was no direction that she should not, in the course of delivery, enter upon the certificates such memoranda as might tend to perpetuate notice of the existence of the limitations in the will. The character of the corpus of the estate was such that it could be wasted by the first taker, and lost entirely to those who might take upon the happening of the condition upon which the first taker held. The entry made on the certificate could only tend to prevent such condition of affairs by certifying to future purchasers the truth as it appears of record. Certainly that could be no wrong to any one. The legatee ought not to deal with the certificates as if there were no conditions attached to his estate therein. For the reasons suggested, the court no doubt intended that he should not deal with them in an unrestricted manner. The decree specifically enjoins that the property is "to be held by said Thomas C. De Loney under the will." It further provides that, "in the event of his death, leaving no family, as provided in said will, then his entire share is to belong to said Rosa Hull for life and at her death to her children." In Kollock v. Webb, 113 Ga. 762, 39 S. E. 339, Mr. Justice Cobb, speaking for the court, on pages 768, 689 of 113 Ga., on pages 342, 348 of 39 S. E., said: "While in our opinion the deed properly construed gives the living children of Mrs. La Pierre a vested remainder subject to be divested upon her death without issue, still, for the purposes of the present case, we think it is immaterial whether the remainder created by the deed for the benefit of the children of Mrs. La Pierre was vested or contingent. A life tenant is entitled to the corpus of the property for his own use, but this possession is subject to the right of the remaindermen to have the property in a state of security to be forthcoming to them upon the termination of the life estate." Numerous authorities are cited for the support of the proposition therein stated. See Luquire v. Lee, 121 Ga. 628, 629, 49 S. E. 834. A fair construction of the decree now under consideration at least authorizes the indorsements upon the certificates of which complaint is made.

ENGLISH v. MARSHALL et al.

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION—COLOR OF TITLE.

In 1880 Ogburn executed to Marshall a deed to secure the payment of a debt. Subsequently Ogburn died without having paid the debt. In 1887 the administrator of Ogburn, deceased, without obtaining an order of court, agreed with Marshall that the latter should cancel the evidence of the debt, and be thereafter vested with absolute title to the property. Accordingly Marshall surrendered the notes against Ogburn, deceased, to the administrator, and went into possession of the land, holding the deed thereto which had been executed to him by Ogburn to secure said debt. Held, that Marshall's possession was under color of title, and that after seven years' possession his title to the land became absolute.

3. SAME—EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

The court did not err in directing a verdict for the claimant.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Macon County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Proceedings by E. G. English, administrator, for the sale of certain real property. T. J. Marshall filed claim, and pending the trial died, and his executors, T. P. Marshall and

C. D. Marshall, were made parties, and; from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

On the 29th day of April, 1880, J. L. Ogburn executed and delivered to T. J. Marshall a deed to a certain lot of land in Macon county, Ga., the land in controversy. While this deed was in form an unconditional warranty deed, it is conceded by both sides that it was intended as a deed to secure the payment of a debt, Marshall executing to Ogburn his bond for titles to reconvey the property upon the payment of the debt. Ogburn remained in possession of the premises until his death, which occurred some time during the year 1885. According to the testimony of the plaintiff in error, Ogburn's father remained in possession of the land for two years longer, till 1887. During the latter year, one Glover, administrator of Ogburn, deceased, entered into an agreement with Marshall, the grantee in the security deed, whereby said administrator agreed to surrender the bond for titles to said land, and Marshall agreed to take the land in settlement of the debt which the deed had been given to secure. Accordingly the notes held by Marshall against Ogburn, deceased, were turned over to the administrator, marked, "Settled by purchase of lot of land No. 100 in the 13th district of Macon County, Georgia" (the land in controversy), and thereupon Marshall went into possession of the land. This sale was made without order of court, and no writing was signed except that noted above. Subsequently, in September, 1904, English qualified as administrator de bonis non of said Ogburn, and proceeded, after obtaining an order from the court of ordinary dated December term, 1904, to advertise for sale the land above described as the property of said Ogburn, deceased. Before the land was sold, on December 3, 1904, T. J. Marshall filed a claim to the property. Pending the trial of this claim said Marshall died, and his executors, T. P. Marshall and C. P. Marshall, were made parties and the case proceeded to trial before a jury. At the conclusion of the evidence for both sides, the court directed a verdict for the claimant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which motion was overruled, and he excepted.

E. A. Hawkins, Hooper & Dykes, and W. W. Dykes, for plaintiff in error. Greer & Felton, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts). Marshall, the claimant in the court below, defendant in error here, contended that he had been in possession of the land in controversy since 1887 under color of title, and that his title, therefore, became absolute after seven years' possession. The plaintiff in error denied that Marshall had any color of title upon which to base a prescription, and the issue thus made constitutes the principal question to be decided by this court. Marshall was the grantee in a deed given to secure the payment of a debt. Ogburn, the grantor, died without having paid the debt secured by the deed. Glover, the administrator of Ogburn, agreed with Marshall that the latter should cancel the evidence of the debt, and be thereafter vested with absolute title to the property. Accordingly Marshall canceled the debt, and went into possession of the land, holding the deed which had been executed to him by Ogburn to secure the debt thus canceled. It is conceded by the claimant, Marshall, that Glover had no authority to make this agreement, and that the deed held by said claimant was color and not title. The plaintiff in error, administrator de bonis non of said Ogburn, contended, on the other hand, that "claimant's possession was not under or by virtue of any color of title, but possession was obtained by virtue of a verbal agreement between the administrator of Ogburn's estate, and claimant, and under this verbal sale or agreement possession was had." It has been held by this court that where the parties to a security deed agree that the grantee shall take the land in satisfaction of the debt, and in pursuance of this agreement the grantee cancels the debt and goes into possession of the property, the deed to him ceases to be a security, and becomes an absolute, indefeasible conveyance. Irwin v. McKnight, 76 Ga. 669; Bullard v. Jones, 68 Ga. 472. And this is true although the grantor and grantee agreed in parol that the latter should cancel the debt, and be thereafter vested with absolute title to the property. Carter v. Griffin, 114 Ga. 321, 40 S. E. 290. Clearly, therefore, when the grantor and grantee make and execute such an agreement, the grantee holds possession of the land, not by virtue of a verbal agreement with the grantor, but by virtue of the deed, which has ceased to be a security, and has become an absolute conveyance. And we can see no good reason for holding in this case that Marshall was in possession of the land merely "by virtue of a verbal agreement between him and the administrator of Ogburn's estate," and not claiming it under the deed, which they had sought to convert into an absolute conveyance. The only thing lacking, necessary to make the deed to Marshall a perfect title, was the authority of the administrator to make the agreement whereby Marshall was given the land in settlement of the debt secured by the deed. If the administrator had been authorized to make this agreement, the deed from Ogburn to Marshall, as soon as the latter canceled the debt and took possession of the property, would have become absolute. And it has been repeatedly held that the lack of authority in a person to make a conveyance, although it may render the paper wholly valueless as title, does not destroy its efficacy as color of title. In the case of Street v. Collier, 118 Ga. 470, 45 S. E. 294, it was said: "To hold that the paper is not color of title, because the persons executing it had not the full authority of law which, if they had, would make it not color but title, would destroy the distinction between color and title." And see cases there cited in support of this view, and the rule announced as to what constitutes color of title. The evidence not only fails to show that Marshall committed or intended any fraud in making the agreement above referred to, but it does show that he paid a fair value for the land, and other circumstances indicating very clearly that both he and the administrator, Glover, acted in perfect good faith during the entire transaction.

The plaintiff in error cites in his brief the case of Ladd v. Jackson, 43 Ga. 288, the single headnote of which is as follows: "Where the title to land of a deceased intestate vests in his minor heirs at the time of his death, the statute of limitations or prescription ceases to run against them during their minority." But there is nothing in the record in this case to which this law could apply. There is no evidence that the deceased had any minor heirs at the time of his death, and nothing appears which would prevent the prescription in favor of Marshall from running from the time he went into possession of the land, to wit, 1887.

The only other assignment of error is covered by the second headnote. The evidence demanded the verdict, and the court committed no error in directing it accordingly.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. BANKS & FORTSON.

1. PLEADING—DUPLICITY IN PETITION—ELECTION—CURE BY VERDICT.

A petition contains allegations which are appropriate to an action seeking to enforce a liability against a railway company as a carrier of freight under the statute, as well as allegations appropriate to an action seeking to enforce against the company a common-law liability, and which are sufficient to set forth a complete cause of action under either the statute or the common law, is bad for duplicity, and, upon special demurrer attacking the petition upon that ground, the plaintiff would be put to his election. But, where no special demurrer is filed to such petition, and on the trial of the case, upon the issues made by the petition and answer thereto, a verdict is rendered for the plaintiff, it will not be set aside as being without evidence to support it, if either cause of action as set forth is supported by any evidence.

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; R. W. Freeman, Judge.

Action by Banks & Fortson against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

The plaintiffs, Banks & Fortson, delivered to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company a car load of mules, to be shipped from Horse Cove, Ky., to Columbus, Ga., via Birmingham, Ala. The contract of shipment was signed at Horse Cove, Ky., by Lazarus & Altscheler, from whom the plaintiffs purchased the stock. Fortson, a member of the plaintiffs' firm, who was in charge of the mules, arrived in Birmingham in advance of the mules, and immediately called upon the agent of the Central of Georgia Railroad Company, at that place to secure a pass from Birmingham to Columbus; but, because it did not appear from the contract, which had been made with the Louisville & Nashville Company, that the car of mules was routed over the Central of Georgia's road, the latter company refused to issue the pass. Whereupon Fortson signed for his firm an independent contract with the Central of Georgia Railway Company to ship the mules from Birmingham to Columbus over that company's road. This contract recites that in consideration of said company agreeing to transport the car load of mules at the reduced rate of $56, and a free pass to the owner or his agent on the train with his stock, the owner or shipper assumes certain risks specified in the contract, and releases the carrier from all liability for injury, loss, or damage "which shall not affirmatively appear to have been caused by the negligence of said railway company." The Central of Georgia Railway Company then issued to Fortson a pass over its road from Birmingham to Columbus, and the mules were received by said company, and shipped to Columbus under the contract last referred to. When said car arrived in Columbus, it was found that some of the mules were badly injured and damaged. The plaintiffs brought suit against the Central of Georgia Railway Company, as the last of two connecting carriers, to recover the value of the mules damaged, and also alleged in another count that "the injury and damage to said mules aforesaid was due to the negligence of the defendant, its servants, and agents in the transportation of said mules by it." The defendant denied that "it received the alleged stock from the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company as a connecting carrier for transportation to Columbus, * * * but, on the contrary, this defendant says that it received said stock from Banks & Fortson * * * on and under a written contract of affreightment signed and entered into by the said Banks & Fortson and by this defendant at Birmingham, Ala." It further answered that, if said stock were injured as alleged, "such injuries were not occasioned by any negligence upon the part of this defendant, its agents, or servants in handling or in transporting said stock from Birmingham, Ala., to Columbus, Ga., but such injuries, if any they had, were attributable to the inherent nature of the stock, * * * and from the excepted clauses set forth in the contract, for which this defendant is not liable." Upon the trial both sides introduced testimony in support of their contentions, but there was no evidence tending to charge the defendant with any negligence in handling or transporting the mules from Birmingham to Columbus, while the defendant submitted testimony showing that it had been guilty of no such negligence. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs; and the defendant assigns error upon the judgment overruling its motion for a new trial.

Charlton E. Battle, for plaintiff in error.
Hatcher & Carson, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts). There are allegations in the petition appropriate to an action seeking to enforce against the defendant a liability under the statute on account of its being the last of a connecting line of carriers, and other allegations appropriate to an action seeking to enforce a common-law liability upon the defendant; and, as against a general demurrer, the allegations sufficiently set forth a good cause of action, either under the common law or under the statute. Such a petition, upon special demurrer pointing out the defects, would have been held to be bad for duplicity. But, there having been no special demurrer to the petition and the parties having gone to trial upon the petition as it stood and the answer thereto, and having introduced evidence relative to the issues raised, we have to determine whether or not there was evidence to support the verdict in favor of the plaintiffs under both of the causes of action as stated in the petition.

The property alleged to have been injured and damaged in transportation was delivered to the initial carrier at Horse Cove, Ky., under a contract of shipment made with the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, to be transported from there to Columbus, Ga. Before the property being transported (a car of mules) reached Birmingham, Ala., over the line of railway of the initial carrier, Fortson, a member of plaintiffs' firm, who it appears was in charge of the stock, and who had preceded, upon a passenger train, the freight train to which was attached the car of mules, upon his arrival at Birmingham went to the office of the defendant company in that city to get a pass from Birmingham to Columbus, which it seems it was customary for this railway company to issue to shippers of stock who were in charge of the same. The agent of the defendant company to whom he applied for the pass refused at first to issue it, because the car of freight was not routed over the defendant's line of railroad. Then, instead of standing upon the original contract of shipment from Horse Cove, Ky., to Columbus, Ga., and having the final carrier to receive the freight from the preceding carrier as in good order, if as a matter of fact they were in good order, Fortson, in order to procure a pass, entered into a new contract of shipment with defendant company, or, as stated in his own words: "I entered into this contract for the shipment on account of this not having been marked in care of the Central of Georgia Railway at Birmingham. I did enter into this contract [exhibit 9] at Birmingham in order to get a pass from Birmingham to Columbus. The defendant charged me local rates of $56 on the shipment of mules in question from Birmingham to Columbus. * * * In addition to that, defendant issued me free transportation from Birmingham to Columbus." Not only is there an entire absence of direct proof, or proof to show a state of facts from which the presumption would have arisen, that the freight in question was received in good order from the initial carrier, but from the evidence introduced by the plaintiff it is shown that upon an independent contract of shipment, entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant, the car load of stock was turned over to the defendant by the shipper, to be transported under the contract last referred to. There is nothing to support the cause of action seeking to enforce liability against the defendant under the statute; and it remains to determine whether or not there is evidence to support a verdict against the defendant company under its common-law liability. After a careful reading of the record, it appears that this evidence was wanting. Injury to a number of the mules shipped was shown, but every presumption of negligence upon the part of the defendant railway company was overcome by uncontroverted testimony.

In view of the conclusions that we have reached, it is unnecessary for us to pass upon the questions raised by the assignments of error upon the court's refusal to give in charge the written requests submitted by counsel for the plaintiff in error. And the exceptions to the court's rulings upon the admission of evidence seem to have been abandoned.

HODGES v. STUART LUMBER CO.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ACTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS.

After the lapse of 20 years from the date of the qualification of the legal representative of an estate, as a general rule it is legitimate to presume that the estate has been fully administered and a distribution had according to law in cases of intestacy, and according to the will where the decedent died testate, and the terms of the will do not negative the inference. This presumption is not conclusive, but the burden in such cases is upon the legal representative seeking to assert a right or title of the estate to show such facts as are sufficient to remove the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 22, Executors and Administrators, § 1861.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; A. G. Powell, Judge.

Action by C. S. Hodges, administrator, against the Stuart Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Hodges, as administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of Alley Hugueley, brought an action against the Stuart Lumber Company, alleging that a described lot of land was the property of the estate which he represented, and that the defendant entered upon the land and felled and carried away all of the timber thereon; such timber being of the value of $1,200. The petition prayed for a judgment for the amount above referred to, and for process. The defendant filed an answer, denying all of the material allegations imposing a liability upon it. It also specially pleaded that the title to the lot at the time of the alleged trespass was not in the plaintiff, but in the devisees under the will of Alley Hugueley, and that the executor had assented to the devise. It is further pleaded that they hold the lot under a warranty deed from Wainman, and that they took possession in good faith under such deed. The plea then attacked the judgment of the ordinary of Wilkes county, appointing the plaintiff as administrator de bonis non, etc. The trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was granted, and the plaintiff excepted. It appears from the brief of evidence that the parties have agreed that the verdict, so far as the amount is concerned, was demanded by the evidence; and it also appears, from the order of the judge overruling the motion, that he was entirely satisfied with the verdict as to the amount, but based his grant of a new trial solely upon the point that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover at all. The lot in question is not referred to in the will of Alley Hugueley; and, if it passed at all under the will, it was under the residuary clause, which is in the following language: "I will and bequeath that all the rest and residue of my estate, both real and personal, be sold by my executor as soon as may be convenient and suitable after my death, and that the net proceeds thereof be divided into nine equal shares." The persons to take the shares are the four sons, the three daughters, a granddaughter, and the children of a daughter. The will was executed in 1840. Alley Hugueley died in 1841 or 1842. The record does not disclose when the will was admitted to record.

B. B. Bower and Albert H. Russell, for plaintiff in error. Donalson & Donalson, for defendant in error.

COBB, P. J. (after stating the facts). So far as the attack upon the judgment of the ordinary appointing the administrator is concerned, the case is controlled by the ruling in Sharpe v. Hodges, 121 Ga. 798, 49 S. E. 775, which involved the very judgment now in question.

The case turns upon the question whether the administrator with the will annexed is vested with the right to recover the possession of the land. If not, he cannot bring an action of trespass. The administrator with the will annexed has all the power of the executor, except such as arises from personal trust and confidence. Civ. Code 1895, § 3309. When an executor assents to a devise or a legacy, all interest of the estate in the property passes out of him. The assent is generally irrevocable; and this is true, although the remainder of the assets are insufficient to pay the debts. Watkins v. Gilmore, 121 Ga. 488, 49 S. E. 598. After the lapse of 20 years, there is a presumption that the executor has assented to a legacy. Flemister v. Flemister, 83 Ga. 79, 9 S. E. 724; Phillips v. Smith, 119 Ga. 556, 46 S. E. 640. After the lapse of 30 years, it is legitimate to presume that all the debts of the estate have been paid. Coleman v. Lane, 26 Ga. 515. Should there not be also, after such lapse of time, a presumption that there has been a distribution, either in kind or in money, if the will requires a sale and a division of the proceeds? The law contemplates that there shall be a final settlement of an estate within 12 months after administration is granted. Civ. Code 1895, § 3439. While there may be no presumption that there has been a final settlement within the 12 months, ought it not to be legitimate to presume, after a lapse of 20 years, that there has been? Presumptions of payment and final settlement have been held to arise from the lapse of time and defeat legatees in suits to recover legacies. 1 Woerner's Law of Adm. (2d Ed.) §§ 538-568; 18 Cyc. 607. Where one is in possession of property once belonging to an estate, and the legal representative seeks to recover the same after the lapse of more than 20 years, ought a prima facie case for recovery to arise merely by proof of title in the deceased and administration granted? Ought there not to be in such a case, in the interest of repose and the quieting of possession, at least an inference of fact that the possessor acquired title either directly or indirectly from those who took under the will? Any other rule would put in jeopardy the title to every foot of land in the state, where the owner is not able to show a perfect paper title or possession for the period required to work a title by prescription. Administration could be obtained on the estate of the original grantee in any given case, and the legal representative thus require an occupant to defend his title, although those under whom he claims might have had a perfect chain of title, but, on account of loss of the original deeds and failure to record the same, destruction of the records, or similar reasons, the chain could not be produced, and on account of the death of witnesses secondary evidence could not be available. Certainly it must be the law that as against a second administration, granted more than 20 years after the death of the decedent and the time for final settlement under the first administration, it is legitimate to presume, in behalf of a possessor, that there has been a final settlement, and that the right of the legal representative to recover had passed out of him, either by assent to legacies or sales in conformity to the provisions of the will, or in some other way known to the law, and cast upon the legal representative, whose appointment was so long delayed, the burden of showing that there has been no final settlement by his predecessor. See, in this connection, Bulloch v. Dunbar, 114 Ga. 754, 40 S. E. 783; Woolfolk v. Beatly, 18 Ga. 520; Daniel v. Sapp, 20 Ga. 514. To quiet title such a presumption is absolutely necessary. The law requires an executor to qualify within one year after the will is admitted to record, and also requires that the will be proved as soon as practicable after the death of the testator. Civ. Code 1895, § 3294. When it appears that a will has been admitted to record, but the date when so admitted does not appear, it is legitimate to presume that it was proved within a reasonable time after the death of the testator. A jury would certainly be authorized to raise such an inference, even though there may be no presumption of law. When the case is considered as a whole, we cannot say that the verdict was absolutely demanded by the evidence, and, this being the first grant of a new trial, the judgment will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

SPENCE v. MORROW et al.

1. WRIT OF ERROR—ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS—SUFFICIENCY—INSTRUCTIONS.

An assignment of error that the court "omitted any instruction as to the legal nature of fraud, and its indicia and circumstances," is too general to apprise the reviewing court of the nature and character of the particular legal principle which the exceptor complains was omitted from the charge.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3013.]

2. SAME—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

An exception to an excerpt from the charge because of incompleteness of statement of a particular legal proposition is not good when the incompleteness is supplied in appropriate context by the general charge.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 703.]

3. SAME—RULINGS AS TO EVIDENCE.

A ground of a motion for a new trial, which assigns error upon the exclusion of certain gin books, without disclosing so much of the contents of the books as to enable the reviewing court to determine the relevancy and competency of the rejected evidence, cannot be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 2905.]

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—KNOWLEDGE AND INTENT OF GRANTEE—FACTS PUTTING ON INQUIRY.

Where the issue in a claim case is the bona fides of a sale by an insolvent debtor, it is not error, of which the execution creditor can complain, to charge: "On the other hand, if you should conclude from the evidence in this case that this was not a voluntary conveyance, but was a conveyance for a valuable consideration, a money consideration, and you should further conclude from the evidence in this case that this sale was not made for the purpose of defrauding, delaying, or hindering the creditors of the grantor, or if you should conclude that it was made with that intention, but that intention was not known at the time the deed was taken to the grantees (the claimants in this case), and could not have been known by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, you should find in favor of the claimants."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Fraudulent Conveyances, §§ 500, 501.]

5. WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

The other assignments of error are without merit. The evidence was conflicting, and the court fairly submitted the issues under proper and appropriate instructions. Under such circumstances, a verdict supported by the evidence and approved by the trial judge will not be vacated.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Morgan County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

An execution in favor of I. N. B. Spence against A. Q. Cheney having been levied upon a tract of land, a claim was interposed by I. J. Morrow and another, alleging the property to be their own. Judgment for claimants, and plaintiff in execution brings error. Affirmed.

E. W. Butler, for plaintiff in error. Williford & Middlebrooks and T. L. Reese, for defendants in error.

EVANS, J. An execution in favor of I. N. B. Spence against A. Q. Cheney was levied upon a tract of land, and a claim was interposed by Mrs. L. J. Morrow and Mrs. Fannie A. Sigman. The claimants were daughters of the defendant in fi. fa., and claimed to have purchased the land prior to the judgment for a valuable consideration. The plaintiff in fi. fa. contended that the transaction between the claimants and the defendant in fi. fa. was collusive and fraudulent. The contentions of each of the parties found support in the evidence, but the jury decided the issue with the claimants. The plaintiff in execution moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he excepted.

1. An assignment of error is too general where the complaint is that the court "omitted any instruction as to the legal nature of fraud, and its indicia and circumstances," or "to charge the jury the doctrine of close scrutiny of the transaction; it appearing that the subject under review and at issue being an alleged deed from a parent to his children (all of them) and by which the parent rendered himself insolvent." Smith v. State, 125 Ga. 300, 54 S. E. 124. The court is not informed, by these references of loose generalizations, as to the precise nature of the legal principles on these subjects which the complaining litigant deemed pertinent to his case. A reviewing court on such general assignment cannot with any degree of accuracy divine the particular principle which the plaintiff in error might have had in mind when the grounds of error were framed. It is a maxim of the law that there should be an end of litigation, and a verdict approved by the trial court should stand when supported by evidence, where no substantial error of law has been committed. The burden is on the losing party to show error, and this can only be done by a specific assignment, wherein it is made to appear that some error of law has been committed, or that the verdict is without evidence to support it.

2. Complaint is made that the court erred in charging the jury that "every sale made with intention to defraud the creditors of the vendor, if such intention is known to the vendee (the claimants in this case), is absolutely void as against such creditors." The exception does not complain of the charge as far as it goes; but it is contended that it is erroneous, because the court should have added, "if such intention is known to the vendee," or "could have been known by the vendee," and "the vendee was without notice or ground for reasonable suspicion." When considered in connection with the entire charge, the criticism of this excerpt loses its force. The court fully covered the law respecting a transfer of property by an insolvent debtor in the general charge.

3. Another exception is that the court erred in excluding the gin books of a certain firm, offered for the purpose of impeaching one of the claimant's witnesses, and to show the quantity of cotton ginned from the place occupied by the claimant and her husband "during the years under investigation." Neither the contents of the book nor any particular entries were disclosed in this ground of the motion. If a party to a case desires to except to the exclusion of evidence, it is incumbent upon him to set out in substance the evidence, that the court may judge of its competency and relevancy. Unless this is done, the ruling complained of cannot be considered. Lamar Drug Co. v. Lamar, 123 Ga. 667, 51 S. E. 584; Yates v. State, 127 Ga. 813, 56 S. E. 1017.

4. The court charged the following: "On the other hand, if you should conclude from the evidence in this case that this was not a voluntary conveyance, but was a conveyance for a valuable consideration, a money consideration, and you should further conclude from the evidence in this case that this sale was not made for the purpose of defrauding, delaying, or hindering creditors of the grantor, or if you should conclude it was made with that intention, but that intention was not known at the time the deed was taken to the grantees (the claimants in this case), and could not have been known by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, you should find in favor of the claimants." This charge is alleged to be error, in that it directed the jury to find for the plaintiff unless the claimant had positive knowledge of the intention of the grantor to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, or could have acquired such knowledge by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care and diligence; that the court should have charged that the sale to the claimants must have been without notice or ground for reasonable suspicion. The Code declares that every conveyance of property by a debtor had or made with the intention to delay or defraud creditors, where such intention is known to the party taking, is fraudulent. But a bona fide transaction, on a valuable consideration, and without notice or ground for reasonable suspicion, shall be valid. Civ. Code 1895, § 2695 (2). We think the charge as given imposed a greater burden upon the claimants than that required by the Code. This charge was in effect an instruction that the transaction would be deemed fraudulent if the claimants could by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care and diligence have known of the debtor's intention to defraud his creditors. The law contemplates that the purchaser shall be affected by such facts known to him as would give notice or ground for reasonable suspicion of the debtor's fraudulent intent. He is not necessarily required to exercise diligence in every case to discover the debtor's intent. The law charges him with the consequences of his knowledge of circumstances which afford ground for reasonable suspicion of the debtor's fraudulent intent, and not so much the duty of exercising reasonable diligence to discover such circumstances which may be unknown to him. Besides, those circumstances which would put a man of ordinary prudence in the exercise of reasonable diligence to ascertain the fraudulent intent of the debtor in the disposition of his property would at least afford a reasonable suspicion of the debtor's fraudulent intent. If there was any error in the charge, it was committed against the claimants, and furnishes no ground for complaint to the plaintiff in fi. fa.

5. The amended motion for new trial contains various other grounds. One complains that the court unduly emphasized the contentions of the claimants; another, that the charge as a whole did not fairly and comprehensively present the legal principles controlling the issues in the case; others complain that the verdict is contrary to specific charges of the court. We do not think that any of these assignments of error are meritorious. The charge fully presented the law applicable to the case made by the evidence, and the verdict is supported by the evidence. It has the approval of the presiding judge, and, as no substantial error of law was committed, his discretion in refusing a new trial will not be interfered with.

RUSHIN v. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO.

1. CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—PERSONAL INJURIES—ACTION FOR INJURIES—NATURE AND FORM.

A passenger who is injured by the negligence of a carrier may, at his election, sue for a breach of the contract to safely transport, or for a breach of the duty springing from a violation of the contract of carriage.

2. SAME.

A petition does not commingle the two remedies when all the allegations taken together tend to a statement of a ground of recovery for a breach of duty. The petition is not rendered double by the inclusion of an inapt expression, where it is apparent the plaintiff does not rest his claim for recovery upon it.

3. SAME.

A petition for damages against a railroad company for injuries alleged to have been caused by an employé carelessly and willfully slamming the car door against the plaintiff's hand, which was resting against the door facing or jamb, though it sets forth in general terms a contract of carriage and alleges a breach thereof, should be treated as an action ex delicto, when it is manifest from the allegations and structure of the petition that the plaintiff is seeking a recovery because of the defendant's breach of duty, and not on account of its breach of contract.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Marion County; Wm. A. Little, Judge.

Action by Sam Rushin against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

In his petition against the Central of Georgia Railway Company, as amended, Rushin alleged: That on October 18, 1904, he purchased from the agent of the railway company at Buena Vista a ticket from that place to Columbus, Ga., "the said corporation agreeing by the terms of said purchase to safely transport your petitioner from Buena Vista, Ga., to Columbus, Ga., a point on said line of railway." That after purchasing the ticket he got on the train, "for the purpose of being carried by said corporation, according to the terms of the contract as evidenced by the purchase of the ticket aforesaid," to his destination. That the train was stopped at Zellobee, a station where passengers got on and off the train, and while the train was so stopped petitioner and others got off to speak to some friends, who were on the ground, and got back on the train when it was ready to leave the station. "That, when in the act of returning to the car when leaving said station, he was injured as follows, and in the following manner: In going back into the train, he had reached the platform and started into the car, and there met the porter on said train coming out the door. That he stepped to one side to allow the porter to pass, and put his hands in the door-facing or jamb as he did so. That the porter, when he passed through the door, slammed it to with such force that the ends and the nails were mashed off two of the fingers of his right hand. That, in attempting to enter said door, he reached for the knob thereof to open the same, when the porter of said train pulled it out of his way by opening said door. That he then attempted to enter, and the porter in coming out of the door came in collision with him, and thereby made it necessary for plaintiff to either shove the porter out of his way or stand aside until said porter could come out. Choosing the latter, and with due caution and circumspection on his part, he stood aside, the train then being in motion. He put his hand on said door facing where the door opened in order to steady himself and to prevent falling or being brushed away by said porter. That said porter, with full knowledge of his position, and seeing his hand on said facing where said door shut, and with full knowledge that to slam said door to would catch his hand, did carelessly, negligently, recklessly, and willfully slam said door to on plaintiff's hand, wounding and injuring him as aforesaid. That petitioner and said porter (who was an employé of said corporation) were going facing each other, petitioner going into the car, and the said employé coming out, and petitioner could be plainly seen by said employé, and that this act on the part of said employé was an act of carelessness and negligence. That said employé did see said plaintiff, and saw where his hand rested, and could have by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence prevented said injury to said plaintiff, but, with a wanton disregard for plaintiff's safety, did slam said door to on plaintiff's hand, injuring him as aforesaid, and, seeing plaintiff's hand so caught in said door, still held to the bolt thereof and continued to press the same against plaintiff's hand, notwithstanding plaintiff's cry from pain caused by said mash until plaintiff shoved him away, at the same time telling him to open the door and let him get his hand out, for which tortious act plaintiff was injured and damaged in the sum of $300." Special damages to the extent of $10 were alleged. Two hundred dollars was claimed for pain and suffering, and because the "carelessness and negligence on the part of said defendant [was] so willful that it amounted to aggravating circumstances," for which plaintiff also claimed $100 as punitive damages. The thirteenth and last paragraph of the petition as amended sets forth: "Your petitioner would show that said corporation was negligent of a public duty which it owed to said plaintiff flowing from said contract of carriage, and violated the terms of said contract, as evidenced by the purchase of the ticket aforesaid, to safely carry said petitioner from Buena Vista to Columbus, in that had said employé exercised ordinary care and diligence such injury would not have occurred, and by reason of such negligence of its duty due said plaintiff as a passenger by reason of said contract of carriage, and violation of said contract by which tortious act aforesaid, your petitioner has been injured and damaged in the sum of $300 as aforesaid." The defendant demurred generally, and also specially, to several paragraphs of the petition, on the ground that the suit was laid on a breach of contract, and, as these paragraphs complain of tortious acts in the discharge of a public duty, it is an effort to join an action ex delicto with a suit for breach of contract. The trial judge sustained both demurrers, and dismissed the petition, to which ruling plaintiff excepted.

Jno. C. Butt and W. D. Crawford, for plaintiff in error. C. E. Battle, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. A passenger injured while on the cars in the progress of his journey by the negligence of the carrier has two remedies—one an action for the breach of the contract, the other an action on the case for the wrong; and he may elect which remedy he will pursue. Patterson v. Augusta R. Co., 94 Ga. 140, 21 S. E. 283. Of course, he cannot join both causes of action in the same suit. If he does so, an appropriate demurrer will require a dismissal of the petition for duplicity, unless the duplicity is removed by an amendment eliminating the allegations inappropriate to the remedy elected. A petition is not necessarily duplicitous because of some inconsequential or inapt expression, which may not be strictly pertinent to the case therein made. Our statute does not require the plaintiff to state his case with all the niceties and refinements of special pleading. It is satisfied when he plainly, fully, and distinctly sets forth his charge, ground of complaint, and demand, and the name of the person against whom process is prayed. In stating the narrative of facts upon which a recovery is sought, it is common, especially in actions of this kind, for the plaintiff to state matters from which it appears that he may have another cause of action, either by way of amplification or as strengthening his description of the cause of action on which he relies, when it is obvious he does not rest his claim of recovery upon them. These superfluous statements are but surplusage. They mar the symmetry of the petition, but do not destroy it by making it double. In the case of Seals v. Augusta Sou. R. Co., 102 Ga. 817, 29 S. E. 116, the action was against the railroad company for wrongfully carrying a passenger beyond the station to which she purchased her ticket. The petition alleged a contract of carriage and its breach, and the insistence of the railroad company was that the suit was thereby rendered one upon the contract. This court, however, held that the character of the plaintiff's suit depended, not upon a single allegation independently construed, but upon a consideration of the whole petition. The structure of the petition in the present case clearly shows the action to be ex delicto. It is true that the plaintiff alleges with great particularity a contract of carriage; but this allegation is mere matter of inducement to show the public duty which the carrier owed to the plaintiff. As was said in the Seals Case: "Those allegations which set forth the contract may well be taken as simply intended to lay the foundation for the introduction of evidence to show the existence of this public duty, preparatory to the introduction of further testimony to establish a violation of that duty amounting to the tort which appears to be the real gist of the action." The fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth paragraphs contain allegations entirely appropriate to an action for a breach of public duty. The claim of damages for physical pain and suffering, and for careless and willful conduct of the defendant's employes, plainly shows that the plaintiff is suing for the tort, and not for the breach of the contract. But it is contended that, even after paragraph 13 was amended, there remained an allegation that the defendant had violated the terms of the contract to safely carry the plaintiff. This expression, however, when taken in connection with the other allegations of the same paragraph, shows that the plaintiff made reference thereto, not for the purpose of declaring on the breach of the contract, or uniting any action which he might have for failure to safely transport with that for which he sues, but to show that his injuries were caused by the negligence of the defendant's employes in the violation of its public duty growing out of the contractual relation of passenger. We have carefully examined the petition, and do not believe that it was open to the criticism of duplicity which was raised by the special demurrer.

The general demurrer was also sustained and the petition dismissed. As amended, the petition stated a case of a passenger who was willfully injured by an employe of the carrier. Surely no argument is needed to prove that the plaintiff is entitled to recover upon a case such as is here stated. In the brief of the defendant our attention was directed to the cases of Hardwick v. Georgia R. Co., 85 Ga. 507, 11 S. E. 832, Ham v. Georgia R. Co., 97 Ga. 411, 24 S. E. 152, and Murphy v. Atlanta & West Point R. Co., 89 Ga. 832, 15 S. E. 774, which are claimed to support the contention of the railroad company that no cause of action is set out in the petition. The plaintiff in each of these cases had his hand injured by the slamming of a car door, but under entirely dissimilar circumstances from those alleged in the petition in the present case. In none of them was it alleged that the carrier's servant willfully injured the plaintiff. The court erred in dismissing the petition on general demurrer.

HOPPER v. WILSON et al.

1. ATTACHMENT—CLAIMS OF THIRD PERSON—PROCEDURE.

The failure to join issue in a claim case within five minutes after the announcement of ready by both parties is a sufficient reason for the judge to dismiss the levy; but, if in the exercise of a sound discretion he refuses to dismiss the levy, his ruling will not be interfered with. Civ. Code 1895, § 5646.

2. ERROR, WRIT OF—DISCRETION OF COURT—REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL.

The evidence was of such character as to demand the verdict, and the discretion of the court in refusing to grant a new trial will not be interfered with.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Banks County, J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Action by C. N. and W. S. Wilson against Noah Walker in attachment; J. A. Hopper claimant. Judgment holding the property subject, and claimant brings error. Affirmed.

C. B. Faulkner and F. M. Johnson, for plaintiff in error. W. W. Stark, A. J. Griffin, W. B. Sloan, and H. H. Perry, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. This was a claim case. Mrs. Hopper was claimant. Noah Walker was defendant in attachment. The jury found the property subject. The claimant moved for a new trial, which being refused exception was taken, and the ruling of the court refusing to grant a new trial is here for review. The first headnote sufficiently deals with the matter to which it relates. Error is assigned upon the charge of the court and upon the admission of certain evidence; but, as the verdict was demanded by other evidence, omitting all reference to the evidence which was admitted over objection, we will not consider the assignment of error made upon the charge of the court, or upon the ruling of the court admitting the evidence to which objection was made.

It remains only to deal with the general grounds. The plaintiff in attachment introduced the attachment record and levy describing an undivided one-half interest in a certain tract of land, and proved that J. M. Brooks had died before the attachment was sued out. The plaintiff then introduced a written agreement between the claimant, Julia A. Hopper, and the defendant in attachment, Noah Walker, made at the March term, 1894, of the superior court of Banks county, whereby they settled a suit then pending in said court between them, involving the title to the land, which agreement was approved and made the judgment of the court. By the terms of the agreement, it was provided, among other things, that the said Julia A. Hopper should have possession of the premises until the death of her father, the said J. M. Brooks, and after his death title to the same should "vest absolutely in fee simple, jointly and severally," in said Julia A. Hopper and Noah Walker, "their heirs and assigns, each an undivided one-half interest therein." The plaintiff having closed, the claimant offered certain evidence tending to show that prior to her marriage with Hopper she had been married to one Walker, and by him had several children, all of whom had attained majority before the trial of the attachment and claim case; that her husband Walker died at some date which the record fails to disclose; that after the death of her first husband she married Hopper, who had also died, leaving her with one child, the issue of that marriage, who was a minor at the time of the trial of the claim case; that she had been in continuous possession of the land for nearly 40 years, and while in possession she, as the head of the family, in 1870 applied for and obtained a judgment of the court of ordinary setting apart the land in dispute as a homestead. She admitted having had the litigation with Noah Walker subsequently to the creation of the homestead, and the execution of the agreement and rendition of the judgment disposing of the litigation involving the assertion of title by one Walker to the property in dispute. The title asserted was adverse to Mrs. Hopper, either as an individual or as the head of a family. The judgment conclusively settled the differences between them, and vested title to the undivided one-half interest in the land now in dispute in the defendant in fi. fa., subject only to the condition that its possession should be postponed until the death of J. M. Brooks. Mrs. Hopper as an individual was plaintiff in the case against Noah Walker, and Mrs. Hopper as an individual is claimant in the case now under consideration. Under these conditions there is no room for contention that the agreement, which was made the judgment of the court in the first case, is not conclusive upon Mrs. Hopper in the present case. Moreover, see, in this connection, Barfield v. Jefferson, 84 Ga. 609, 11 S. E. 149. As the claimant cannot go behind the judgment, no other verdict could have been rendered except one finding the property subject.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

GORDON COUNTY et al. v. MAYOR, ETC.,
OF TOWN OF CALHOUN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1907.)

1. DEDICATION—ACTS CONSTITUTING—EXPRESS DEDICATION.

K., in pursuance of an obligation previously entered into, granted, sold, and conveyed to the judges of the inferior court of Gordon county certain described lands, including the tract in controversy, and inserted in the tenendum clause the following provision: "Provided, however, and it is hereby understood, that all that part of said piece of land which lies south of the road leading from the depot to the Oothcaloga Mill, and which has not heretofore been laid off into town lots, shall remain as a common for the town of Calhoun, and no lots shall be sold or timber cut from the same without the joint consent of the judges of the inferior court of Gordon county for time being, and of the said John P. King." Held, that this constituted an express and immediate dedication as to that part of said land which lies south of the road leading from the depot to the Oothcaloga Mill as a common for the town of Calhoun; and the stipulation that no lots should be sold nor timber cut from the land without the joint consent of the judges of the inferior court and of the grantor was not a reservation of any property rights or title inconsistent with the use and occupation of said town as a common.

2. SAME—OPERATION AND EFFECT—RIGHTS AS TO CONTROL OF PROPERTY—PARTIES PLAINTIFF.

The land dedicated being situated in the town of Calhoun, that municipality is a proper party plaintiff to equitable proceedings instituted to preserve the use, and prevent interference therewith.

3. SAME.

The fact that the town of Calhoun had not been incorporated at the time of the dedication of the common would not destroy the effectiveness of the dedication; the organization and incorporation of the town being then contemplated and shortly thereafter accomplished, and the deed with all its terms and conditions having been accepted by the judges of the inferior court, and the town, after its organization and incorporation, having accepted, used, and enjoyed the common for a long period of time.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Dedication, § 9.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Gordon County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Bill by the mayor, etc., of the town of Calhoun against Gordon county and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

In 1850 John P. King and the authorities of Gordon county made and entered into a contract, whereby King agreed to sell and convey to the county authorities certain lands whereon the town of Calhoun is now situated, and the authorities agreed to accept the land, lay out the county site thereon, sell the lots, and divide the proceeds of the sale with King. In 1851, in pursuance of the above contract, King conveyed to the justices of the inferior court of Gordon county the lands described in the controversy. The habendum and tenendum clause of said deed is as follows: "To have and to hold the said parcel of land [except five acres which had been sold to the state as a site for a depot on the W. & A. R. R.] unto the said judges of the inferior court aforesaid, and their successors and assigns, forever. Provided, however, and it is hereby understood, that all that part of said piece of land which lies south of the road leading from the depot to the Oothcaloga Mill, and which has not heretofore been laid off into town lots, shall remain as a common for the town of Calhoun, and no lots shall be sold or timber cut from the same without the joint consent of the judges of the inferior court of Gordon county for time being, and of the said John P. King." At the time this deed was executed the town of Calhoun had not been incorporated, but was incorporated by an act of the Legislature approved the following year, 1852, and the lands to be used as a common are situated within the corporate limits of that town. The town was laid out, lots were sold, and the proceeds divided as was agreed upon, and all that part of said tract of land which lies south of the road leading from the depot to the Oothcaloga Mill was reserved as a common for the town of Calhoun, and no lots were sold nor timber cut from the same. During the past year Henry B. King, the successor in title of John P. King, and the authorities of Gordon county, acting jointly, undertook to convey a part of the "common" to one Gardner. The mayor and aldermen of Calhoun filed a bill to enjoin the sale. The defendants demurred to the petition on the grounds (1) that no cause of action was set out; and (2) that, if the petition did set out a cause of action, the municipality was not a proper party plaintiff. The court overruled the demurrers, and the defendants excepted.

T. W. Skelly and R. J. & J. McCamy, for plaintiffs in error. Neel & Peeples, for defendants in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts). 1. The petition in this case sets forth facts which constitute an immediate and express dedication of the lands in dispute. After the clause of conveyance in the deed of John P. King to the judges of the inferior court, we find in the habendum and tenendum clause the following: "To have and to hold the said piece or parcel of land [except as before excepted] unto the said judges of the inferior court aforesaid, and their successors and assigns, forever. Provided, however, and it is hereby understood, that all that part of said piece of land which lies south of the road leading from the depot to the Oothcaloga Mill, and which has not heretofore been laid off into town lots, shall remain as a common for the town of Calhoun, and no lots shall be sold or timber cut from the same without the joint consent of the judges of the inferior court of Gordon county, for time being, and of the said John P. King." No other construction can be put upon the language that it "shall remain a common for the town of Calhoun"; and the import of these words, as amounting to an express dedication, is not rendered nugatory nor weakened by the clause following, and providing that "no lots shall be sold or timber cut from the same without the joint consent of the judges of the inferior court of Gordon county, and of the said John P. King." Suppose that the dedication, instead of having been made expressly by the terms of the deed, had been made as in the case of Cincinnati v. White, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 431, 8 L. Ed. 452—that is, a plan of the town had been made and approved by the owner of the land—according to which the 30 acres lying south of the road from the depot to the Oothcaloga Mill was set apart as a common for the use and benefit of the town, and that lots had been sold in pursuance of and with reference to this plan. Clearly, under the direction of that case and the numerous cases which have followed it, a plain case of dedication would have been established. But suppose, further, that appended to the plan or map of the town as laid out, as a part thereof, there had been the statement in writing that no lots should be sold nor timber cut from the land constituting the common without the consent of the owners of the land at the time of the dedication and certain designated public officers. Could this stipulation have had the effect to destroy the presumption of a dedication arising from the fact that lots had been sold with reference to the plan? It would seem not. Such a stipulation might have effect to prevent the municipal authorities from making any change in the condition or status of the common without the consent of the designated persons, but it could not have the effect of preserving to the original owners nor those in privity with them the power to change, alter, or dispose of the lands set apart in the plan of the town as a common. So we hold in this case that the plain language of the deed creates a common in the lands in dispute, and that, while the stipulation as to the selling of lots and cutting timber therefrom might operate as a restriction upon the power of the municipal authorities in dealing with the common should they attempt to make a change therein, or dispose of any portion thereof, it was not a reservation of property right or title to the premises referred to inconsistent with the right of the town and its inhabitants to use and enjoy them as a common.

2. The deed conveying the land declares the use for the town of Calhoun, and the land to be used as a common is situated within the corporate limits of that town. That being true, the town in its corporate capacity was the proper party plaintiff in these proceedings. "The municipality in which the land dedicated is situated, as trustee for the public, may maintain proceedings to enforce and preserve the use. Thus, where lands are dedicated to the use of the inhabitants of a city or incorporated village for a public square, a bill may be filed in the name of the corporation to restrain the erection of a nuisance thereon, or to protect the equitable right of the corporators to the use of the public square as such, and it may maintain ejectment to recover possession of the dedicated property from any one wrongfully withholding it." 18 Cyc. 502; Marsh v. Fairbury, 163 Ill. 401, 45 N. E. 236; Rhodes v. Brightwood, 145 Ind. 21, 43 N. E. 942.

3. The principle set forth in the third headnote is well settled. "The title to land which has been dedicated to public use, as for a highway or public square in a city, is in the city as trustee for the public; and it has been held, in the case of such a dedication of land in a proposed city to be thereafter built, that the fee will remain in abeyance until the proper grantee or city comes in esse, when it will vest in such city. A dedication to the public may exist where there is no city or town or corporate entity to take as grantee; and in such case, while the fee may remain in the individual who dedicates the land, he will be estopped from setting it up as against the public who may be interested in the use of the land according to its dedication. Nevertheless, when a dedication is made in an existing city, the city takes title as trustee. These statements are borne out by the following cases: Pawlet v. Clark, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 292, 3 L. Ed. 735; Beatty v. Kurtz, 2 Pet. (U. S.) 566, 7 L. Ed. 521; Cincinnati v. White's Lessee, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 431, 435, 436, 8 L. Ed. 452; Barclay v. Howell's Lessee, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 498; 8 L. Ed. 477; New Orleans v. United States, 10 Pet. (U. S.) 662, 9 L. Ed. 573; Police Jury v. Foulhouse, 30 La. Ann. 64." Werlein v. New Orleans, 177 U. S. 390, 401, 20 Sup. Ct. 632, 44 L. Ed. 817.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

PALMER v. INGRAM. (No. 311.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 26, 1907.)

1. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF—WRIT OF ERROR—ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS—SUFFICIENCY.

The following assignment of error did not sufficiently comply with the requirements of Civ. Code 1895, § 5527: "On the trial of said case the following order was granted, to wit: 'On motion of plaintiff's counsel, the foregoing answer is dismissed in open court, October 31, 1906. Frank L. Little, Judge City Court of Sparta'—which said order so granted on verbal motion of plaintiff's counsel was error." An assignment of error must plainly specify not only the decision complained of, but must point out the error in such decision.

2. DAMAGES — ASSESSMENT — DEFAULT IN PLEADING — UNLIQUIDATED DAMAGES — NECESSITY OF PROOF.

In suits for unliquidated damages, notwithstanding the absence of plea or answer, the plaintiff shall be required to prove the amount of damages.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT—BREACH OF LEASE BY LESSOR—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

In a suit to recover damages for the breach of a contract by which the defendant agreed to rent to the plaintiff a farm for one year for a stipulated sum to be paid as rental, the measure of damages for not admitting the plaintiff into possession at the beginning of the term is the difference between the rent to be paid and the actual rental value of the premises at the time of the breach.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Landlord and Tenant, § 723.]

4. SAME.

In this case it was error to allow as damages the difference in the stipulated rent and the gross value of the products of the farm for the year of the lease, without any deduction for cost of production.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Sparta; F. L. Little, Judge.

Action by Ann Ingram against Teresa Palmer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

T. M. Hunt and R. H. Lewis, for plaintiff in error. H. H. Little and W. H. Burwell, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff below brought suit to recover damages for a breach of a written contract by which the defendant agreed to rent her a certain described farm for the year 1905 at a stipulated rental of 1,500 pounds of midland lint cotton. By consent the case was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury. On motion by the plaintiff, the court dismissed the answer of the defendant, and, after hearing evidence and argument, rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of $423.25, besides interest and costs. The defendant (now plaintiff in error) assigns error on the judgment dismissing her answer, and also excepts to the judgment against her for said sum, because said judgment was "contrary to law and evidence, and without evidence to support it."

The judgment dismissing the answer was as follows: "On motion of plaintiff's counsel, the foregoing answer is dismissed in open court, October 31, 1906. Frank L. Little, Judge City Court of Sparta." And the exception to this order is in the following words: "Which said order so granted on verbal motion by plaintiff's counsel was error." The defendant in error objects to this assignment of error, on the ground that it does not specify plainly the decision complained of or point out the error in the decision. We think this objection is well taken, and that this assignment of error does not comply with the requirements of Civ. Code 1895, § 5527, which declares that every bill of exceptions "shall specify plainly the decision complained of and the alleged error." Warren v. Oliver, 111 Ga. 808, 35 S. E. 673.

Notwithstanding the fact that this left the case without plea or answer, the burden was still upon the plaintiff to prove her damages, as the damages claimed were unliquidated. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5073, 5078. She introduced her lease, and proved its breach by the defendant, and also proved what had been made on the farm during the year covered by her contract. The court awarded her damages for the full amount so proved, less the amount of rent that she had stipulated to pay. In other words, the court allowed her the gross amount of what was made on the farm, without any deduction for the value of the labor and cost necessary to be bestowed in making the amount, only deducting therefrom the amount that she had agreed to pay for the rent of the farm. We think that the measure of damages thus adopted by the court was improper, and entirely too liberal to the plaintiff. Mr. Chief Justice Bleckley, in Kenny v. Collier, 79 Ga. 746, 8 S. E. 60, speaking for the court, says: "The measure of damages for not admitting a lessee or tenant into possession at the beginning of the term is the excess in the value of the term over the amount stipulated as rent. This is the general rule." And he further says that this general rule "confines the recovery to profits arising from the contract itself, the measure of which is the difference between cost and value. If there be no difference, or if cost be in excess of value, nominal damages only will be recoverable." The plaintiff in this case was entitled to recover, if the evidence justified it, the difference in the market value of her lease for the year and the amount which she had agreed to pay for it. If the stipulated price was in excess of the market value of the lease, she could only recover nominal damages for the breach. The only proof submitted was as to the gross value of what had been produced on the farm during the year that the plaintiff was entitled to the farm under her contract; and the court gave her as damages the difference between this gross amount and the stipulated rent. This measure of damages would make it far more profitable to tenants that landlords should break their leases at the beginning of the term than that they should keep them. Evidence of the net proceeds of the crop made on the farm was used as illustrative of what was the true market value.

Judgment reversed.

CLARK & WILCOX v. EMPIRE MERCANTILE CO. (No. 347.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 4, 1907.)

1. WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

New trials are not granted for harmless errors. When a jury find a verdict which is necessarily correct in spite of erroneous instructions, errors in the charge are harmless. Where, upon review of the evidence, it is manifest that the finding of the jury was as favorable to the party complaining thereof as if no error had been committed, defects in the charge are immaterial; and it would be useless to order a second trial, when the judgment rendered in the former trial is as favorable to him as it could have been, had there been no error.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 4227.]

2. CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION—QUESTION FOR JURY.

While it is the duty of the court to construe written contracts for the jury, in the absence of ambiguity, yet in this case the court very properly left to the jury to determine the meaning of the words "invoice cost," contained in the contract, for the reason that the stock of goods in question had been twice sold by invoice, and it was an issue of fact between the parties as to which invoice was to determine the cost or value of the articles sold. See Moss Mfg. Co. v. Carolina Cement Co., 57 S. E. 914, 1 Ga. App. 232.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Irwin County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by the Empire Mercantile Company against Clark & Wilcox. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Haygood & Cutts, for plaintiffs in error.
E. W. Ryman, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The Empire Mercantile Company had two stocks of merchandise at Wray. One stock of goods at Wray had been bought as a whole from the Dooly Lumber Company and was what might be called an old stock. Clark & Wilcox entered into a negotiation to buy both stocks of goods, and the trade was closed by the following writing or contract: "Received of Messrs. B. E. Wilcox and John Clark five and no/100 dollars as part payment on stock of merchandise now owned by us at Wray, Ga.; it being understood and agreed by both parties, should the Dooly Lumber Co. fail to agree to transfer agreement between them and the Empire Mercantile Co., then said sale to be null and void, otherwise to be in full effect, to take place and be transferred on the 1st day of March, 1903, at invoice price plus the freight, and should any article in stock appear to be damaged, when both parties fail to agree on price said article to be taken out of inventory, provided, however, such articles are meant as are actually damaged or shop-worn. Terms of sale: Two thousand dollars cash; balance to be divided into six equal payments of 30, 60, 90, 130, 150, 180 days each." In conformity with this contract Clark & Wilcox executed the six notes, payable as therein provided, and five of them were paid at maturity. The sixth note was not paid. Suit was brought on it and is the subject of this litigation.

It seems that the stock which was bought from the Dooly Lumber Company was the cause of the trouble. Some time after the sale Clark & Wilcox found out that the Dooly Lumber Company had given the Empire Mercantile Company a discount of 25 per cent. when they bought this old stock. The dispute, therefore, arose as to whether the words "invoice price" referred to the original invoice cost, which appeared to have been marked on the goods, or to the price paid by the Empire Mercantile Company for the stock of the Dooly Lumber Company, on which there was 25 per cent. concession. It was undisputed that at the time of the negotiation for the sale, and when the sale was closed, some of the members of the mercantile company did not know that there had been a 25 per cent. discount allowed in their purchase. Under these circumstances we agree with the judge of the superior court that the judge of the city court very properly allowed the jury to determine what was meant by the words "invoice cost" in the contract between the parties in this case.

Nearly all of the numerous exceptions assign error on the failure of the judge of the city court to construe the contract as matter of law. We think the learned counsel misconceived the holding of the trial court. There is nothing in the charge, nor is there any ruling of the court, which indicates a purpose on the part of the trial judge to shirk his duty in this regard; but where a contract is ambiguous the jury must find the facts, and in this instance it was nothing but an issue of fact that was to be determined, to wit, whether invoice cost (the meaning of which is, the cost as appears from the invoice or bill furnished contemporaneously with a purchase of goods) in this case was to be derived from one invoice or another and different invoice; in other words, whether the price was to be fixed by the invoice at which the Dooly Lumber Company stock was bought by them, or whether indebtedness of Clark & Wilcox to the Empire Mercantile Company for the stock purchased by them from the Dooly Lumber Company was to be diminished by a 25 per cent. discount, which, so far as the evidence discloses, did not appear upon any invoice. And in this view of the case the ruling of the court, in our opinion, was more favorable than the plaintiffs in error had any right to expect. But, conceding all that the plaintiffs in error claim (which is that they were entitled to a discount of 25 per cent. on the stock of goods known as the "Dooly Lumber Company stock"), no error harmful to the plaintiffs in error appears in the judgment overruling the certiorari. Their contention was that, allowing the 25 per cent., the note would be canceled by the credit to which they would thus be entitled. But the evidence shows that, taking into consideration about $500 worth of the Dooly Lumber Company's stock returned by Clark & Wilcox as shop-worn, there was only about $400 worth of this stock included in the purchase. While there was conflict as to this, and testimony placing the amount higher than $500, still the jury were authorized to find, as the value of the Dooly Lumber Company stock, $500 less. Twenty-five per cent. of this valuation being deducted from the note sued on would be equivalent to the verdict found by the jury.

The credibility of the witnesses is exclusively a question for the jury, and in our opinion the preponderance of the evidence established the fact that the value of the Dooly Lumber Company stock accepted by the plaintiffs in error showed it to be worth from $300 to $400, and not exceeding the latter figure. The verdict of the jury found $243.71 for the plaintiffs. The note in suit was for $368.71, a reduction of $125. The verdict, therefore, shows clearly that the jury adopted the theory of the plaintiffs in error that they ought to be allowed a discount of 25 per cent., and that they found the value of the Dooly Lumber Company stock to be $500. The jury would have been authorized, under the evidence, to find the value of the Dooly Lumber Company stock to be only $300, or to find it to be $400; and in either event, as the credit allowed would have been less, a greater verdict in favor of the plaintiff than that found would have been fully sustained. In this view of the case, the errors assigned in the petition for certiorari either failed to be sustained or became entirely immaterial. Granting every contention of the plaintiffs in error, and that the court on another trial should rule in exact accordance with their view of the case, still, if the jury believe that the value of the Dooly Lumber Company's stock, after the rejection of the shop-worn goods, was worth no more than $500, the verdict would be the same; and, as no reason appears why the result would be different, a new trial is useless. It is useless to grant a new trial for errors in a charge or ruling upon evidence, when the result of such trial and the judgment rendered therein is as favorable to the movant as it could be if there had been no error; and when, upon a review of the evidence, it is manifest that the finding of the jury was as favorable to the party complaining thereof as if no error had been committed, defects in the charge of the court become immaterial, it being otherwise evident that the parties have had a fair trial and the evidence was fully and properly submitted.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from City Court of Dublin; J. B. Burch, Judge.

Attachment by J. M. Hall against Clara Coats and others. From the judgment, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Jas. B. Sanders, for plaintiff in error. Williams & Blackshear, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff in error sued out an attachment against the defendants, returnable to the city court of Dublin, for the purchase money of two mules. The declaration alleged that the defendants bought from Pope & Bales two mules for $353.39, for which they made and delivered to said Pope & Bales their note, and to secure the payment thereof executed a mortgage on the mules. The note and mortgage were dated November 24, 1904, and due September 15, 1905. The note recited that, if not paid at maturity, it was to bear interest at 8 per cent. per annum from its date. The note and mortgage were transferred to the plaintiff by Pope & Bales October 2, 1905. In answer to the declaration the defendants admitted the execution of the note and mortgage, and that the same were for the purchase money of the mules. They further answered that they had paid on the note $168.16, and that after the note was due, and when it was still in the possession of Pope & Bales, they had tendered to Pope & Bales the full balance due thereon, which Pope & Bales stated was $190, and that Pope & Bales had agreed to surrender to them the note on payment of this balance; that, notwithstanding this agreement, Pope & Bales refused to accept the tender of this amount and surrender the note, on the ground that they had transferred it to J. M. Hall, the plaintiff. They further answered that they then tendered the full amount due on said note to J. M. Hall, "and are here and now ready to pay the said Hall the entire balance due on said note, and here bring the same into court and tender it." All of the facts as to the tender were admitted to be true, but the plaintiff alleged that no payments had been made on the notes by the defendants, and that the full amount, with interest, was due; that the credits on the notes were made by him, and not by the makers. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for $190, without interest, and he made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled.

It was not denied that Pope & Bales told the defendants that the balance due on the note was $190, and that they agreed to surrender the note on payment of this balance; nor was it denied that the defendants did tender this amount to Pope & Bales and to J. M. Hall. The evidence is not clear as to the exact date when the tender was made to Pope & Bales, but there is some evidence from which the jury might have found that such tender was made before the transfer of the note to Hall. If such was the fact, Hall took the note, it being past due, subject to the rights which resulted from the agreement of Pope & Bales to accept $190 in full payment thereof, and the tender to them of this amount. The only objection urged by counsel for the plaintiff to the tender was that it was not in full of the specific debt due on the note. A calculation of the balance due on the note, when the makers asked the holders thereof how much was then due, will show a small sum in excess of $190, including principal and interest; but the holders had the right to accept in full payment the sum of $190, and, having agreed to do so, the full obligation of the defendants was met when that amount was tendered. The jury accepted this theory of the case, and we cannot say that this verdict is unsupported by the evidence. It seems to be in accordance with substantial justice, and we will let it stand, there having been no error of law committed.

Judgment affirmed.

1. SALES—EXECUTORY CONTRACT TO BUY—BREACH—REMEDY—FORM.

2. SALES—EXECUTED SALE—PASSING OF TITLE—NECESSITY.

The intention of the parties to a contract may dispense with delivery of personal goods, and delivery may be constructive; but for a contract of sale to be executed, and not merely executory, the title must pass to the purchaser, in the absence of delivery.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Cordele; E. F. Strozler, Judge.

Action by Dilman Bros. against the Patterson Produce & Provision Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Hill & Royal, for plaintiffs in error. W. H. Dorris, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Dilman Bros. brought their suit upon an open account against the Patterson Produce & Provision Company for $232.16; this amount representing the price of a car load of Danish cabbage and Baldwin apples, shipped on Lehigh Valley car No. 5,609, from Waterloo, N. Y., on March 20, 1905, by Dilman Bros., "order notify" Patterson Produce & Provision Company, at Cordele, Ga. The plaintiffs had the bill of lading for the shipment taken to their own order, and attached thereto a draft for the purchase price of said produce, and drawing through the Cordele National Bank of Cordele, Ga., and the draft, together with the bill of lading, was presented to the defendant for payment. The defendant refused to accept the car of produce or to pay the draft, and notified the plaintiffs of this fact immediately; and the plaintiffs instituted this suit. Upon an agreement between the counsel in the case, the issue was submitted to the court without a jury; and after hearing the evidence the court rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for said amount of the purchase price of the produce. The defendant made a motion for a new trial upon various grounds. Upon the hearing of the motion his honor, Judge Strozler, granted a new trial; and this is the error assigned in the bill of exceptions.

As the new trial was granted for the sole reason that it appeared from the evidence "that the goods sued for were never delivered to the defendant, and for this reason an action upon account could not be maintained," it is only necessary to consider two grounds of the motion for new trial. These are as follows: "(3) Because the court erred in rendering judgment in favor of the plaintiff, for the reason that under the evidence the contract was an executory contract, and not an executed contract, and the title to said property did not pass out of the plaintiff into the defendant, and the title to same, under the contract of shipment, would not pass out of the plaintiff until the draft attached to the bill of lading was paid, because the evidence shows that the shipment was made to 'order' of the plaintiff. (4) Because the court erred in rendering judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant, for the reason that the evidence does not disclose any delivery of the merchandise sued for to the defendant by the plaintiff, or any acceptance of them on the part of the defendant, and this plaintiff cannot maintain an action for the purchase price of the merchandise against this defendant in plaintiff's suit on open account." The question in the case turns upon the point whether there had been a sale of the articles whose purchase price was sued for—whether the contract between the parties was executory or executed.

It is well settled that delivery of goods is essential in order to maintain an action for the purchase price. It is true that actual delivery may be dispensed with by agreement of the parties, and also true that by constructive delivery (where such is shown by the evidence) actual manual possession of the goods by the vendee is not necessary to complete the sale. But to complete the sale of personalty there must be a relinquishment by the vendor to the vendee of dominion and control of the property sold. The evidence in this case shows that the parties contemplated a cash transaction, and that actual delivery should be had before the sale was complete. Under Civ. Code 1895, § 3545, "until delivery is made or dispensed with, the goods are at the risk of the seller," and "if a purchaser refuses to take and pay for goods bought the seller may retain them and recover the difference between the contract and the market price at the time and place of delivery, or he may sell the property, acting for this purpose as agent for the vendee, and recover the difference between the contract price and the price on resale, or he may store or retain the property for the vendee and sue him for the entire price." Civ. Code 1895, § 3551. The contract was an executory and not an executed contract, for the reason that Dilman Bros., as sellers, took a bill of lading from the railroad company to their own order, and attached draft to same for the purchase price, drawing on the defendant, through the bank of the defendant's residence. The vendors thereby retained title to the goods in themselves until the draft was paid or accepted by the defendant under the contract of shipment, thereby rendering the railroad the agent of the seller, and not the agent of the buyer. Furthermore, under the contract of shipment, the bill of lading was security for the draft, and neither the title nor the right to the bill of lading passed to the defendant, but the title to the goods remained in the plaintiff. For these reasons we think the judgment of the trial judge in granting a new trial was right.

The case of Maddox v. Wagner, 111 Ga. 146, 36 S. E. 609, lays down the rule that a breach of an executory contract for the purchase of goods will not support an action upon an open account for the price thereof. Then, was this an executory contract? The goods were ordered by telegram and were consigned to the order of the shippers. One of the stipulations of the bill of lading was as follows: "Not negotiable. If the word 'order' is written immediately before or after the name of the party to whose order the property is consigned, the surrender of the bill of lading, properly indorsed, shall be required before the delivery of the property at destination, as provided by section 9 of the conditions of the uniform bill of lading, on the back thereof." And on the back of the bill of lading was the following: "(9) If the word 'order' is written hereon immediately before or after the name of the party to whose order the property is consigned (without any conditions or limitations other than the name of a party to be notified of the arrival of the property), the surrender of this bill of lading properly indorsed shall be required before the delivery of the property at destination. If any other than the aforesaid form of consignment is used herein, the said property may, at the option of the carrier, be delivered without requiring the production or surrender of this bill of lading." As before stated, this bill of lading was attached to a draft for the purchase price drawn on the Patterson Produce & Provision Company, and under Civ. Code 1895, § 3554, neither the title to the goods nor the right to the bill of lading passed to them until they either accepted, or accepted and secured, or paid, that draft. As held by the Supreme Court in Farmers' & Traders' Bank v. Allen-Holmes Company, 122 Ga. 69, 49 S. E. 817: "Under the very terms of the contract of shipment the carrier obligated itself to transport the car and hold it subject to the orders of the holder of the bill of lading, whether such holder was the party to whom the bill of lading was originally issued or his assignee." So that delivery to the carrier was never delivery to the Patterson Produce & Provision Company, unless it became the holder of the bill of lading in one of the ways pointed out in section 3554. It did not pay the draft. There was no delivery. The manner of the shipment proved the contract of sale to be executory—such a contract as, under the decision in Maddox v. Wagner, supra, would not support the action upon open account.

The case of Woodward v. Solomon, 7 Ga. 246, cited by learned counsel for plaintiff in error, does not rule contrary to what we now hold. In that case the vendor had been paid in full for his property, and in writing relinquished dominion and control to the vendee.

In the Woodward Case the vendee, having paid the price, not only had the right of property, but was also entitled to the possession. The vendor did everything there was to be done, and the rule laid down in that case is merely that, if there is nothing to be done by the vendor, the title passes to the vendee. In other words, the court was simply discussing the question of title to property under sales generally. As said by Justice Lumpkin, in Allen v. Hollis, 31 Ga. 143 (1): "When goods are sold, and nothing is said as to the time of delivery or time of payment, and everything the seller has to do is complete, the property vests in the buyer." And, after remarking that Broom's Commentaries upon the Common Law contained more law than any volume of its size extant, he quotes from that book as follows: "Property in specific chattels may pass without delivery. It will so pass when, at the time of the bargain, everything is already done which according to the intentions of the parties was necessary to transfer the property. An appropriation of the property, being equivalent to a delivery by the vendor and the assent of the vendee to take the specific chattels and pay the price, is equivalent to his accepting possession. The effect of the contract, therefore, is to vest the chattel in the bargainee." The rule is nothing more nor less than that transfer of title (the right of property) is equivalent to delivery and dispenses with it. The doctrine has no application in this case, for the vendor in this case expressly reserved title by attaching the bill of lading to the draft.

If Dilman Bros. had consigned the goods directly to the Patterson Produce & Provision Company, title would have passed to the consignee; and, delivery to the carrier being delivery to the consignee, nothing would have remained for the vendor to do, and the case would have been properly brought. But the evidence shows that the vendors in this case did not intend to dispense with delivery. That usual essential of a sale was still incomplete, and title was retained in order to make the execution of the contract dependent upon payment. "The general rule is that when one orders goods from a distant place, to be shipped by a common carrier, and the order is accepted and the goods shipped, the delivery to the common carrier is delivery to the purchaser, the common carrier being the agent of the purchaser to receive them; and when this is done the title, without more, passes from the vendor to the vendee. If, however, the vendor of the goods is not satisfied of the solvency of the purchaser, or is doubtful thereof, or wishes to retain the title himself, he may vary this rule, when he makes the consignment and delivers the goods to the carrier, by taking the bill of lading from the carrier to his own order. When the vendor does this, it is evidence that he does not part with the title of the goods shipped, but retains the same until the draft which he sends with the bill of lading is accepted or paid." Delivery of personal goods may be evidence of title. Title is not necessarily dependent upon delivery. But there can certainly be no sale without change of title. There was no error in granting a new trial.

It is not necessary to consider the other questions raised in the record. While it is true, as a general rule, that the first grant of a new trial on the part of the trial court will not be reviewed or controlled, still the general rule as to the discretion of the presiding judge in granting a first new trial does not apply when the new trial is granted solely on a question of law.

Judgment affirmed.

FOOTE & DAVIES CO. v. HOUCHIN MFG. CO. (No. 283.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 26, 1907.)

1. CONTRACTS—CONTRACT TO CONSTRUCT MACHINE—DUTY OF MANUFACTURER.

A., a manufacturer of machinery, entered into a contract with B., a bookbinder, to construct for him a "book-covering machine" according to B.'s design. The machine was an experiment, and there was doubt as to its practical success when completed. B. therefore agreed with A. "to pay all the expenses incurred in getting up the machine, whether the machine finally met with B.'s approval or not." Held: (a) In the construction of the machine A. was under an implied obligation to use reasonably proper and suitable material and to perform the work of construction in a reasonably skillful manner. (b) If the machine, when completed, was not suited to the purpose intended and was a failure, and such unsatisfactory result was due to the inferior quality of the material used by A. in its construction and to the unskillful manner in which he performed the work, B. would be released from his contract to pay all the expense incurred by A. in getting up the machine.

2. SAME.

In a suit by A. against B. to recover the expense incurred in constructing the machine, an answer setting up the facts indicated in the foregoing headnote as the causes for the failure of the machine to produce satisfactory results constituted a good defense, and evidence offered in support thereof should have been allowed and submitted to the consideration of the jury.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by the Houchin Manufacturing Company against the Foote & Davies Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Chas. W. Smith, for plaintiff in error.
Candlers, Thomson & Hirsch, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff in the court below was a manufacturer of machinery, and the defendant was a publisher and bookbinder. The president of the defendant company desired to have constructed a book-covering machine, and, acting for his company, employed the defendant to construct such a machine. As the machine seems to have had no model, but was novel and experimental, there was some doubt as to its practical success. The plaintiff, therefore, while willing to undertake its construction, and though it had faith in its ability to construct the machine to meet the views of the defendant, was unwilling to attempt the experiment without a special contract. This contract was entered into by the parties, and is evidenced by the following two letters:

"Atlanta, Ga., April 1, 1904.

"Messrs. Foote & Davies, City—Gentlemen: With further reference to the conversation had with our Mr. Houchin, we beg to advise you that we are entering your order for one of the machines referred to upon the following conditions: All expenses that we may incur in getting up this machine, whether the machine finally meets your approval or not, will be borne by you. While we have every reason to believe that we will get up a machine to successfully meet your views, yet we could not attempt to make the experiment at our expense. We write this, so that there may be no misunderstanding between us, and ask you to acknowledge receipt of this letter, agreeing with our requirements, and we will proceed with the machine without further delay.

"Yours truly,

"Houchin Manufacturing Company."

In reply to this letter, the Foote & Davies Company wrote as follows:

"Atlanta, Ga., April 2, 1904.

"The Houchin Mfg. Co., 115 Garnett St., City—Gentlemen: Yours of the 1st is our understanding of the contract for building machine.

"Yours very truly,

"Foote & Davies Company."

Under the contract entered into by these two letters, the machine was completed. It proved to be unsuccessful, and on the refusal of the Foote & Davies Company to pay the expense of constructing the same the Houchin Manufacturing Company brought suit against the Foote & Davies Company for the expenses incurred in getting up the machine. The suit was based upon the foregoing contract. In addition to the answer, making a general denial of indebtedness, the Foote & Davies Company filed an amendment thereto, as follows: "Defendant says that the machine which plaintiff built for it was properly planned, and, if properly and carefully built, would have been serviceable and of great value to the defendant, but that, instead of its having been properly built, it was built so carelessly and of such inferior material, and the work thereon was so inferior, that said machine is unserviceable and of absolutely no value to the defendant." This amendment was allowed. On the trial of the case the defendant offered proof in support of this amended answer, which was rejected by the court, as in the opinion of the court, under the terms of the contract, the defendant took the risk of everything in the contract in connection with the construction of the machine. The court permitted the defendant to show the market value of the material that was put into the machine, but refused to allow the defendant to show, either that such material was of proper quality to put into the machine or that the machine was constructed in a suitable and workmanlike manner, and for these reasons was worthless. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount, and the defendant filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted.

The only material exceptions to be considered by this court are the exceptions to the rulings of the trial court in refusing to allow evidence to be introduced by the defendant in support of the averments set up in the amended answer and in charging the jury that under the contract in the case they could not consider the allegations that the machine was not constructed in a proper and workmanlike manner, but was very improperly and carelessly constructed, and of inferior material, and the work on it was inferior, and that as a result the machine was not serviceable, and was of no value to the defendant. The machine in question was the conception of Mr. Foote, the president of the defendant corporation, and it was understood that it was an experiment, and its practical utility, when constructed, was doubtful. Mr. Foote testified that during the construction of the machine by the plaintiff he was personally present a great deal of the time, and made repeated objections to the material that was going into the machine and to the character of the workmanship; but these objections were disregarded. We think the trial court erred in its construction of the contract in question. We think that under this contract there was an implied obligation on the part of the plaintiff to construct the machine skillfully and in a workmanlike manner, and to make a selection of proper material to be used in it. If, after using such skill and selecting such material, the machine as completed did not prove to be a successful experiment, the defendant was nevertheless bound to pay the expense of its construction. It seems to us that it would be an unreasonable interpretation to place upon the contract that, however unskillfully made and however inferior and unsuited the material used, the defendant was nevertheless bound to pay all expense incurred in connection therewith. It seems to us far more reasonable to say that if the manufacturers, after using proper skill and workmanship and ordinarily good material, had nevertheless failed in making a successful machine according to the plans of the defendant, it was bound to pay the expense incurred.

Any other construction, in our opinion, would place the defendant at an unfair disadvantage and entirely at the mercy of the plaintiff. In the case of Cannon v. Hunt, 116 Ga. 452, 42 S. E. 734, the Supreme Court held that, if the particular kind of material to be furnished and the manner in which the work is to be done are not specified in a contract, the contractor is at liberty, and is under a corresponding duty, to himself make a selection of proper material and to perform the work in the manner in which it should be done. No particular kind of material is specified in the contract now under consideration to be used in the construction of the machine, nor does the contract say anything as to the manner in which the work of construction should be performed. But we think that the law wrote into the contract the obligation to use reasonably suitable material and to do reasonably skillful work in the construction of the machine. If the machine was a failure, and was not reasonably suited to the purpose for which it was constructed and intended, and this was because of defective and unsuitable material and careless and unskillful workmanship, and not because of any defect in the plan thereof as indicated by the defendant, we think these facts would, if proved, constitute a good defense, and would not be repugnant to the terms of the contract between the parties. Of course, if Foote was present directing the work, and saw the material used and the character of the work done, and made no objection, this plea would not avail the defendant.

Judgment reversed.

TAYLOR v. CHAMBERS. (No. 357.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 20, 1907.)

1. SLANDER—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

Communications which would otherwise be slanderous are protected as privileged, if made in good faith by the injured person in the prosecution of an inquiry regarding a crime which he believes to have been committed upon his property, and for the purpose of detecting the criminal or bringing him to punishment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Nashville; H. B. Peeples, Judge.

Action by Frank Chambers against H. T.

Taylor. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Bule & Knight, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Powell, W. G. Harrison, and Alexander & Gary, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. An action for slander was brought by Chambers against Taylor. The petition as amended alleged, in substance, that the defendant had said to H. W. Griffin, Samuel Long, J. D. Hutchinson, J. F. Robinson, W. W. Bird, W. F. Matthis, Joel W. Parrish, Willie Lassiter, and Eddie Lassiter that the plaintiff had burned a certain house of the defendant, thereby intending falsely and maliciously to impute to the plaintiff a felony, the crime of arson. In the fourth paragraph it is alleged that the defendant also tried to hire Long to swear that the plaintiff confessed the crime. In the sixth paragraph it is alleged that on the preliminary trial, at which the plaintiff stood charged with this offense, the defendant under oath publicly proclaimed that the plaintiff had burned the house. In the seventh paragraph it is alleged that the defendant attempted to indict the plaintiff before the grand jury for the offense, but failed. The defendant denied all the allegations of the petition, but set up additionally: "That it is true that in December, 1904, one of his houses, out of which plaintiff had just moved, was mysteriously burned, and all the circumstances pointed toward plaintiff being the perpetrator of the deed; that in good faith and in performance of a private and public duty he made affidavit and had plaintiff arrested for committing said act; that all words spoken by him were in furtherance of the belief, from facts and circumstances known, that plaintiff committed the act, and not from a wanton and malicious mind on the part of defendant, and, although a committal court did not find plaintiff guilty, the facts and circumstances surrounding the whole transaction point strongly to his being the perpetrator; that defendant has never since said committal trial attempted to push in any manner such charge against plaintiff, preferring to let the matter drop against him, merely from his own choice, and not from a belief of the innocence of plaintiff." The defendant also demurred generally and specially; but we do not deem it profitable to report the grounds herein.

There was no evidence as to the communication of the alleged slander to any of the persons named in the petition, except H. W. Griffin, Ed Lassiter, and Will Lassiter. After swearing out a warrant against Chambers charging him with arson, Taylor, in pursuance to directions from the magistrate, went to Griffin, on whose place Chambers was living at the time of the fire, and told him that the house had been burned, and that he desired to get the man who did it; that from circumstances he was led to believe that Chambers was the guilty person; and that, desiring to prove Chambers' whereabouts on the night in question, he had come to him (Griffin) for information as to that fact. Ed Lassiter was the person who discovered that the house was on fire; and, he having expressed the belief that Chambers had burned the house, the defendant in discussing the matter agreed with him. Will Lassiter was also a witness to material circumstances in connection with the criminal prosecution, and in discussing the case with him the defendant expressed the belief that Chambers was guilty. There was no evidence supporting the other allegations of the petition. Taylor testified to a state of facts indicating utmost good faith in his discussing with the witnesses the plaintiff's suspected connection with the burning of the house. The jury returned a verdict for $300 in favor of the plaintiff.

1. "Any person may speak, write and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty." Const. Ga. art. 1, par. 15 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5712). It is not an abuse of this liberty for one who has had his property burned, and who suspects another of having set it on fire, to institute a criminal proceeding against the latter, and, in connection therewith and in the preparation of the case, to make bona fide statements of his suspicions and grounds of suspicion to third persons, who would likely possess evidence as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, with the view of ascertaining how far their knowledge and information would corroborate or weaken the charge made; and this is true, whether the suspicions, if bona fide entertained, were well-founded or not. Such communications are privileged, and, if not maliciously made, are not actionable. In a slander suit, based upon such communications, malice is not presumed, and the burden of showing the same is upon the plaintiff. These principles are well recognized, and from an abundance of authority we cite only the following: Civ. Code 1895, § 3840; Ventress v. Rosser, 73 Ga. 539; Newell on Slander and Libel (2d Ed.) p. 500, §§ 98-100; Id. p. 478, § 68.

2, 8. In regard to rulings upon the pleadings in the trial court: The amendments made to the petition cured any error committed in overruling the demurrers, except as follows: The demurrer to the latter portion of the fourth paragraph of the petition should have been sustained; likewise the demurrer to the sixth and seventh paragraphs. The defendant's plea, not admitting the use of the words charged in the manner alleged, was not such a plea of justification as to give the defendant the right to open and conclude. There was no error in allowing the petition to be made more specific by amendment.

Judgment reversed.

TRAYLOR, SPENCER & CO. v. BRIMBERY. (No. 353.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 24, 1907.)

1. CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION—TIME AS OF THE ESSENCE OF THE CONTRACT.

Time is of the essence of a contract, when the nature of the contract is such as to indicate that this must have been the intention of the parties. In order for a proposition to be binding upon him who makes the proposal, the opposite party must accept it before the time fixed for the performance of the contract.

2. SAME.

In a case where B. agreed in writing to pay to the creditors of C., in the event that they "may hereafter accept my offer of settlement," 50% of principal in full settlement of said claims, paying 25% February 1, and 25% April 1, 1899," and D., one of the creditors, accepted the proposition on May 16, 1899, B. was not bound thereby to pay the said 50 per cent., for the reason that an acceptance after the date proposed for payment is not acceptance within a reasonable time.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 11, Contracts, § 67.]

3. SAME.

The evidence disclosing the above state of facts, in an action brought to recover the 50 per cent. proposed to be paid, it was not error to award a nonsuit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Mitchell County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by Traylor, Spencer & Co. against M. F. Brimbery. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

I. A. Bush & Sons and W. R. Hammond, for plaintiffs in error. Pope & Bennet, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Traylor, Spencer & Co. brought suit in a justice's court against M. F. Brimbery. Attached to the summons was the following account: "Winston, N. C., July 15, 1899. M. F. Brimbery, in Account with Traylor, Spencer & Company. Terms: 1/2 Feb. 1st; 1/2 April 1st, 1899. July 15. To cash acct. settlement and transfer acct. vs. A. B. Brimbery, at 50%, $65.37." The case was appealed to the superior court, and upon introduction of the plaintiff's evidence a nonsuit was awarded.

The plaintiff introduced the following writing: "Camilla, Ga., Dec. 23, 1898. In consideration that the stock of goods, notes, accounts, and other property belonging to A. B. Brimbery is hereby placed in my hands for disposition, I hereby agree to pay to I. A. Bush & Sons, attorneys at law, for such of creditors of A. B. Brimbery as have not already accepted my offer of 50% in full settlement of claims, their pro rata share of the proceeds of said stock of goods, notes, and accounts, etc., as soon as the same can be reduced to cash by me. In the event that said creditors may hereafter accept my offer of settlement, as made to I. A. Bush & Sons, attorneys aforesaid, I agree to pay them 50% of principal in full settlement of said claim, paying 25% February 1, and 25% April 1, 1899. Claims as follows: French, Morris & Co., $100.95; Loomis & Hart Mfg. Co., $49.10; Atlanta Wooden Ware Co., $43.45; Traylor, Spencer & Co., $127.00; Cumberland Paper Co., $57.15; Ware Fur Mfg. Co., $72.00; Wilber Seed Co., $32.00; John C. Vogler, $38.25; W. H. Marks & Co., $23.50 (paid); Waxelbaum Pepper Co., $49.00. [Signed] M. F. Brimbery."

I. A. Bush testified for the plaintiffs that I. A. Bush & Sons were attorneys for the plaintiffs when the agreement was signed by M. F. Brimbery. A. B. Brimbery, a son of defendant, failed in business and turned over to I. A. Bush his stock of merchandise and other property for the benefit of his creditors. M. F. Brimbery claimed to be one of A. B. Brimbery's largest creditors. The said M. F. made the proposition set out in the agreement, and by consent of A. B. Brimbery I. A. Bush & Sons turned all the property of A. B. Brimbery over to M. F. Brimbery. Soon after this M. F. Brimbery sold the stock of goods for $2,000 or $2,200. Witness was not able to state the amount realized out of the other property. He further testified that Marshall E. Bush, a witness on the former trial of the case, was dead; that the said deceased witness testified, on the former trial, that as soon as he was authorized by plaintiffs in this case he notified said Brimbery that he would accept his proposition of 50 per cent. on the dollar as full settlement. I. A. Bush further testified that he knew that M. F. Brimbery was notified by M. E. Bush, because he talked to him about it several times. The notice of acceptance was given M. F. Brimbery after the dates named in the agreement and after the date of the letter hereafter in evidence.

The plaintiffs introduced in evidence the following letter: "Danville, Va., May 16, 1899. Messrs. I. A. Bush & Sons, Camilla, Georgia—Dear Sirs: In reply to your favor concerning A. B. Brimbery's account, would say that you may accept 40% net to us in full settlement of the account. We trust that you will close the matter at once. Traylor, Spencer & Company." I. A. Bush then testified: "This letter from Traylor, Spencer & Co. to I. A. Bush & Sons came by due course of mail from the post office address of plaintiffs."

Omitting the objections to the magistrate's summons and to the peculiar wording of the account thereto attached, and that the contract proposed by Brimbery may well be construed as a contract between the defendant and I. A. Bush & Sons, attorneys at law, for all such creditors of A. B. Brimbery as have not already accepted the offer at 50 per cent. and not a contract for the plaintiffs individually, and remembering that niceties of pleading are not required in justices' courts (Southern Railway Co. v. Oliver, 1 Ga. App. 730, 58 S. E. 244), we come to the controlling point in the case. We have no difficulty in construing the suit as one for $65.37 in cash, which would have been the amount due if the plaintiffs had accepted the proposition. If the plaintiffs had accepted the defendant's proposal, he would have owed them 25 per cent. of their claim on February 1st, and 25 per cent. on April 1st, and this debt was to be discharged in cash. He had been intrusted with the stock of goods, and if this proposition was accepted the debt did not arise altogether from the contract; but the contract was also evidence of the amount he was to pay. Assuming, then, that the statement of account is sufficient for the purposes of a justice's court, and that suit was brought (as is apparent) to recover under the 50 per cent. proposition, and not the pro rata, was the evidence so insufficient to sustain the allegations that a nonsuit ought to have been awarded?

We think that the case was properly nonsuited. Admitting that the evidence harmonized with the summons and that the suit was brought to recover the 50 per cent. offered, the suit must fail for the reason that the evidence shows that the offer or proposal to pay 50 per cent. was not accepted until long after the time for the performance of the contract had passed. The proposal cannot be construed to be held out indefinitely, in view of the times fixed for the payments in case of acceptance; and the offer would have had to be accepted in a reasonable time. To a proposal made December 23, 1898, and payments under which were to begin February 1st following, an acceptance made several months thereafter (during May, 1899) would not be an acceptance within a reasonable time. It is evident, from the terms of the writing signed by Brimbery, that he proposed to pay the creditors either their pro rata share of the proceeds of the stock of goods, notes, accounts, etc., or 50 per cent. of the amount of the claim of each creditor, at his option. If he honestly administered the trust reposed in him, the creditor would receive his pro rata share, which might be more or less than 50 per cent. of his account. There was no risk in this to Brimbery. The risk was on the creditor. If the creditor accepted the 50 per cent., it devolved the risk upon Brimbery, and there was no risk on the creditor, though his pro rata share from the stock of goods might not have amounted to 10 per cent. of his claim. From the very nature of the transaction time was of the essence of the proposal to contract, and of the contract, if one had been made by acceptance on the part of the creditor.

If the creditor had accepted the 50 per cent. proposal before February 1, 1899, Brimbery would have been bound to pay the amounts contracted to be paid, regardless of what the stock brought and whether he had sold the stock or not. He would have been compelled to pay, if able to respond, even if the stock had been destroyed by fire. In other words, he took all the chances. The plaintiffs really had three options. They could allow Brimbery to sell and collect for the stock, notes, accounts, etc., and take their pro rata in a division with all the creditors. They could have accepted the 50 per cent. or could have disregarded Brimbery's proposal altogether, sued the debtor, A. B. Brimbery, or his legal representative, and garnished M. F. Brimbery, obtained a judgment for the full amount justly due him, and perhaps, by garnishment, have collected his entire claim. By failing to accept either of Brimbery's proposals, he is remitted to the latter course of action.

Judgment affirmed.

INGRAM v. JACKSON MERCANTILE CO.
(No. 397.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 26, 1907.)

1. GARNISHMENT—JUDGMENTS WHICH WARRANT—DORMANT JUDGMENT.

Under Civ. Code 1895, § 3761, no judgment shall be enforced after it becomes dormant.

(a) To allow a dormant judgment to subject money through a process of garnishment based thereon would be to enforce it in violation of this section.

(b) A judgment obtained in a justice's court is dormant, where the execution issued thereon is more than seven years old, and neither the execution nor any official entry thereon has been entered upon the superior court execution docket; and this is true, although the execution has been, within the period named, entered upon the general execution docket.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Garnishment, § 8; vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, § 415.]

2. SAME—JUDGMENT AGAINST DEFENDANT—NECESSITY.

A valid existing judgment against the defendant is a condition precedent to a judgment against the garnishee; and the latter may contest the validity of the judgment against the defendant, when the same is offered as a basis for a judgment in the garnishment case. This is true, although the garnishee has failed to make answer, or has answered admitting indebtedness to the defendant, or has answered denying indebtedness, and, upon traverse, the issue has been found against him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Garnishment, § 249.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Butts County; C. L. Redman, Judge pro hac.

Garnishment proceedings in a justice's court by the Jackson Mercantile Company, on a judgment obtained against J. M. Ingram, against J. S. Ingram, administrator of the estate of Susan P. Ingram, deceased. From a judgment of the superior court for plaintiff on certiorari to review the judgment in justice's court for the garnishee, the garnishee brings error. Reversed.

O. M. Duke, for plaintiff in error. H. M. Fletcher and Ray & Ray, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. On May 15, 1897, the Jackson Mercantile Company recovered judgment in a justice's court against J. M. Ingram. On May 21, 1897, execution was issued. On August 28, 1897, the execution was placed upon the general execution docket of the county. On January 9, 1904, an entry of nulla bona was made on the execution; but neither the execution nor the entry of nulla bona has ever been recorded on the superior court execution docket. On October 17, 1906, the Jackson Mercantile Company sued out a garnishment proceeding based on this judgment, and caused summons of garnishment to be served upon J. S. Ingram, administrator upon the estate of Susan P. Ingram. To the answer of the garnishee there were filed both an objection as to its being sufficient, and as to the time of its filing, and also a traverse. When the execution was offered on the trial, as evidence of the plaintiff's judgment against the defendant, the point was made that it was dormant. The jury found in favor of the garnishee. The plaintiff sued out certiorari; and on the hearing in the superior court the judge pro hac vice awarded final judgment in favor of the plaintiff, presumptively upon the theory that the answer of the garnishee was insufficient, or not filed in time, and that the garnishee was, therefore, not in position to attack the validity of the plaintiff's judgment.

1. The judgment was dormant. This is clear. When a judgment is obtained in a justice's court, in order to prevent dormancy, the execution and entries are to be recorded upon the superior court execution docket, not upon the general execution docket. The record upon the latter docket is for a different purpose. Civ. Code 1895, § 3762; Columbus Fertilizer Co. v. Hanks, 119 Ga. 950, 47 S. E. 222; Rountree v. Jones, 124 Ga. 395, 52 S. E. 325. A dormant judgment is asleep for all purposes, legal and equitable; and by the express letter of Civ. Code 1895, § 3761, it is not to be enforced. Palmer v. Inman, 128 Ga. 519, 55 S. E. 229. To let it seize money through a process of garnishment would unquestionably be to enforce it, and would be a violation of the law.

2. A valid existing judgment against the defendant is a necessary prerequisite to a judgment against the garnishee; for the existence of such a judgment is the only and adequate answer of the garnishee to the defendant when the latter calls upon him for payment of the indebtedness existing between them. The garnishee may by answer admit indebtedness to the defendant, or, by failing to answer, may put himself into a position where the court conclusively presumes against him an admission of such indebtedness, or he may become estopped to deny the indebtedness, by reason of a finding in favor of a traverse to his answer. Still he is not to be required to pay to the plaintiff the money actually or constructively admitted or found to be due to the defendant until the plaintiff submits a judgment against the defendant, valid against the latter and sufficient to protect the garnishee from the subsequent demand of the defendant against the garnishee for the same fund. Until the garnishee has actually or constructively admitted the indebtedness, or a finding has been rendered against him estopping him from denying the indebtedness, and final judgment is about to be entered against him, the garnishee has no interest in the question whether the plaintiff has a valid judgment against the defendant or not; but then, though not till then, it is his right and duty to inquire into the validity of the alleged judgment against the defendant, on which the final judgment against the garnishee must necessarily rest. Merchants' Bank v. Haiman, 80 Ga. 624, 5 S. E. 795. See, also, Fagan v. Jackson, 1 Ga. App. 24, 57 S. E. 1052.

Judgment reversed.

1. SALES—WARRANTIES—CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION.

In the case of an express warranty that the property sold will be of a particular kind and quality, the purchaser has a right to rely on the warranty, and may plead partial failure of consideration, growing out of defects discovered after acceptance, even though such defects would have become apparent upon an examination before delivery. Cook v. Finch, 44 S. E. 95, 117 Ga. 541. And partial payments, with knowledge of the defective condition, will not estop the buyer from pleading partial failure of consideration. Moultrie Repair Co. v. Hill, 48 S. E. 143, 120 Ga. 731.

2. SAME—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE.

The defendant having pleaded and relied upon an express warranty and partial failure of consideration, evidence tending to show that the article sold was defective in certain particulars covered by the express warranty was properly admitted; and, the jury having sustained the defendant's plea, their verdict will not be disturbed.

3. SAME.

The fact that "the vendee accepted delivery of inferior box board, and, with knowledge of its inferiority, caused it to be made into boxes," and for that reason "the vendor would not be answerable in damages for loss accruing from making the box board into boxes," has no application in a case where recoupment is not pleaded nor damages asked. While, as a general rule, a vendee cannot complain, after acceptance of an article with knowledge of its defective condition, that it is inferior to the quality contracted for, yet where the seller, upon complaint made by the buyer, expressly authorized the vendee to use the article (box board), admitting that it was not up to warranty, and leaving the entire matter in the hands of the vendee, and, after knowledge that the vendee claimed that the goods were of an inferior quality, accepted a payment on the goods sold, such a state of facts presents an exception to the general rule.

Complaint cannot be made that evidence is too vague, uncertain, and indefinite to authorize a verdict, when such evidence corresponds in nature, statement, and definiteness with the pleadings, unless attention has been called thereto by demurrer to the pleadings or objection at the trial to the evidence. A case is sustained when the proof fits the plea.

AGER v. STATE. (No. 482.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 19, 1907.)

1. INDICTMENT—MATTERS TO BE PROVED—SURPLUSAGE—CRIMINAL LAW—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The name "Americus Furniture & Undertaking Company" connotes a corporation. An allegation, in a criminal accusation, that this company is a corporation, is surplusage, and need not be proved. The admission of secondary evidence tending to prove such allegation is therefore harmless error, where the corporate entity has not been put in issue. Crawford v. State, 68 Ga. 822; *Mattox v. 2. FALSE PRETENSES—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a case of cheating and swindling, to give in charge to the jury section 31 of the Penal Code of 1895, without more, is not sufficient compliance with a written request to charge that "intention is an essential ingredient, and it must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, and before you will be authorized to convict it must appear that it was the intention of the defendant at the time to cheat and defraud the prosecutor." *Crawford v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. FLYNT. (No. 245.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 20, 1907.)

1. RAILROADS—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON ADJACENT HIGHWAYS.

The statute requiring the blowing of the whistle or the ringing of the bell and the checking of the speed of the train when approaching a public crossing is not applicable when the injury occurred elsewhere than at a public crossing. The statute is for the protection of those on the crossing, approaching with the intention to use it, or who have just passed over the crossing.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, § 1260.]

2. SAME—VIOLATION OF RULE OF RAILROAD—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

The violation of a rule of the company in the operation of its trains is not actionable negligence, unless such violation was the proximate cause of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, § 1390.]

3. SAME—DUTY OF RAILROAD.

Relatively to travelers on adjacent highways, when the crossing law is not applicable, railroad companies are under no duty to regulate the speed of their trains to prevent horses from becoming frightened at the sight of the moving train, or the noise produced thereby, and are not liable for injuries resulting from horses becoming frightened on highways at the mere sight of its trains, or the noises usually and necessarily incident to the running of the trains.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, §§ 1260, 1271.]

4. SAME.

Railroad companies are not required, where the crossing law does not apply, to give any warning signal to travelers upon adjacent highways of the approach of the train; nor are they required to keep any lookout for such travelers. The probability of horses becoming frightened on public roads near to railroad tracks by the running of trains, which may result in injury, is a risk which the traveler on the road assumes, and is one for which the railroad company is not responsible, unless caused by the negligent conduct of its employees in operating the train in an unusual and unnecessary manner.

5. SAME.

The duty to give warning signals, and to keep a lookout is limited to persons on the track, or that apparently may get on the track. No such duty is required as to travelers on adjacent and parallel highways.

6. SAME.

Where those in charge of the running train see apparent danger to persons on the highway, it then becomes their duty to use reasonable and practicable care to prevent injury.

7. SAME.

"Injuries resulting from the frightening of a horse by the appearance of moving railway cars, trains, or locomotives, or the usual noises or incidents of their ordinary operation, are damnum absque injuria."

8. SAME.

Applying the foregoing principles of law to the petition and the amendments thereto, there was no actionable negligence alleged, and the general demurrer to the petition as amended should have been sustained.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Forsyth; W. M. Clark, Judge.

Action by J. W. Flynt against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Arthur Heyman and Cabaniss & Willingham, for plaintiff in error. Smith, Berner, Smith & Hastings, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. J. W. Flynt brought suit against the Southern Railway Company to recover damages for the loss of the services of his wife. In his original petition he alleged the following facts: On December 29, 1904, he and his wife were riding in a buggy along a public street in the town of Culloden. The street crossed the track of the defendant, and, after crossing the track, ran for some distance parallel to the same. As petitioner drove his buggy up to said crossing, he stopped and listened for the train, heard none, and drove over the crossing. If any warning had been given by the ringing of the bell or the blowing of the whistle, he would not have driven upon and over said crossing until the train had passed. While the buggy in which he and his wife were riding was near the track of the defendant, and the horse was turning into the street, a freight train approached the crossing at a rapid rate of speed without ringing the bell, or blowing the whistle, or giving any other warning, thereby frightening the horse and causing him to become unmanageable. The horse ran a short distance from the track, and then began backing towards the track, and his wife, fearing that he would back onto the track and into the train, and cause her death, jumped from the buggy to the ground. He alleges, further, that the defendant failed to check and keep checking the speed of said train as it approached the crossing, and failed to ring the bell or blow the whistle, all of which he alleges was negligence; that because of the situation of the public street and the railroad at said place, it was one in which horses and animals would be frightened at the approach of trains, and the defendant knew this, or would have known it by the exercise of reasonable care, and in the exercise of reasonable care should have blown the whistle or rung the bell as the train approached said place, and the failure to ring the bell or blow the whistle as it approached said place was negligence. Each and all of said negligence, it is alleged, caused the injury to plaintiff's wife. The petition fully sets forth the character of her injuries, her age, the value of her services, and doctors' bills. To this petition the defendant demurred generally, on the ground that the petition "does not set forth any cause of action," the demurrer setting forth specifically wherein the petition fails to set forth any cause of action, and demurred specially on the ground that the petition failed to set forth with sufficient particularity the rate of speed which was complained of.

To meet this demurrer the plaintiff amended his declaration as follows: The train was running over the crossing at a rate of 10 or 15 miles an hour. Plaintiff and his wife were riding in his buggy about dark. On their approach to the town of Culloden they crossed the track of the railroad company and turned into a public road which ran parallel with the track for several hundred yards, down to another public crossing just north of the depot of the defendant. The track and the public road were close to each other. Looking down this road to the depot of the defendant, a person would be unable in the nighttime and at the hour in which they were traveling to determine whether the train was moving at all, and, if moving, whether it was moving from or towards him; the inability to determine this fact being due to the straightness of the road and the track with reference to the depot. The place on the public road at which the injury occurred was near the public crossing within the city limits. In view of this fact, and the locality of the public road with reference to the track, it was the duty of the company to operate its trains, especially after dark, with such care and diligence, and to have its trains under such control, that they could be stopped at any time in the event travelers along the road were being endangered by their operation, and failure to exercise this care and diligence in this particular case brought about said injuries, for which the defendant is liable. It is a rule of the defendant that, "when cars are pushed by an engine (except when shifting and making up trains in the yards), a white light must be displayed on the front of the leading car at night." The train which caused the injury was being pushed back by the engine, and there was no light of any character upon the front of the rear car to put the defendant upon notice that the train was moving in his direction, so that he could be upon his guard and get out of the buggy, or otherwise avoid the danger of the train, and this failure to comply with said rule was negligence. It was the duty of the defendant, in the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, when it undertook to operate its trains from the depot back towards Atlanta and over the public crossing near the depot, and along the highway over which the petitioner and his wife were traveling, to have a flagman or other employé on the end of the rear coach, so as to detect any danger to travelers over said road and avoid injuries to them. This was especially true in view of the fact that there was a public crossing over said railroad track; and in any view it was the duty of the company, in operating its trains after night, pushing them back, to have rung the bell, blown the whistle, or to have had a light upon the rear end of the said car, or an employé thereon to detect the danger to travelers and avoid injuries to them. Failure to have said light or said employé on the end of said car, or to ring the bell, or to blow the whistle, was negligence, for which the defendant was liable in the event of injury resulting.

Although it is alleged that the train approached a public crossing at an illegal and rapid rate of speed, without checking the speed, or blowing the whistle, or ringing the bell, it is clear, from the allegations of the petition as amended, that a violation of the requirements of the public crossing law is not relied upon as a ground of recovery. This law is made only for the protection of travelers at or near the crossing, and in this case it is alleged that the plaintiff had left the crossing and was in the public road running parallel with the railroad down to the crossing near the depot. Indeed, the crossing over which the plaintiff had driven was not the crossing which it is alleged the defendant approached and ran across without complying with the law. This was the crossing nearer the depot, and it is not alleged that the plaintiff intended to use this crossing. On the contrary, it is apparent that he did not so intend. It is stated by the learned and eloquent attorney for the defendant in error that "the plaintiff put his right to recover, not upon the violation of the statute with reference to public crossings, either within or without the limits of a town, but upon the failure of the defendant to exercise reasonable care and diligence in the operation of its trains after dark, and at the particular place described in the petition and the amendments thereto." At this time and place, the acts of omission and commission relied upon as constituting negligence may be succinctly summarized as follows: (1) A failure to comply with a rule of the company requiring a white light on the front of the rear car of a backing train. (2) The illegal and rapid rate of speed of the backing train, which frightened the horse. (3) The failure of the company to warn the plaintiff that the train was approaching on the track near the parallel highway over which he was traveling with his wife; the time being at night, and the plaintiff not being able to discern, on account of the straightness of the track and its parallel relation to the highway from where he was to the depot where the train was, whether it was moving from or towards him, and the place where plaintiff was driving being on a public road in a town, near to the track, and over which it was to be reasonably expected that numbers of people would be traveling. For these reasons it is alleged that ordinary diligence required the defendant to run its trains slowly, to use the white light at the front of the rear car of the backing train, and to give warning signals and keep a lookout for people who might be on this nearby parallel public road.

Do these allegations set forth a cause of action against the defendant company? The test of liability is the existence of some duty, and the proof of liability is the breach of this duty, and both the duty and the breach must be alleged and proved by the plaintiff. Failure to discharge a duty to the plaintiff, and resulting injury to him, are indispensable elements of actionable negligence. As Mr. Justice Lumpkin expresses it: "Relatively to one to whom no diligence whatever is due, there can, in legal contemplation, be no negligence at all in causing him a personal injury, and the measure of the diligence due by a railroad company to any person is a relative one, and what is or is not due diligence must be arrived at in every case with reference to the surrounding circumstances and the relation which, for the time being, the company and the person in question occupied towards each other." Holland v. Sparks, 92 Ga. 753, 756, 18 S. E. 990, 991. So the fundamental question in this case is: What duty of diligence did the company owe to the plaintiff at the time and place of the injury? This question must be resolved solely from the allegations of the petition. It is alleged that the company was negligent, in that it violated the following rule of the company: "When cars are pushed by an engine (except when shifting or making up trains in the yards), a white light must be displayed on the front of the leading car at night." It is claimed that the violation of this rule was negligence as to the plaintiff, because the failure to use the white light on the front of the rear car of the backing train prevented him from discovering that the train was backing towards him, so that he could have been upon his guard and gotten out of the buggy and avoided the danger. It is not alleged that the rule was applicable to the facts of the case, or that the cars pushed by the engine were not within the exception to the rule. Indeed, it is fairly inferable from the petition that the engine was shifting the cars and making up the train at or near the depot. Besides, it is distinctly alleged that the proximate cause of the injury was the fright of the horse, and that the horse became frightened at the rapid rate of speed of the train. The failure to have the light was, therefore, not negligence causing the injury, if negligence at all. The allegation that the light would have enabled the plaintiff to avoid the injury is remote and conjectural.

It is next alleged that the "train approached said crossing at a rapid rate of speed, without ringing the bell, or blowing the whistle, or giving any warning, thereby frightening the horse and causing him to become unmanageable." Eliminating from this statement any applicability to the public crossing statute, in accordance with the allegations of the petition as amended and the declaration of counsel for defendant in error, and we have the situation presented, upon which negligence is based, of a traveler on a public highway, near the railroad, whose horse is frightened by the rapid speed of the train. Of course, the negative statement that this illegal and rapid speed was unaccompanied by the blowing of the whistle or the ringing of the bell was not intended as matter of aggravation. The failure to do these things, reasonably considered, diminished the peril of the situation. Therefore the only pertinent and illustrative allegation of negligence is the rapid rate of speed of the train, which frightened the horse on the adjacent highway. An allegation of negligence in respect to the speed of the train can only be material where the law imposes some duty upon the railroad company to regulate its speed in reference to the place where the train is operated. There is no allegation here that the speed of the train was contrary to any public law, state or municipal. As to a traveler on a highway who did not intend to cross the track, there was no duty imposed upon the railroad company as to the speed of the train. There is no allegation of any unusual and unnecessary noise caused by the running of the train; and, so far as this court is advised, the railroad company had the right to run its train on its track at the time and place and with reference to the traveler on the highway, regardless of speed.

The allegation "that the close proximity of the train and the rapid and illegal rate of speed at which it was running made it impossible for the plaintiff or his wife to get out of the buggy in time to avoid injury" does not alter the case. It would be impossible for a railroad company to run its trains in such a manner as to allow travelers on an adjacent highway to get out of vehicles, if horses indicated fright at the approach of trains, and the law does not impose upon railroad companies such an onerous burden or impracticable duty. Fright of horses caused by running trains is one of the necessary risks which travelers on the highways take. Injuries resulting from horses becoming frightened by the appearance of railway cars, trains, or locomotives, or the usual noise incident to its ordinary operation, are damnum absque injuria. Dewey v. Chicago N. & St. P. Ry. Co., 75 N. W. 74, 99 Wis. 455. "A railroad company is not liable for injuries resulting from horses becoming frightened on the highways at the mere sight of its trains or the noises necessarily incident to the running of trains or the operation of the road." 3 Elliott on Railroads, § 1264; 2 Thompson on Negligence, § 1908.

The plaintiff alleges that on account of the location of the track with reference to the public road, and the impossibility for himself or his wife to look down towards the depot, where the train was standing or being operated, and to tell whether it was moving towards them, it was the duty of the company, in operating at this point and along this track, to use such care and diligence that its employees would be able to stop the train, if at any time it should appear that travelers and teams were in danger by the operation of its trains, and that such care and diligence required that a railroad company should notify the travelers on the highway of the approach, either by a light, or the ringing of the bell, or having an employé on the front end of the rear car, for the purpose of detecting danger to travelers and avoiding injury to them. In our opinion railroad companies owe no such degree of diligence to travelers on adjacent highways. The railroad companies have as much right to use their tracks as travelers have to use the highway. It is the duty of travelers on adjacent and nearby public roads to keep a lookout for approaching trains, and to guard against injuries resulting from horses becoming frightened. The traveler is in a much better position to prevent dangerous consequences from frightened horses than the railroads are to prevent the fright of horses. That horses on highways will become frightened at the cars cannot be foreseen or prevented by those in charge of running trains. Travelers have such knowledge and such power in the exercise of proper diligence. The law simply imposes upon railroad companies the duty of operating trains relatively to adjacent highways so as not unnecessarily to interfere with the rights of individuals traveling such highways, or to endanger such travelers by unusual and unnecessary noises. The duty of keeping a lookout and of giving warning is limited to the track and the public crossing. It does not extend to travelers on adjacent highways. "A statute which requires railroad companies to give a warning signal of the approach of trains to their crossings of the road or street imposes no duty to give such warning to those who have not lately used, who are not using, and who do not intend to use the crossing, and such parties cannot recover of railroad companies for a failure to give the warning. This record does not tend to prove any negligence on the part of the railroad company. The fact that it failed to give the statutory signal for a crossing is the only evidence of its negligence. It owed no duty to ring its bell or sound its whistle because the plaintiff was driving along the public road, unless that duty was imposed upon it by this statute. In the absence of a statute, it has as much right to use its railroad for its trains, without notice to the plaintiff, as the plaintiff had to use the public road without notice to it." Reynolds v. Great Northern Ry. Co. (C. C. A., 8th Circuit) 69 Fed. 808, 16 C. C. A. 435, 29 L. R. A. 695. "The railway company owes to a workman in an adjacent field, to a domestic in a neighboring house, or to a traveler on a parallel road, who has not crossed and does not intend to cross or enter upon the railroad, no duty to signal the approach of its train." 69 Fed. 808, 16 C. C. A. 435, 29 L. R. A. 695; Carrington v. L. & N. Ry. Co., 6 South. 910, 88 Ala. 472. It is well settled that no negligence can be imputed to a railroad for failure to give warning of approaching trains by reason of the close proximity and paralleling of its right of way to the public thoroughfare. Favor v. Boston & Lowell R. Corp., 114 Mass. 350, 19 Am. Rep. 364; Melton v. St. Louis Ry. Co., 73 S. W. 232, 99 Mo. App. 282; Bailey v. Hartford R. Co., 16 Atl. 234, 56 Conn. 444; Lamb v. Old Colony R. Co., 2 N. E. 932, 140 Mass. 79, 54 Am. Rep. 449.

While we do not think the law imposes upon railroad companies the duty of keeping a lookout or of giving warning to travelers on an adjacent highway of the approach of trains, yet, when danger to such traveler is discovered, it then becomes a duty to use care to avert an injury, such care as the then situation would make it practical and possible for the railroad in the proper conduct of its business to use. L. & N. R. Co. v. Smith, 53 S. W. 269, 107 Ky. 178; Lamb v. R. Co., 140 Mass. 79, 2 N. E. 932, 54 Am. Rep. 449; Ala. Great Southern Ry. Co. v. Fulton, 144 Ala. 332, 39 South. 282; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Schmidt, 134 Ind. 16, 33 N. E. 774. In the case now under consideration, the sole allegation of negligence causing the injury is that the running of the train at such a rapid rate of speed caused the fright of the horse. It has been repeatedly held, not only by the Supreme Court of this state, but in many other jurisdictions, that railway companies were not liable for the fright of horses, and injuries resulting therefrom, caused by the running of engines, cars, or trains, unless such running was accompanied by unusual and unnecessary noises. The uniform ruling of the courts on this question is tersely expressed by the decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Yingst v. Lebanon Street Ry. Co., 31 Atl. 687, 167 Pa. 438: "As the right of the defendant company to run its cars on its track is fully equal to the right of the plaintiff to ride in a wagon on the street, the mere fact that the horse took fright at the sight of the cars confers no right of action whatever against the defendant." And in the case of Douglas v. Railway Co., 88 Ga. 282, 14 S. E. 616, the Supreme Court says: "Where the proximate cause of an injury received by a person from a plunging horse, which took fright at an approaching train, was the noise made by the emission of steam by the engine of the train, the railroad company will not be liable in damages to the person so injured, unless it appears that the noise was unusual or unnecessary at the time when and the place where it was made."

We therefore hold that the allegations of the petition as amended did not set out any facts indicating that the railroad company was chargeable with actionable negligence causing the injury to the plaintiff's wife, and the court should have sustained the demurrer.

Judgment reversed.

ROBERTS v. DOCKINS (two cases). (Nos. 321, 322.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 20, 1907.)

1. WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW.

In case No. 321, the pleadings and evidence contained in the record do not warrant the verdict rendered.

2. SAME.

In case No. 322, the pleadings and evidence do warrant the verdict, and no error appears.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Rabun County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Two actions between T. G. Roberts and A. M. Dockins. From the judgment in each case, Roberts brings error. Judgment as to one case affirmed, and as to the other reversed.

J. R. Grant, J. C. Edwards, and McMillan & Erwin, for plaintiff in error. W. S. Paris, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The two actions were commenced in the justice's court and came to the superior court by appeal. The original summonses were identical; both being in the usual form and requiring the defendant to appear to answer a complaint "In an action upon two promissory notes dated December 25, 1894, for $50 principal each, a copy of which said notes is hereto attached." Each summons had attached, without explanation, not two notes, but four notes, for $50 each, all dated December 25, 1894, and maturing consecutively on the 25th day of December of each of the years from 1896 to 1899, inclusive. Certain identical small credits, aggregating less than $50, were entered after the copies of the notes in each case. In case No. 322, in the superior court, the plaintiff made an amendment to his summons, and therein stated that the two notes sued on in this case were the notes maturing in the years 1898 and 1899; but the clerk certifies that no amendment was filed in case No. 321, though in the bill of exceptions an amendment to the summons is specified as a part of the record. It appears from a note by the trial judge attached to the brief of the evidence that all of these notes were written on one sheet of paper and constituted one transaction, and were all introduced in evidence in both cases. In case No. 321, in the brief of the evidence, is the following explanation: "Plaintiff's attorney stated that they were only suing on the note maturing December 25, 1899, and that the other three were only offered to show the land transaction—three being on the same sheet of paper." In case No. 322, in the brief of the evidence, the same language appears, except that the words "December 25, 1898," are used instead of the words "December 25, 1899." The only evidence introduced was the four notes. In case No. 321 the court directed a verdict for $71.26; in case No. 322, for $100. There are in the record several assignments of error; but, except as herein indicated, none of them are meritorious.

1. In case No. 321, since four notes were attached to the summons, and there was nothing in the pleadings to identify which two were being sued upon, the court erred in directing a verdict for the sum of $71.26, especially so in the light of the fact that, although all four of the notes were introduced, only one of them, according to statement of plaintiff's counsel, was relied upon. We might, in order to give a reasonable intend-ment to the action of the court, disregard the statement of counsel; but, if we do so, there is nothing in the record by which the verdict can be supported. A single note would not justify the amount found. All four of the notes would prove a case for more than $100, which would be beyond jurisdiction of the court; the case being an appeal.

2. In case No. 322 the amendment did identify the two notes sued on; and, since these two notes were in evidence, we sustain the action of the court in this case.

In case No. 321, judgment reversed; in case No. 322, judgment affirmed.

E. VAN WINKLE GIN & MACHINE WORKS v. PITTMAN et al.
(No. 318.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 4, 1907.)

1. TRIAL—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE.

The right to open and conclude in a jury trial is of great importance; and the plaintiff should not be deprived of this right, unless the defendant, in his pleadings, before the introduction of any testimony by the plaintiff, admits facts authorizing, without further proof, a verdict in the plaintiff's favor for the full amount claimed in the declaration.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 47.]

2. SAME.

Oral admissions by the defendant are not sufficient to entitle him to the opening and conclusion. Admissions for that purpose must be made in his pleadings.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 50.]

3. SAME.

In a suit by a corporation, as such, on a promissory note which contains a provision for attorney's fees, and alleging written notice of intention to sue, as required by law, an admission in the answer, limited to the execution of the note, accompanied with a denial of the allegation as to notice of intention to sue, is not sufficient to entitle the defendant to open and conclude the argument.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Jefferson; W. W. Stark, Judge.

Action by the E. Van Winkle Gin & Machine Works against W. C. Pittman and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

J. S. Ayers and Ellis, Wimblish & Ellis, for plaintiff in error. John B. Gamble and Shackelford & Shackelford, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. This was a suit on a promissory note. The petition alleged that the plaintiff was a corporation, that the defendants were jointly and severally indebted to it in the amount of the note made and delivered to it by the defendants, and that written notice had been duly served on the defendants of an intention to sue. The defendants filed a joint answer. They denied that plaintiff was a corporation under the laws of Georgia. They denied that any written notice was served on them as required by law of an intention to sue. They admitted the execution of the note sued on. They further answered that they had paid $100 on the note, which had not been credited to them. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount which the defendants admitted in their answer was due on the note. The plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, and the court overruled the motion. On the trial of the case, when counsel for plaintiff had opened the case and tendered in evidence the note sued on, the attorneys for the defendants stated orally that the defendants would admit a prima facie case, and asked that they be allowed the opening and conclusion. Over the objection of the plaintiff, the court permitted the defendants to assume the burden and open and conclude the argument before the jury. The plaintiff excepts to this ruling, because it deprived the plaintiff of its legal right, and was contrary to law and the rules of the court. Besides the general grounds, it assigns several errors in the admission of testimony. We think it only necessary to review the ruling allowing to the defendants the right to open and conclude the case.

1, 2. The Supreme Court has frequently held that the right to open and conclude in a jury trial is an important right, and that an improper denial will work a reversal. Buchanan v. McDonald, 40 Ga. 288; Chapman v. Atlanta & West Point Railroad, 74 Ga. 548; Fisher v. Jones Co., 108 Ga. 490, 34 S. E. 172. This right is most valuable when the questions in the case are largely dependent upon the facts, and the opinion which the jury may entertain of conflicting evidence. Of course, the general rule is that this right belongs to the plaintiff; and before the defendant will be entitled to open and conclude the argument he must in his pleadings admit enough to make out a prima facie case for the plaintiff. In other words the pleadings of the defendant must contain admissions sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to a verdict for the full amount sued for. Admissions made by the defendant for the purpose of gaining the advantage of opening and concluding must be in his pleadings, and not merely oral. Du Bignon v. Wright, 122 Ga. 263, 50 S. E. 65; Dorough v. Johnson, 108 Ga. 812, 34 S. E. 168. The foregoing being well settled as rules of law, does the admission contained in the answer of the defendants measure up to the requirements? This is a suit on a promissory note. The admission in the answer is: "Defendants admit the execution of the note sued on." "The defendant in an action upon a promissory note payable to the plaintiff or bearer is entitled to open and conclude, when by his plea he admits the execution of the note sued on and that the plaintiff is the legal holder of the same." Levens v. Smith, 102 Ga. 480, 31 S. E. 104.

3. It is insisted that the admission in the answer as to the execution of the note sued on was not sufficient, in that it failed to admit that the plaintiff was the legal holder of the same, and as such entitled to bring the suit, and that the denial of the allegation of corporate existence made it necessary for the plaintiff to prove that fact. The plaintiff is the payee named in the note. Its name imports a corporation, even if there was no such allegation. A presumption of corporate existence was thus raised and the burden was cast on the defendants to prove affirmatively that no such corporation existed. The admission, aided by this presumption, was sufficient on this part of the plaintiff's case. Besides, we cannot see how the corporate existence of the plaintiff was at all material to the defendants. They admitted the execution of the note. The suit was brought by the payee against the makers, and whether such payee was a corporation or a partnership was wholly inconsequential. But the plaintiff, according to the terms of the note, also sued for attorney's fees, and alleged that written notice of intention to sue had been properly given the defendants. This allegation was denied in the answer, which made it incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove it in order to recover attorney's fees. "To entitle the defendant in a civil action arising ex contractu to the opening and conclusion of the argument by virtue of the admission that the plaintiff has a prima facie right to recover, the defendant must, before the introduction of any evidence, admit facts authorizing, without further proof, a verdict in the plaintiff's favor for the full amount claimed in the declaration." Abel v. Jarratt, 100 Ga. 732, 28 S. E. 453; Phoenix Insurance Co. v. Gray, 113 Ga. 432, 38 S. E. 992. We are clear that the admission made by the defendants, for the reasons stated, was not sufficient to entitle them to the right to open and conclude the case, and that the trial court erred in permitting them to do so.

The other grounds in the motion for a new trial, as corrected and verified, are without merit.

WORTH COUNTY v. SYKES. (No. 348.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 20, 1907.)

COUNTIES — OFFICERS — COMPENSATION — COUNTY TREASURER — COMMISSIONS.

A county is not liable to the county treasurer for commissions upon a fund which he never handled, and which was raised by private donation and deposited with the ordinary, with the conditions imposed that the ordinary should personally disburse it in buying a lot and in paying other expenses in the erection of a public building for the county, and that he should not pay it into the county treasury.

Action by B. F. Sykes against Worth county. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. H. Tipton, for plaintiff in error. Polhill & Foy, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. To influence the removal of the county seat of Worth county from Isabella to Sylvester, citizens of the latter community agreed in public advertisement to erect a new courthouse and a jail in the event of such removal, and as a guaranty of good faith deposited with the ordinary of the county certified checks for $10,000. The removal was duly authorized. Afterwards the ordinary, acting for the county, decided that it would be wise to erect buildings more commodious than those originally planned and costing more than $10,000. It was thereupon agreed between the ordinary and the committee representing the citizens of Sylvester that out of the fund deposited the ordinary should buy lots for the courthouse and the jail, and use the remainder in paying, as far as it would go, other necessary expenses incident to removing the old offices and erecting the new buildings; but it was stipulated, in order to avoid charges for handling the fund, that the same should be disbursed by the ordinary directly, and should not be handled through the county treasury. There was a condition in the original offer that all expenses of an election contest should first be paid out of the sum above mentioned; and these expenses, amounting to $1,310, were retained before the money was turned over to the ordinary. Out of the fund which went into his hands the ordinary bought lots for the courthouse and the jail, and used the remainder of the money, with the exception of about $2,000, in paying the architect's fee and similar bills. Before the sum of $2,000, just referred to, was expended, the ordinary decided to remove from the county; and, with the consent of the committee, he paid that amount into the county treasury. After the funds came into the hands of the ordinary, the county treasurer demanded that they be paid into the treasury. Except to the extent indicated above, this demand was refused. Thereupon the treasurer sued for his commissions on the money and recovered judgment for commissions on the full amount, less the sum retained for expenses of the contest and the $2,000 which had been paid over to him.

In the argument of the case many nice questions were ably presented. We do not deem it necessary to enter at length upon a discussion of them; for, after full consideration of them all, we think that the case finally turns upon the points herein decided. While by Pol. Code 1895, § 458, "all county funds are to be paid to and disbursed by the county treasurer, except such as may be specifically excepted by law, and then to be collected and disbursed as specially directed," and while by Pol. Code 1895, § 460, it is the duty of that officer "to diligently collect from all officers and others all county dues," yet we do not think that the fund in controversy was a county fund in the sense used in the statute; nor do we think that the treasurer had the right to demand of the ordinary custody of the same. We concede that the citizens of Sylvester might have made a donation of money to the county funds of the county (indeed, such seems to have been the result when, with their consent, the ordinary paid the $2,000 into the county treasury); and in that event such money would pass beyond the control of the donors and become subject to the sole control of the county authorities. On the other hand, there was no obstacle to prevent their making a donation on the condition that the money should not become county funds, but should be so invested that it should pass into the custody of the county in the shape of property, and not of cash. The ordinary did not hold the money in this case as the agent of the county as a corporation, but as the agent of the donors; the fund possibly being impressed with an implied trust in favor of the citizens of the county, who are in legal contemplation a different entity from the county as a corporation. Compare Justices v. Plank Road Co., 9 Ga. 485, 486. The treasurer could not have successfully demanded this fund from the committee of citizens; nor did he have the right to demand it from their agent, the ordinary, although this agency may have been lodged in the same person in whom officially was vested jurisdiction in county matters. If he had demanded the fund of the ordinary, it would have been a complete reply on the latter's part that he had been forbidden to deliver it by the very terms of the conditions on which it came into his hands. Unless the treasurer had a right to demand the fund, his claim to commissions must be unsuccessful. Wood v. Commissioners of Greene County, 60 Ga. 556; City of Baxley v. Holton, 114 Ga. 724, 40 S. E. 728; Board of Roads and Revenues v. Clark, 117 Ga. 291, 43 S. E. 722. The county treasurer is not entitled to commissions on anything but money. His bond is not responsible for anything else. The county receives and takes other property without his intervention. The donation in this case, when it came finally into the custody of the county, came as property, not as cash; hence the claim for commissions should have been denied.

It is true that there is in the record an official order of the ordinary, sitting for county purposes, in which it is recited that he accepts the cash deposited with him in lieu of the former proposition of the citizens to erect the buildings; but other recitals in the same order restrict the meaning of the language so used, and it is clear from the parol proof that, even at the time of the passage of this order, the former agreement that the donation should come finally into the custody of the county in the form of specifics bought with the money, and not of cash, was never abrogated. The trial judge held that this parol evidence had no probative value; that it could not vary the recitals of the order. In this he erred. This order was not such a contract as created an estoppel against the truth being shown in variance or explanation thereof. Besides, the treasurer could not make this question, as he was not a party to the agreement. The ordinary could not make the county liable for commissions on a fund which he had not in fact received as a county fund, no matter how solemnly he may have asserted he had so received it. If the recitals of fact of the ordinary in his order are to be taken as meaning that he had received an unconditional donation in cash, in the light of the record such statement was not the truth of the transaction; and the treasurer must recover from the county upon the truth of the transaction, and not otherwise.

Judgment reversed.

EPPS v. STATE. (No. 457.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 19, 1907.)

1. JURY—PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES—NUMBER—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under the act establishing the city court of Jeffersonville, the defendant in criminal cases is given the right to seven peremptory challenges, and the state to five. Acts 1905, p. 248. Where, in the trial of a criminal case in that court, the defendant exercised this right and challenged peremptorily seven of the jurors, but the state challenged peremptorily only three jurors, there was no error in the judgment of the court in refusing to allow the defendant the two peremptory challenges which had been waived by the state. The contention that the defendant was entitled to the peremptory challenges which the state had not used, in addition to the seven allowed to him by law, is utterly without merit.

SOLOMON v. STATE. (No. 367.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 24, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—CONDUCT OF TRIAL—REMARKS OF JUDGE.

Taken in connection with the charge on the same subject, it is not error to state, in ruling upon the admissibility of testimony relative to dying declarations, that "the rule is this—the meaning of the law is this: That when a man feels like he is in a dying condition, and makes a statement, it has the same weight as if made under oath, upon the theory that a man in a dying condition would not misrepresent a fact."

2. HOMICIDE — INSTRUCTIONS — VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER—CRIMINAL LAW—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTIONS.

Under the evidence submitted, the law of voluntary manslaughter should have been given in charge to the jury, and the jury were properly instructed upon that subject by the trial judge. "Minor verbal inaccuracies in the charge, not calculated to mislead the jury, do not constrain the grant of a new trial." Moody v. State, 58 S. E. 262, 1 Ga. App. 772.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Homicide, § 655; vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 1438.]

3. NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—NATURE OF EVIDENCE DISCOVERED.

The ground of the motion for a new trial, predicated upon alleged newly discovered evidence, presents no reason for setting aside the verdict, and does not commend itself to favorable consideration. When the affidavits filed in connection with this ground are considered, no reason is afforded for believing that on another trial a different result would or should be obtained.

4. SAME—GROUNDS.

The numerous grounds of the motion for a new trial not specifically treated by the ruling above announced disclose no reason for reversing the judgment refusing a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Pulaski County; T. A. Parker, Judge.

Mark Solomon was convicted of manslaughter, and he brings error. Affirmed.

A. C. Pate, Marion Turner, and Shelby Myrick, for plaintiff in error. E. D. Graham, Sol. Gen., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. Mark Solomon was indicted for the offense of murder, and was convicted of the offense of manslaughter. After conviction, a motion for a new trial was made and was overruled, and the bill of exceptions assigns error upon the judgment refusing a new trial. As appears from the record, the defendant and one Oscar Newman had an altercation on the night of November 15, 1885, in which Newman was cut in the side, and Newman died three days later from the effects of the wound. They were returning home along the road after having called on some young girls. Newman was about 18 years of age; Solomon, perhaps a little younger. A dispute arose about an apple which Solomon or Newman had given to one of the young ladies that evening, both of them having given an apple to the same young girl. Four of the young men were going along the road together—Newman, Solomon, Henry Dixon, and J. T. Grimsley. Grimsley had given an apple to Newman, and he asked Newman what he did with the apple he gave him. Newman replied: "I gave it to my girl." The defendant remarked that a respectable girl would not take an apple from a young man. Newman then said: "Yes; I've given her baskets full." Solomon again said that no respectable young lady would take an apple from a young man. Newman said: "My sisters are respectable." Then Solomon said, "You must be a damn fool," and Newman struck Solomon across the shoulders with a walking cane. As he did so, Solomon made a back-handed lick, as they were walking side by side. As soon as the lick was made, Newman said: "Boys he has cut me." They were at the fence where Newman turned off to go through the field. Dixon and Grimsley went with Newman through the field. The defendant went on home. Newman had gone only a little way in the field before he had to lie down. Help was summoned from his home, and he was carried there. Newman said: "He has cut me." Solomon picked up a limb lying in the road, and drew it back and said: "If you haven't enough, I'll give you enough." The cane with which Newman struck Solomon was a little limber cane about the size of a finger. It was not a stick that one could kill another with. Newman lived three days and three nights. According to the witness Grimsley, Dixon and himself were walking together, and the defendant and the deceased were also walking together; but the evidence does not disclose which couple was ahead of the other. The first thing that attracted Grimsley's attention was that Solomon called Newman a "damn fool," and all stopped. The next thing that occurred was that Newman struck Solomon with a little walking cane, and the next was a back-hand lick from Solomon, and Newman's exclamation that he was cut. Grimsley did not see any knife. It was at night, and, though the moon was shining, it was cloudy. The state proved the dying statement of the deceased by Jesse Newman, his father. This statement was as follows: "You heard me and Dixon as we were going down to Mrs. Jesup's. You heard me shaking the apples off the trees. I gave one to one of the girls. On the return back home Mr. Solomon got in a dispute about it. He ran under me and cut me. As he cut me, I struck him with that little cane." The wound was in the abdomen of the deceased, about opposite the navel and about two inches long, ranging downwards. It did not go straight in. This is the case on the part of the state. The defendant's statement was, that the deceased struck him with a stick, and that he then reached down, took up a limb, and drew it back at the defendant, who was approaching him with a knife drawn, having pulled it from his left-hand pocket, and that he (Solomon) hit Newman over the head with the limb, and Newman ducked down, and as he went down he said, "I am cut," and then Newman got up, shut his knife up, and put it in his pocket. Solomon's contention about the knife was that, if Newman was cut, he cut himself. The defendant was indicted shortly after the killing, but for some reason not disclosed by the record he was not tried for more than 21 years. He moved for a new trial upon various grounds.

In the first assignment of error it is insisted that the judge erred in saying, in the presence of the jury, while ruling upon the admissibility of certain testimony relative to the dying declaration of Oscar Newman: "The rule is this—the meaning of the law is this: That when a man feels like he is in a dying condition, and makes a statement, it has the same weight as if made under oath, upon the theory that a man in a dying condition would not misrepresent a fact." It is insisted that this language contained an erroneous statement of the law as to the weight and effect of a dying declaration, and was calculated to impress the jury that the deceased would not misrepresent the facts of the difficulty which occurred between him and the defendant, and that the statement of the court amounted to an expression of opinion, in the presence of the jury, upon the evidence. We do not think that the assignment of error is well taken. The court correctly stated the reason underlying the admissibility of dying declarations. There was no expression or intimation of opinion as to what weight the jury should give the evidence, in saying that such statements are admitted "upon the theory that a man in a dying condition would not misrepresent a fact."

The second assignment of error complains that the court charged the law of voluntary manslaughter, and read to the jury, as a part of the charge on that subject, section 65 of the Penal Code of 1895. The plaintiff in error insists that the court, by reading the entire section, gave the jury the impression that voluntary and involuntary manslaughter were one and the same thing, and could have prevented the jury from bringing in a verdict of involuntary manslaughter; and the plaintiff in error insists, further, that the judge should not have charged upon the subject of voluntary manslaughter at all. This assignment is absolutely without merit. All the evidence in the case shows a sudden quarrel, and not to have charged upon the subject of voluntary manslaughter would have been manifest error. It would have been more proper to omit the definition of involuntary manslaughter, contained in section 65, as no view of the case rendered a charge upon involuntary manslaughter applicable; but the error, if any, was certainly harmless.

There is no merit in the third ground, in which exception is taken to the charge of the court.

The portions of the charge excepted to in the fourth, fifth, and sixth grounds of the amended motion are correct presentations of principles of law applicable to the facts of the case. The charge excepted to in the fourth ground was as follows: "If they [the facts and circumstances surrounding the case] were such as to excite the fears of a reasonable man that some bodily harm, less than a felony, was imminent, and the defendant killed the deceased under these circumstances, he would be guilty of voluntary manslaughter." The fifth ground complains of the following charge: "I charge you, further, that if you find that the difficulty between the defendant and the deceased was brought about by the defendant cursing the deceased, that the deceased thereupon struck him with a stick—a small stick—that the stick did not make a sufficient blow to be disproportionate to the insult given, and that thereupon the defendant stabbed and killed the deceased, he would be guilty of murder." The charge complained of in the sixth ground was given in connection with instructions upon the application of the rule of reasonable doubt, and, considered in connection with the rest of the charge, was beneficial, rather than hurtful, to the defendant. The language complained of was as follows: "If you are not satisfied of his guilt of the crime of murder, then consider, under the rules of law which I have given you in charge, as applied to the evidence, whether the defendant is guilty of voluntary manslaughter; and, if you are satisfied that he is, then it would be your duty to so find. The punishment for voluntary manslaughter is confinement in the penitentiary for not less than 1 nor more than 20 years. If you should not be satisfied to a moral and reasonable certainty, and beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant is guilty of the offense of murder, then you look to the law as given you in charge, and the testimony as you have heard it from the witness stand in the case, and see whether or not the defendant is guilty of the lesser offense of voluntary manslaughter; and if you find to a moral and reasonable certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that he is, then the form of the verdict would be: 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter.'" The error assigned as to these three extracts from the charge was that a charge upon the subject of voluntary manslaughter was not warranted by the evidence; and, as we have stated above, a consideration of the evidence satisfies us that there is no merit in these exceptions.

The seventh ground of exception is because the court charged the jury: "If you are satisfied of the guilt of either of these offenses, then the form of your verdict would be: 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty.'" Not to have instructed the jury as above quoted would have been error, and consequently there is no merit in the assignment of error.

The eighth ground of the motion relied upon the newly discovered evidence of R. S. Manning, as appears in two affidavits, both dated November 6, 1905, which are as follows: "Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, an officer of the said state authorized by law to administer oaths, R. S. Manning, who on oath says that he knew Oscar Newman before he died, and was at Oscar Newman's home on the Monday or Tuesday before the Wednesday on which Oscar Newman died; that at that time Oscar Newman told deponent that he (Oscar Newman) did not know whether Mark Solomon cut him, or whether he cut himself, as his knife was open in his pants pocket at the time of the difficulty with Solomon." The second affidavit was as follows: "Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, an officer of said state authorized by law to administer oaths, R. S. Manning, who on oath says that he knew Oscar Newman before Oscar Newman died, and was at his home Monday or Tuesday before he died on Wednesday. That deponent examined Oscar Newman's clothes, to see where the knife which caused the wound from which Newman died cut the clothes. Deponent says that there was a hole through the inside lining of Newman's pants pocket, which was directly over or covered the wound in his (Newman's) stomach, which caused his death; that there was no hole or cut in the outside cloth of the pants; that the pants showed no other cut except the one in the lining of the pocket; that the pants were the ones that Newman wore on Sunday, and were comparatively new."

Waiving the point that Judge A. C. Pate, one of defendant's counsel, as appears from the record, did not make the required affidavit, and that his partner could not swear that Judge Pate did not know of the facts therein contained, and for that reason the affidavit would not be admissible in evidence, we think that the ruling of the court was correct in refusing to grant a new trial because of the newly discovered evidence. In the first place there was conflict between the testimony of Manning and that presented by the state upon the hearing. Two witnesses swore that Manning was never at the home of Oscar Newman after the cutting, and had no opportunity to have any conversation with him or to see his pants, as he swears he did. This raised a question of veracity, and called for an exercise of discretion and choice on the part of the judge of the superior court, with which an appellate court could not interfere, and which it would not control, unless that discretion was manifestly abused. Furthermore, if there had been no contradiction of the affidavit of Manning by other witnesses, the physical facts testified to by all the witnesses, and not contradicted by Manning himself, sustain the judgment of the judge of the superior court in not granting a new trial upon the newly discovered evidence. All of the witnesses testified with reference to the wound that it was above the pants line, on the left-hand side of the abdomen, and ranged downward. For Manning's testimony to have any probative value, the wound would have had to range upward, if the hole which was discovered in the pants was caused by the same stroke as caused the death of young Newman. It is strange that, living in the same neighborhood with the parties to this case, Mr. Manning retained this information sacredly locked in his own conscience for 21 long years. But even now it could not produce a different result were another trial had; for, if it be submitted to the jury that Mr. Manning saw a hole in the pants pocket of the deceased, whether on the right or left hand side not disclosed, when all the testimony shows that the cut which caused the death of the deceased was above the pants line on the left-hand side, and ranged downward, it could not affect the case. The affidavit of Manning should have at least disclosed whether the pocket was the right-hand or the left-hand pocket. His testimony as to the statement by Oscar Newman comes under the rule that new trials will not be granted for newly discovered evidence merely impeaching in its character; for Mr. Manning does not claim to have seen the difficulty any more than did Mr. Newman, the father of the deceased. His testimony, therefore, would only be admissible as a contradictory statement made by the deceased, and for the purposes of discrediting the statement made to his father.

We find no error in the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial, and, being a court for the correction of errors only, we are constrained to affirm the judgment. The judgment must be predicated upon the record, and upon nothing else. But, in view of statements made in the argument, the truth of which we admit, we would, could we lawfully do so, award the plaintiff in error a new trial. It seems to us a proper case for the exercise of executive clemency; but we have no pardoning power.

Judgment affirmed.

WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW.

The assignments of error in this case are wholly without merit, and the finding of the court was fully warranted by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3855; vol. 43, Sales, § 486.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Nashville; H. B. Peeples, Judge, Action by Berry Brothers, Limited, against the G. V. Gress Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Hendricks, Smith & Christian, for plaintiff in error. Bule & Knight, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Berry Bros., Limited, brought suit against the G. V. Gress Company on an open account in the city court of Nashville. The case was tried by the court by consent of counsel without a jury, and judgment was entered for the plaintiff for the amount sued for. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and on this judgment error is assigned.

The motion for a new trial was based on the usual statutory grounds, and on the following grounds, set forth in an amendment to the motion: (1) In refusing to exclude the second and third direct interrogatories, and the answers thereto, of Orvi C. Lake, the only witness for the plaintiff; the objection being that the said interrogatories were leading. (2) Because the account sued upon was not sworn to by any person authorized to swear to it; it being sworn to by Henry W. Seyler, bookkeeper. (3) Because the account sued upon was not proved as required by law. (4) Because no delivery was ever shown by the plaintiff to any person or corporation for the defendant, or to the defendant itself.

The second interrogatory, objected to as leading, was as follows: "If, in answer to the first question, you state that you are credit manager for the plaintiff, then state what transactions plaintiff had with the defendant in the year 1904." We do not think this interrogatory was leading. Besides, the allowance of leading questions is a matter within the discretion of the trial judge, and his judgment will be reversed only where it is apparent that injustice has been done. Certainly this does not appear in the allowance of this question and answer. Georgia R. Co. v. Churchill, 118 Ga. 14, 38 S. E. 336; City of Rome v. Stewart, 116 Ga. 738, 42 S. E. 1011. The objection to the third interrogatory appears from the record not to have been made and filed with the interrogatories before the issuing of the commission. Civ. Code 1895, § 5668.

The petition in this case was strictly in accordance with the pleading act, and a bill of particulars containing each item of the account was made a part of the petition and sworn to by the bookkeeper of the plaintiff. It was not necessary to verify the petition, or any part thereof, suit having been brought in a court of record; and the defendant's filing an answer unverified shows that the petition was considered as an unverified one. The petition having fully set out the items of the account, it was only necessary on the trial to prove the items by competent testimony.

The account sued upon was clearly, accurately, and fully proved by the testimony of the credit man of the plaintiff, who testified positively from his own knowledge of the facts. It is not pointed out in this assignment of error in what manner or in what particular the account was not proved as required by law; and this court is not aware of any better way to prove a fact than by a witness who swears that of his own knowledge he knows the fact to be true. The credit man of the plaintiff swore positively and of his own knowledge that in the year 1904 the plaintiff sold and shipped to the defendant the goods as itemized and made a part of the petition. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, this would be sufficient proof of delivery.

We are constrained to say in this case that in our opinion the assignments of error are entirely without merit, and the finding of the judge was fully warranted by the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

WHITFIELD v. STATE. (No. 432.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 28, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARGE ON POSITIVE AND NEGATIVE TESTIMONY.

Where the state relied upon positive testimony as proof of the criminal act, and the defendant relied upon negative testimony to disprove such criminal act, it was error for the court to charge, without qualification, the rule for determining the relative value of positive and negative testimony as contained in Pen. Code 1895, § 985. In connection with the rule for weighing the testimony as embodied in this section, the court should also have instructed the jury to consider and pass upon the credibility of the witnesses.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

While it is not necessary that the person prosecuted for the act of selling should own the liquor, yet the question of ownership is one of the elements which the jury may look to in determining who made the sale; and in a prosecution for the unlawful sale of liquor, where the defense was that the defendant neither owned nor sold the liquor, it was error to instruct the jury that the title of the liquor alleged to have been sold was not a matter for them to consider.

3. SAME—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Apart from a minor error in the exclusion of testimony, no other error appears.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Greene F. Johnson, for plaintiff in error.
Doyle Campbell, Sol., for the State.

HILL, C. J. The defendant was indicted and convicted for selling without license spirituous, alcoholic, malt, and intoxicating liquors in Jasper county. The testimony against him was given by one witness, who swore that he bought four bottles of beer from him, paying therefor 50 cents; the beer being in the house where the defendant and several other negroes were drinking whisky and beer. The witness testified that the defendant told him, at the time he sold him the four bottles of beer, that it did not belong to him, but belonged to one John Glover. The defendant introduced two witnesses, who testified that they were present in the house at the same time with the witness for the state, and saw him get the four bottles of beer from the de-defendant, and heard him tell the witness for the state that the beer did not belong to him, but to one John Glover; that the beer was in a box which was marked "John Glover." Both these witnesses swore that, if the witness for the state paid the defendant any money for the beer, they did not see him do so, and they were present all the time. They also stated that they got some beer from the defendant on the same occasion, but paid him no money. The defendant further offered to prove by these two witnesses that they paid John Glover for the beer which they got from the defendant; but this testimony was excluded by the court. This was all the evidence in the case. The defendant stated that the beer did not belong to him, but that he had been asked to carry it to the house by the owner, John Glover, and that he did not sell any of the beer to the witness for the state, or to any one else, but that this witness and his witnesses took some bottles of beer out of the house.

1. The judge, in his charge, gave without qualification the rule embodied in Pen. Code 1895, § 985, as to the relative value of positive and negative testimony. While the facts presented a typical case for the application of this rule, the judge erred in not also giving, in connection therewith, the qualification that the jury, in weighing such testimony, should also consider and pass upon the question of the credibility of the witnesses. It has been repeatedly held by the Supreme Court, and by this court in the three recent cases of Wood v. State, 1 Ga. App. 684, 58 S. E. 271, Phillips v. State, 1 Ga. App. 687, 57 S. E. 1079, and Thomas v. State, Id., that section 985 of the Penal Code of 1895 should never be given in charge to the jury, except with the qualification above stated. "In weighing evidence its character as to being positive or negative is one element for consideration; but it is not the only one. Credibility is also essentially involved." Warick v. State, 125 Ga. 142, 53 S. E. 1031.

2. Error is also assigned on the following charge by the court: "I charge you that the question of the title of the beer alleged to have been sold is not a matter for you to consider." Of course, the defendant was guilty, if he sold the beer, whether it belonged to him or to some one else; but he contended, and introduced evidence in support of his contention, that the beer did not belong to him, and that he did not sell it at all, and the question of ownership might have been considered by the jury as a fact corroborating the defendant's statement and supporting his contention. It would not have been error for the court to instruct the jury that, if they believed that the defendant sold the beer or assisted in selling it, the question of ownership was immaterial; but we think the court went too far in charging, under the facts of this case, that the question of ownership was not a matter for them to consider at all.

3. We think the court erred in excluding the testimony of the two witnesses to the effect that each got beer at the same time and place that the witness for the state got his beer, but that they did not pay the defendant therefor, but did pay one John Glover. While the purchase of the beer by these two witnesses, and their payment for the same to John Glover, were, in a sense, a separate transaction from the one for which the defendant was tried, yet it did in some degree tend to establish the contention of the defendant that the beer did not belong to him, and that he was not selling it. The fact that these two witnesses got the beer at the same time and place as did the witness for the state, and did pay therefor the party whom the defendant claimed was the owner, was of probative value as corroborating his contention.

The other assignments of error we think are without merit; but, for the reasons stated, we think the court erred in refusing to grant the defendant a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

SHEFFIELD et al. v. JOHNSON COUNTY SAVINGS BANK. (No. 410.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 26, 1907.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES—INDORSEMENT—SUFFICIENCY—SEAL.

Writing and signature are necessary to the formal indorsement of a negotiable instrument; but no particular form of signature is necessary, any form adopted as such being sufficient. A seal is unnecessary to its sufficiency, whether it be that of a private person or of a corporation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, § 1829.]

2. SAME.

In a suit by the plaintiff as the transferee of a negotiable instrument, a written indorsement thereon, bearing as the signature only the corporate name of the payee, not accompanied by the name of the agent by whom affixed nor by the corporate seal, is nevertheless sufficient proof of the transfer, unless the indorsement be specifically denied on oath.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, § 1022.]

3. SAME—ACTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF ON SHOWING FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

While by common law and by general law, as recognized in most of the American states and possibly in this state, if the defendant in an action by the legal holder of a negotiable promissory note shows that the note was procured by fraud or duress, or that it is founded upon an illegal consideration or an original total lack of consideration, the burden of proving that he is a bona fide holder for value is cast upon the plaintiff, yet no such result follows from proof showing mere failure of consideration, total or partial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, § 1677.]

4. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The verdict directed in this case is larger in amount than the proof warrants.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Blakely; W. A. Jordan, Judge.

Action by the Johnson County Savings

Bank against R. H. Sheffield and others, administrators. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Pottle & Glessner and R. H. Sheffield, for plaintiffs in error. Bush & Stapleton and Oliver & Russell, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The plaintiff sued upon a negotiable promissory note made by the defendants' intestate, payable to the New England Jewelry Company. Upon the back of the note was an indorsement as follows: "March 2, 1903. For value received, we hereby sell and assign the within note to the Johnson County Savings Bank. New England Jewelry Co." The defendant pleaded, and attempted to prove, that the consideration of the note was jewelry, alleged to be good serviceable gold-plated and gold-filled jewelry, sold by the New England Jewelry Company to the defendants' intestate, whereas a lot of brass jewelry was delivered, worth only about one-fourth as much as the jewelry contracted for. There was no evidence of the circumstances under which the plaintiff's title to the note was acquired, except the written transfer set forth above. The court excluded the testimony offered by the defendants, showing that the jewelry was brass and worth only a small amount, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff.

1, 2. The plaintiffs in error concede that, if the plaintiff in the court below is to be conclusively considered as a bona fide holder for value, their defense was not available to defeat a recovery. They contend, however, that the indorsement on the note was prima facie insufficient; that the name New England Jewelry Company connotes a corporation; that a corporation can act only through an agent; that when no corporate seal is attached there is no presumption that the signature is genuine. This exact point was made in each of the following cases: Templeton v. Hayward, 65 Ill. 178; Walker v. Krebaum, 67 Ill. 252; Second National Bank v. Martin, 82 Iowa, 442, 48 N. W. 735. In all of them the contention is overruled. In speaking of a similar indorsement, the court in the case last cited says: "But, in our opinion, the signature of the indorser is sufficient as it appears. A little thought will make this plain. The name of the corporation written on the back of the instrument is in fact the signature of the indorser, just as it would be if it were shown that it was made by an officer of the corporation that signs it. It is the corporation that does the act by the officer; for it has not hands, and cannot write. When the name is found written upon the notes, it is known that it is intended as the indorsement in blank. If the name be written there by an officer having authority, it will bind the corporation, upon that fact being established, though the officer's name be not subscribed to, nor appears in, the instrument. It cannot be doubted that, had defendants raised an issue presenting the question whether the name of the corporation was written upon the notes, for the purpose of indorsing them, by the officer clothed with authority so to do, the plaintiff would have been permitted to present evidence supporting the indorsement, by showing the authority of the one making it and his intention to bind the corporation as an indorser. Now, as no such issue was raised by the defendants' answer, the sufficiency and validity of the indorsement stands as admitted in the case." See, also, 7 Cyc. 792; Habersham v. Lehman, 63 Ga. 380; Neal v. Gray, 124 Ga. 511 (3), 515, 52 S. E. 622; Tyson v. Bray, 117 Ga. 689, 45 S. E. 74. It is true that the signature, not purporting to be made by any particular agent authorized to act for the corporation and not being accompanied by the corporate seal, does not import its own authenticity; but the defendant, by not denying the indorsement under oath, conclusively admits its genuineness. Civ. Code 1895, § 3706. The case of Dodge v. American Freehold Mtg. Co., 109 Ga. 394, 34 S. E. 672 (2), relates to the method of proving the execution of an instrument not constructively and conclusively admitted to be genuine by a statutory rule of pleading, as is the case with this indorsement. The principles announced in the first two headnotes are now so well established by the current of authority as to admit of no serious question.

3. When a plaintiff introduces in evidence a negotiable promissory note duly assigned to him before maturity, the presumption immediately arises that he is a bona fide holder for value and is entitled to protection against equities and defenses which the maker might have against the original payee. At common law, if the defendant showed by his proof that the note was procured by fraud or duress, or that it was founded upon an illegal consideration or an original total lack of consideration, the burden was shifted to the plaintiff to show that he did in fact receive the note in ordinary course of trade, in good faith, for value, and without notice of the defenses; and this seems to be the rule recognized in most of the American states, and possibly in Georgia. See Norton on Bills and Notes, 243; 2 Greenleaf on Ev. (16th Ed.) § 172; Duncan v. Scott, 1 Camp. 99; Miller v. Race, 1 Burr. 452; 8 Cyc. 236-238. But "mere evidence of failure of consideration or partial failure of consideration is not sufficient to throw upon the holder the burden of proving that he obtained the paper in good faith." 8 Cyc. 239, and citations. The defendant's plea and tendered proof alleged and showed only a partial failure of consideration.

4. The note was payable in five equal installments, due serialim on the 20th day of the following months: January, April, July, and October, 1903, and January, 1904. It contained the following provision: "Any installment past due to draw 6 per cent. interest per annum. If not paid within ten days after due, the whole note to become due on the option of holder." The first installment appears to have been paid. Otherwise the plaintiff would have fallen within the purview of the latter portion of Civ. Code 1895, § 3695. The court directed a verdict for the aggregate principal of the four other installments, "with interest on that amount at 6 per cent. per annum from April 20, 1903." In this direction as to interest we find error. The installments bore no interest until after the maturity of each. The plaintiff had the option to declare the whole note due for a default in the payment of any installment; but it was not obliged to do so. The entire note did not ipso facto become due when the first installment became past due. It required affirmative action on the part of the holder to effectuate this result. The holder of the note might have preferred to retain it as a contract maturing in installments, with the privilege of suing each installment in a justice's court, rather than to convert it into a single demand above justice's court jurisdiction. We cite this as one of a number of possible considerations why the law will not presume the exercise of the option on the plaintiff's part. We are not prepared to say that the plaintiff could hasten the maturity of the notes, even by an exercise of the option, so as to make his entire demand bear interest from that date, though as to this we are not called upon for a decision at present. The court having directed a verdict for too large a sum, a reversal results. Kelly v. Strouse, 118 Ga. 874, 43 S. E. 280 (8). Judgment reversed.

STORY v. BUTT. (No. 342.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 28, 1907.)

1. LIFE ESTATES—CROPS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Civ. Code 1895, § 3092, relating to the right of a tenant for life to emblements, is merely declaratory of the common law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Life Estates, § 33.]

2. SAME.

Civ. Code 1895, § 3093, which entitles one who rents from the tenant for life to the land until the end of the year, upon his complying with his contract with the tenant for life, notwithstanding the latter dies during the year, is not of common-law origin, but is manifestly an adaptation made by the compilers of our Code from St. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 25.

(a) Under this section a power is conferred upon the tenant for life to represent the whole estate to the extent of making a rent contract binding to the end of the year in which the death of such tenant for life may occur.

(b) The correlative duty of the undertenant is to comply with his contract with the life tenant; and if he does so he is not accountable to the remainderman for any portion of the year's rent, though the life tenant die before the crops are sown.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Marion County; W. A. Little, Judge.

Action by W. E. Butt against Jesse C. Story. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

D. L. Parmer, for plaintiff in error. W. B. Short and Geo. P. Munro, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Mrs. Eliza Story had a life estate in certain lands. She rented them to the plaintiff in error, Jesse C. Story, for the year 1905, and took from him, for the rent, a negotiable promissory note. She died February 20, 1905, having previously transferred to another the rent note. Butt, the defendant in error, was the remainderman, or rather, by purchase, he succeeded to all the rights of a remainderman, and for the purposes of the case may be regarded as such. In the fall of 1905 Butt demanded payment of the rents of Jesse Story, who refused, having paid them to the holder of his rent note. Butt sued out a distress warrant, and Story defended. The ground had been plowed at Mrs. Story's death, but the crops had not been planted. The trial court held that although Jesse Story was, as under tenant of the life tenant, entitled to possession of the lands until the end of the year, yet, since the life tenant had died prior to the sowing of the crops, the remainderman was entitled to the rent for the year, and that Butt might maintain the distress warrant against Jesse Story, notwithstanding he had paid the rents to the holder of his rent note. Under the holding of the trial court there was a verdict in favor of Butt, and Story brings error.

1. Section 3092 of our Civil Code of 1895, which declares, "If the life estate be terminated not by act of the tenant, he and his legal representatives shall be entitled to emblements, which are the profits of crops sowed by him during life, whether the plants be annual or perennial," and section 3093, which asserts, "If the tenant for life rents the land for the year, and dies, or the estate is otherwise terminated during the year, the tenant shall be entitled to the land for the term of the year, upon complying with his contract with the tenant for life," are not both of the same origin. The former is merely declaratory of the common law. The latter is statutory in nature, having become law in this state through the adoption of the first Code, into which it was inserted by the codifiers as a new proposition. At common law, prior to St. 11 Geo. II, c. 19, if the life tenant died before the rent day, his executor could not recover from the undertenant the rent, or any portion thereof; nor could any one else collect it. The undertenant went rent free, and all his interests in the land terminated, except a qualified right of ingress and egress for the protection of his emblements, the right to gather crops already sown; for even the undertenant's rights to this extent were respected. Note the statement of Blackstone as to this right: "A third incident to estates for life relates to the undertenants, or lessees; for they have the same, nay greater, indulgences than the lessors, the original tenants for life. The same, for the law of estovers and emblements with regard to the tenant for life is also law with regard to his undertenant, who represents him and stands in his place; and greater, for in those cases where tenant for life shall not have the emblements, because the estate determines by his own act, the exceptions shall not reach his lessee, who is a third person." Bl. Com. 123. The right to emblements merely relates to the privilege of gathering crops already sown, and the right to possess the premises is included therein only so far as such possession is necessarily incident to the gathering of such crops. There was no common-law privilege that the undertenant might possess the premises until the end of the year.

2. The uncertainty of the life tenant's estate, and consequently of the undertenant's dependent term, frequently made the undertenant's condition a precarious one. It also made his lease less valuable. Private ingenuity first found a means to avoid the hardship; so that it became customary for the grantor of a life estate to give the life tenant the express power to make leases which should not terminate with the life estate. Finally, in 1851, Parliament passed St. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 25: "That where the lease or tenancy of any farm or lands held by a tenant at rack-rent shall determine by the death or cessor of the estate of any landlord entitled for his life, or for any other uncertain interest, instead of claims to emblements, the tenant shall continue to hold and occupy such farm or lands until the expiration of the then current year of his tenancy, and shall then quit, upon the terms of his lease or holding, in the same manner as if such lease or tenancy were then determined by effluxion of time or other lawful means during the continuance of his landlord's estate; and the succeeding landlord or owner shall be entitled to recover and receive of the tenant, in the same manner as his predecessor or such tenant's lessor could have done if he had been living or had continued the landlord or lessor, a fair proportion of the rent for the period which may have elapsed from the day of the death or cessor of the estate of such predecessor or lessor to the time of the tenant so quitting, and the succeeding landlord or owner and the tenant respectively shall, as between themselves and as against each other, be entitled to all the benefits and advantages, and be subject to the terms, conditions, and restrictions and conditions, to which the preceding landlord or lessor and such tenant respectively would have been entitled and subject in case the lease or tenancy had determined in manner aforesaid at the expiration of such current year." This statute, of course, did not come to us as a part of the laws of England, which this state had previously adopted; but its existence and beneficial purposes must have been known to the great lawyers who, 10 years after its passage, undertook the compilation of our Code, for in that Code the spirit of this statute appears in the following language (section 2238): "If a tenant for life hires out a slave, or rents the land for a year and dies, or the estate is otherwise terminated during the year, the hirer shall be entitled to the slave and the tenant to the land, for the term of the year, upon complying with his contract with the tenant for life."

The very words of this section, especially so much thereof as relates to the hiring of slaves, indicates a local and statutory origin. The hand of war wiped from the statute the provision as to slaves, but the remainder of it stands as our present section 3093 of the Civil Code of 1895. Both the statute of Victoria and our Code section make the tenant for life the representative of the entire estate for the purposes leasing it to the end of the year. The law thus confers the power which formerly a special grant was necessary to create. So that now, when the undertenant secures his rent contract for the year from the life tenant, his estate and right of possession is not dependent solely upon the estate of the life tenant, but is also supported by the life tenant's power as the representative of the whole estate. His correlative statutory obligation is compliance with "his contract with the life tenant." If his contract with the life tenant binds him to pay the rent in advance, and he pays it, he has made compliance and cannot be required to pay again; or if the life tenant exact a negotiable promissory note, payment of that note to the legal holder thereof is all that can be required of him. The law having made the life tenant the agent of the remainderman, as well as of himself, to make the contract of tenancy for the year, the remainderman must stand or fall by the terms of that contract. The question whether under St. 11 Geo. II, c. 19, or any other law, or principle of equity, the remainderman can recover from the estate of the life tenant all or any portion of the year's rent, is not now before us for consideration.

We hold, and in this case we cannot properly decide more as to the resulting rights of parties, that Jesse Story, having complied with his contract with the life tenant, was entitled to the possession of the premises to the end of the year, and that he was not additionally liable to the remainderman for the rent. The Supreme Court of Alabama seems to have reached a similar conclusion in the case of Terrell v. Reeves, 103 Ala. 265, 16 South. 55, where it is held: "Where one takes possession of leased lands under a deed from the life tenant, who, prior to said conveyance, had assigned the rent note for the then current year to a third person, to whom the lessee paid the rent, upon the death of the life tenant in the same year, such grantee is not liable to the remainderman for the rent of said land during the year in which the said deed was executed." Those having occasion to pursue the common-law phases of this question further may profitably examine the following cases: Ex parte Smythe, 1 Swan. 337, and cases cited in the footnotes; Hawkins v. Kelly, 8 Ves. Jr. 308, and citations; Pagett v. Gee, 9 Mod. 482; Rockingham v. Penrice, 1 P. Wms. 177; Jenner v. Morgan, 1 P. Wms. 392; Clun's Case, 10 Ves. 127; *Duppa v. #### HUGHES v. STATE. (No. 174.)

1. ARREST—AUTHORITY TO ARREST WITHOUT WARRANT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—PERSONAL SECURITY—UNREASONABLE SEARCHES.

Neither a policeman nor any other arresting officer has any authority, without a warrant, either upon suspicion or information that another is carrying a concealed weapon, to arrest the latter and search his person for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not such person is in fact violating the law prohibiting carrying concealed weapons. Even if the person arrested was so violating the law, the offense was not, in legal contemplation, committed in the presence of the officer, and such an arrest, search, and seizure are unauthorized by law, and are, within the meaning of the Constitution, unreasonable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 4, Arrest, §§ 147, 151; vol. 43, Searches and Seizures, § 5.]

2. SAME.

As a general rule the law requires a warrant in order to render an arrest legal, whether it be made by a policeman or by any other public officer. There are three exceptions to this rule: Where an offense is committed in the officer's presence; where the offender is endeavoring to escape; and where, from other cause, there is likely to be a failure of justice, for want of an officer to issue a warrant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 4, Arrest, § 147.]

3. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—EVIDENCE OBTAINED BY UNLAWFUL SEARCH OF PERSON.

Evidence of guilt, which the defendant, either directly or indirectly, is compelled to disclose by an unlawful search and seizure of his person under an illegal arrest, is not admissible in a criminal prosecution against the person thus illegally arrested.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

J. E. Hughes was convicted of carrying a concealed weapon, and he brings error. Reversed.

Frank L. Haralson, for plaintiff in error.
C. D. Hill, Sol. Gen., and Lowry Arnold, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The bill of exceptions assigns error on the part of the judge of the superior court in overruling a certiorari. The plaintiff in error was convicted in the criminal court of Atlanta of the offense of carrying a pistol concealed. He sought to have his case reviewed by the superior court, and to that end he presented a petition for certiorari, which was duly sanctioned. The petition showed that the only evidence adduced by the state, upon which a conviction could be had, was objected to on the trial, and a timely motion was made to withdraw it from the consideration of the jury, "because the defendant was forced to produce evidence against himself; the arrest being illegal and the evidence illegal." The assignments of error, in the petition for certiorari, are: (1) That the verdict is contrary to law and contrary to evidence; (2) that the evidence complained of and asked to be ruled out by the court was improperly admitted, because this evidence was obtained by an illegal search of defendant's person, which forced defendant to furnish evidence against himself, and the court committed error in not ruling it out upon objection or motion; (3) because the court erred in its charge, as set forth in this petition; (4) because the court erred in not ruling out the evidence complained of as being illegally obtained from J. E. Chapman (the only witness for the state), on motion of defendant's counsel, as set out in this certiorari.

The only witness for the state testified as follows: "On Saturday night, September 22, 1906, I saw the defendant and another man turn from Whitehall viaduct, at the ticket office of the W. & A. Railroad, and start across the passway from Peachtree viaduct to Broad street. Myself, George Stein, and Mr. Hutchins, both city policemen, followed them, overtook them, and searched them, and found on the person of the defendant a pistol. The pistol was in his right hip pocket under his coat. We had hold of him when the search was made. We then carried him down to the police station, where we entered a charge against him of concealed weapons. The defendant and the man with him were walking leisurely along the passway when we overtook them. The defendant had not violated any law that we knew of. He was not intoxicated. We did not have any warrant or any other legal process against him. We had no authority to make the search when we found the pistol. He was tried on the charge before Judge Broyles, the recorder, and bound over to this court by him. I did not see the defendant do anything in violation of law before we took a hold of him and searched him. He was being held by the other policeman while I made the search. He made no attempt to get away or to resist the officers." This was the whole of the state's case.

The defendant proved by both of the witnesses who were with him, and also asserted in his statement, that he was quietly and peaceably walking a public thoroughfare on a peaceable mission; that he was not talking in a loud tone of voice, nor were his companions, and that he turned back because he saw a mob gathering at the corner of Decatur, Whitehall, and Peachtree streets, and he was walking leisurely along, when three city officers walked up behind him, two of them grabbed him, and they immediately commenced searching him; that he was perfectly sober, and was not connected with the mob or with any one connected with the mob; that he is a law-abiding citizen, a carpenter by trade, who receives good wages and sticks closely to his business. The defendant did not say whether the pistol was concealed or not. Both of his witnesses were inclined to the belief that the pistol was not concealed, while they only testified that they had seen it a short time previous to the arrest.

The petitioner in certiorari excepted to the following charge of the court, which was admitted by the answer to be correctly set forth: "You have nothing to do with the arrest of the defendant, or the circumstances attending his arrest. It is not a question with you whether the arrest was legal or illegal, and whether the search and seizure of his person was illegal or not, or whether or not in this search they found a pistol on the defendant. The only question for you to determine is whether or not the defendant had on his person, 'not in an open manner and fully exposed to view, a pistol.' The question with you is (and it is the only question), did he have this pistol concealed? I charge you that this is the law, and that the jury is bound to take it as the law. As to whether or not the officers in this case had a warrant for the defendant, or whether or not he was involved in violation of some law, you have nothing to do. The question for you to decide is whether or not this pistol was concealed."

The defendant's motion for new trial having been overruled, and his certiorari dismissed, the question very clearly presented to us by the court's ruling on the defendant's objection to the evidence and to the charge of the court is whether the evidence objected to should have been excluded as illegal; in other words, whether the jury can consider, as the judge charged them that they could, evidence from a witness whose only knowledge of the facts was derived by force, after an illegal arrest of the defendant by such witness, acting as an officer. The question has already been decided by this court in Hammock v. State, 1 Ga. App. 126, 58 S. E. 66. But this case is an even more aggravated instance of a violation of the right of personal liberty, and of the constitutional provision which protects the citizen from being compelled to testify against himself, than the Hammock Case. In that case the sheriff at least acted upon information that the defendant was guilty of the offense. In the present case an orderly citizen, on a peaceable mission, so far as the evidence discloses, while walking the public thoroughfare, is assaulted, seized, searched, and deprived of his property, either upon bare suspicion or from mere curiosity. While one of the officers holds him, another searches his person and discovers a concealed pistol. The defendant was violating one law. To get proof of this the witness was compelled to violate two.

With the utmost abhorrence and detestation of the practice of carrying deadly weapons concealed, we cannot give our sanction to a prosecution for crime which involves a commission of more crimes. Unless two wrongs make a right, prosecutions and convictions on evidence which can only be obtained by graver violations of the law cannot be countenanced by any consideration of sound public policy. Surely, unless the law recognizes favorites among crimes and gloats with fond partiality in the prosecution of one offense more than another, it ought not to be necessary to abuse the liberty of the citizen and compel him, directly or indirectly, not only by fear, but by superior force, to furnish evidence against himself. Under our Constitution no witness is compelled to testify against himself, or even to incriminate himself, and all evidence obtained by force or fear is justly outlawed. As well said by Justice Lumpkin, rendering the opinion in Pickett v. State, 99 Ga. 15, 25 S. E. 609, 59 Am. St. Rep. 226: "While * * * an officer may, without a warrant, make an arrest for an offense committed in his presence, he has no authority, upon bare suspicion, or upon mere information derived from others, to arrest a citizen and search his person in order to ascertain whether or not he was carrying a concealed weapon in violation of law. The Constitution of this state expressly declares in the Bill of Rights that 'the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated.' * * * If any search is unreasonable and obnoxious to our fundamental law, it is one of the kind with which we are now dealing. Even if the person arrested did in fact have a pistol concealed about his person, the fact not being discoverable without a search, the offense of thus carrying it was not, in legal contemplation, committed in the presence of the officer, and the latter violated a sacred constitutional right of the citizen in assuming to exercise a pretended authority to search his person in order to expose his suspected criminality."

In our opinion the ruling of the Supreme Court in the Pickett Case is controlling, at least so far as the offense of carrying concealed weapons is concerned; and, inasmuch as it has not been reviewed and expressly overruled, subsequent decisions apparently in conflict therewith must yield to the older adjudication. We are aware that in Dozier v. State, 107 Ga. 708, 33 S. E. 418, it was held that it was not error to allow the sheriff to testify that, the accused being in his custody under a warrant for a criminal offense, he searched him and found a pistol concealed in his pocket; but in that case the ruling was put expressly upon the ground that the defendant was not compelled to furnish the evidence, and the case was thus distinguished from the case of Evans v. State, 106 Ga. 519, 32 S. E. 659, 71 Am. St. Rep. 278. The Dozier Case affords no parallel for the present case. In the first place, as shown by the conclusion of the opinion, the defendant's own statement demanded a verdict of guilty. "He stated that he had the pistol * * * in his hand, that when he saw the sheriff coming he dropped it in his pocket, and the sheriff searched him and found it in his pocket. So that, in any event, the conviction must properly stand." So far as the record in the Dozier Case shows, no force was necessary to get the pistol from the prisoner; and he was in the lawful custody of an officer, who had arrested him on a warrant for a different offense, and whose duty it was, at least before confining him in jail, to search him and be certain that he had no instrumentalities concealed about his person by which he might effect an escape. The trial judge seems to have framed his charge in accordance with the decision in the Dozier Case, without taking into consideration the fact that, throughout the opinion, it is expressly distinguished from those cases, previously decided, in which the defendant was compelled to furnish evidence against himself and where there was no lawful arrest, and the further fact that, for that reason, the rule in the Dozier Case was never intended to be applicable to a case such as this, where the incriminating evidence was forced from a party not under lawful arrest, but illegally and lawlessly detained.

It must be remembered that when Judge Lumpkin, in the Williams Case, 100 Ga. 521, 28 S. E. 627, 39 L. R. A. 269, used the language: "We know of no law in Georgia which renders inadmissible in evidence the fruits of an illegal and wrongful search and seizure; nor are we aware of any statute from which it could be logically gathered that the admission of such evidence violates any recognized principle of public policy"—the words were merely used arguendo, and were addressed to an entirely different proposition from the one before us. The objection to the evidence in the Williams Case was "that, should it be admitted to the jury, it would violate the constitutional and inalienable right of defendant to be secure against such searches and seizures; and she then and there expressly claimed this right, privilege, and immunity, not only under the state Constitution, but as one to which she was entitled under the United States Constitution," etc. And by a careful reading of the opinion it will be seen that all of the reasoning of the opinion is addressed to the inquiry as to whether the contention of the accused, that her constitutional rights were infringed by the ruling of the trial judge upon the specific objection made, was tenable. The decision was that the objection made was not tenable, for the reason that, in the absence of express legislation directed against the misconduct of private persons, these rights cannot be enforced so as to protect the citizen. In the words of the decision (page 519 of 100 Ga., and page 627 of 28 S. E. [39 L. R. A. 269]): "As we understand it, the main, if not the sole, purpose of our constitutional inhibitions against unreasonable searches and seizures, was to place a salutary restriction upon the powers of government; that is to say, we believe the framers of the Constitution of the United States and of this and other states merely sought to provide against any attempt, by legislation or otherwise, to authorize, justify, or declare lawful any unreasonable search or seizure. This wise restriction was intended to operate upon legislative bodies, so as to render ineffectual any effort to legalize by statute what the people expressly stipulated could in no event be made lawful; upon executives, so that no law violative of this constitutional inhibition should ever be enforced; and upon the judiciary, so as to render it the duty of the courts to denounce as unlawful every unreasonable search and seizure, whether confessedly without any color of authority, or sought to be justified under the guise of legislative sanction. For the misconduct of private persons, acting upon their individual responsibility and of their own volition, surely none of the three divisions of government is responsible."

To confirm what we have said above with reference to the Williams Case, we need only add that in the Evans Case, 106 Ga. 522, 32 S. E. 660, 71 Am. St. Rep. 278, a case practically identical, as to the facts, with the case at bar, the Supreme Court, all the justices concurring, spoke as follows: "In the case of Williams v. State, 100 Ga. 511, 28 S. E. 624, 39 L. R. A. 269, no such question as the one now under discussion was raised or decided. In that case an officer took from the person of the accused marked coins which were afterwards used in the evidence against her. * * * The decision in that case simply holds that the constitutional provision as to unreasonable searches and seizures did not render the evidence inadmissible. It was there said that the purpose of the constitutional provision was to deter the lawmaking power from authorizing or declaring lawful any unreasonable search or seizure, and to prevent courts and executives from enforcing any law which was violative of this provision, but that it was not intended to operate so as to prevent the courts from receiving evidences of crime, although they might have been obtained by an illegal and unreasonable search and seizure. It would seem from these cases that the law in this state is that evidences of guilt found upon a person under legal arrest may be used in evidence against him, but that, where a person not in legal custody is compelled to furnish incriminating evidence against himself, the evidence is not admissible. The ruling made in the Day Case, 68 Ga. 867, constrains us to reverse the judgment of the court below in refusing a new trial, on the ground that the evidence complained of was improperly admitted."

The case of Duren v. Thomasville, 125 Ga. 1, 53 S. E. 814, is not similar to the case before us. The most that can be said of the evidence procured by search in that case is that it furnished an incriminatory circumstance which, when taken in connection with other proof in the case, might lead to the conclusion of the defendant's guilt; and the same is true as to the knowledge obtained by search in the Williams Case. In the case of concealed weapons the unlawful search and seizure, if it discloses anything, affords proof of the only fact necessary to constitute a violation of the law. And this line of distinction between cases where only incriminatory circumstances are developed, and a case where direct evidence of absolute guilt is obtained, is recognized in frequent decisions. It is not necessary, however, to further distinguish the Duren Case, because, in so far as it conflicts with the Evans Case, above cited, it must yield to the older adjudication. But, even under the ruling in the Duren Case, the evidence in the present case should have been rejected, when the motion was made asking that it be withdrawn from the jury; for, if the criterion be, "Who furnished or produced the evidence?" and if it be true that "If the person suspected is made to produce the incriminating evidence it is inadmissible," as held in the Duren Case, the evidence of the state's only witness in this case was inadmissible, because the defendant was forced to produce the evidence by being so completely overpowered that there was not even a chance to resist. If not bound by the previous decisions of the Supreme Court, the writer would unhesitatingly hold that evidence procured while a prisoner is under arrest, whether such arrest were lawful or unlawful, should be excluded; but the ruling of the Supreme Court, that where a person not in legal custody is compelled to furnish incriminating evidence against himself the evidence is not admissible, itself requires the grant of a new trial in this case.

Judgment reversed.

(2 Ga. App. 148)

SHERMAN v. STATE. (No. 448.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 19, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—EVIDENCE OBTAINED BY SEARCH OF DEFENDANT'S PERSON.

Evidence obtained by illegal seizure and search of the defendant's person, by which he is compelled to criminate himself, being inadmissible against a defendant accused of crime, the burden devolves upon the state to show that evidence obtained by search was procured after a legal arrest. Proof that the arrest was legal is not made by the statement of a witness that the arrest was made under a warrant. The conclusion of a witness that a given paper is a warrant under which an arrest may legally be made is not proper proof that such a paper is in fact a warrant by virtue of which a legal arrest has been made, so as to authorize the admission of evidence obtained by means of an arrest under such paper or alleged warrant.

2. JURY—SERVICE OF REJECTED JUROR ON JURY—GROUND FOR NEW TRIAL.

Where a juror, properly rejected by either party to a cause, serves without the knowledge or consent of such party and his counsel, and, unknown to such party or his counsel, participates in the finding and rendering of a verdict in the case, a new trial should be granted on the motion of such party.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Americus; C. R. Crisp, Judge.

Ed Sherman was convicted of carrying a concealed weapon, and he brings error. Reversed.

Howell B. Simmons, for plaintiff in error.
Zach. Childers, Sol., for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Ed Sherman was tried and found guilty of the offense of carrying concealed weapons. He moved for a new trial, and his motion was overruled. It is only necessary to notice the amended grounds of the motion. These were two in number. In the first it is insisted that the court erred in refusing to exclude the testimony of the state's witness, upon the ground that a legal arrest was not shown, because it did not appear that the party arresting defendant had a warrant against the defendant, and because it must appear that the arrest of the defendant was legal before the testimony would be admissible. The second ground of the motion for new trial was that "only eleven of the jury selected to try the case served, and that in place of W. A. Stephens, one of the jury selected to try the case, was put or voluntarily went in one W. H. Justice, a member of the panel of the jurors that had been stricken." With regard to the second ground of the motion, the presiding judge qualifies his approval by the following note: "Two jury lists were handed out and a jury stricken. The jury was called, and 12 jurors took their places in the jury box, after being duly sworn. The solicitor and defendant's counsel both made their opening statements to the jury. Evidence was then introduced, and at its conclusion the case was argued by the solicitor and the defendant's counsel. The jury retired, and later the court was notified the jury had made a verdict. The court had the jury brought into the courtroom, and the foreman reported the jury had made a verdict. The court instructed the solicitor to receive it, which was done, and the verdict read and published in open court. As soon as the verdict was read and published, Mr. Simmons came up to the bench and informed the court privately he thought one of the jurors who served had been stricken.

The court informed Mr. Simmons he knew nothing of the matter, but would have the jury called, which was done, and one of the jurors had been stricken. Mr. Simmons here in open court requested the court to declare a mistrial, which the court refused, saying the motion came too late, as the verdict had been rendered, received, and published in open court." The ground of motion with reference to the juror was verified by the affidavit of Mr. Simmons, defendant's attorney, who swore that his client did not know any member of the jury, and that the jury was stricken by him in behalf of his client. He further swore that Justice was stricken by him, and would not, in any event, have been accepted by defendant, or by him as defendant's counsel, in a case where the rights of a negro (defendant being a negro) were concerned. The affidavit of counsel further showed that the defendant and his counsel relied upon the officers to see that the jury selected served, for the reason that the defendant knew none of the jurors, and his counsel was not acquainted with all of those selected; further, that the defendant's counsel is near-sighted, and did not have on his glasses, and did not notice that said Justice was on the jury until the jury had made a verdict. The jury list used upon the trial, and a copy of which is attached to the record, shows that W. H. Justice was stricken by the defendant.

The court was right in refusing to declare a mistrial. The motion to declare a mistrial came too late. But we think that the defendant is entitled to a new trial, and that our learned brother of the trial bench erred in overruling the motion. The only evidence introduced for the state was that of the witness Gatewood, who testified as follows: "On October 5, 1906, I arrested Ed Sherman, the defendant, and carried him to the jail, and in his right hip pocket he had a pistol concealed. I found it there when I went to search him, before locking him up. I had a warrant for him when I made the arrest. This was in Sumter county, Ga. I had one of the warrants, and M. Holloway had the other, when the arrest was made. I do not know who issued the warrant that I had; will not say that it was issued by Judge Crisp or Judge Suber. But I had a warrant for him—one of the two warrants that I have in my hand." The defendant's counsel moved to rule out the testimony of Gatewood, as it did not show a legal arrest. We think this motion should have been sustained. The state is required to prove its case by legal evidence. From the evidence adduced it is not shown whether the arrest was or was not a legal arrest; and the testimony could not affect the rights of the defendant, or be used to convict him, until it was shown affirmatively that the defendant had been legally arrested. As this court has already held, in the case of Hughes v. State, 2 Ga. App. —, 58 S. E. 390, "evidence of guilt which the defendant, either directly or indirectly, is compelled to disclose by an unlawful search and seizure of his person under an illegal arrest, is not admissible in a criminal prosecution against the person thus illegally arrested." The law requires a warrant, in order to render an arrest legal, unless the offense is committed in the officer's presence, the offender is endeavoring to escape, or there is likely to be a failure of justice for want of an officer to issue a warrant. See Hughes v. State, supra. The arrest in this case may have been legal, and it perhaps could have been shown that the defendant was arrested on a warrant. But it devolved upon the state to show that the defendant was arrested on a warrant, and the state failed to prove it. The testimony of Gatewood, that he had a warrant for him and that he was arrested on one of the two warrants that he had in his hand, was nothing but the mere conclusion of the witness that the paper was a warrant. The paper itself, if it was a warrant, was the best evidence of what it contained, and as to whether it was or was not really a warrant. The conclusion stated by the witness was not only objectionable, because it involved a statement of the contents of a paper upon which depended, perhaps, the liberty of defendant, but, further, because the answer of the witness assumed to pass upon the sufficiency of the contents of that paper to constitute a valid warrant authorizing the defendant's arrest. The statement of the witness could not prove the paper to be a legal warrant, even if the paper had been lost and parol evidence of its contents were thus admissible. Not to say more, the answer of the witness assumed that the paper under which the defendant was arrested was issued by an officer authorized to issue warrants upon a proper affidavit, and that it set forth the violation of a penal law. If the defendant was arrested upon a legal warrant, proof of that fact was not made by the statement of a mere conclusion of the witness; and, as it was not shown that the defendant was legally arrested on a warrant, the evidence obtained by reason of his arrest should have been excluded. If the paper really was a warrant, the state could easily have put it in evidence.

We think, too, that a new trial should have been granted upon the ground that Justice served upon the jury, instead of Stephens, after having been rejected by the defendant. The case at bar is nearly identical with the case of Stripling v. State, 77 Ga. 108, 3 S. E. 277. It is true that in the Stripling Case neither the defendant nor his counsel knew the juror who served, while in the present case the defendant's counsel did know the juror Justice; but the testimony that the counsel is near-sighted and did not see Justice on the jury, or know that he was there, until the jury came to render their verdict, is not disputed, and otherwise there is no difference in the two cases. It does not appear how Justice came to be substituted for Stephens; and, as remarked in the Stripling Case, "It is somewhat remarkable that the substitution was not discovered and corrected at an earlier period." But in the Stripling Case, as in this, the mistake was not discovered until after the trial was over. In that case Jobson was substituted for Jones, and Jones was an acceptable juror (as Stephens was in this case), while Jobson would have been a very unacceptable one (as Justice appears to have been in this case). "The allegation, in short, is that the defendant was tried by only 11 jurors of his own selection, and he asked, therefore, that a new trial be granted him upon this and other grounds, which, as before stated, the court refused. This refusal we are satisfied was error." There might have been exceptions made to Justice propter affectum, if the defendant had desired to urge them; but, however this may be, the record shows that the defendant had used his right to strike Justice, and thereby peremptorily challenged him. The defendant had the right to be tried by the 12 jurors selected; and, if it be true (and it is not contradicted) that neither the defendant nor his counsel knew Justice was on the jury until after the verdict, he was entitled to a new trial. If the affidavit of the defendant's counsel is true, "Somebody other than the defendant or his counsel was evidently to blame," and it is not material whether it was called to the attention of the judge prior to the motion for new trial. That the right to a jury of one's own selection may be preserved by motion for new trial, see Dovey v. Hobson, 6 Taunton, 461.

In our examination of this question we have found two cases in which a new trial was held to have been properly refused where one juror was substituted for another; but neither of those cases is similar to this case. In the case of Anderson v. Green, 46 Ga. 362, a juror was selected by both parties, and another answered to his name and served in his stead, and the Supreme Court held that that was not a good ground for new trial, as it did not appear that both the substitute and the principal were unknown to the defendant and his counsel. The difference between the Anderson Case and the case at bar is that the person who served had not been rejected. In the present case Justice had been peremptorily challenged and stricken from the list by the defendant. Nor was any reason shown or offered to be shown in the Anderson Case why the person who served was for any cause objectionable to the defendant. And the case of Burns v. State, 80 Ga. 545, 7 S. E. 88, is unlike this case, as that case was held by the Supreme Court to be unlike the Stripling Case, because in the Burns Case the juror Charles Foster, who served, was accepted by the defendant, and the court held that, while the accused and his counsel did not know all the facts, yet in the exercise of due diligence they ought to have known, before accepting the juror, whether the juror they accepted (Charles Foster, a negro, instead of Charles Foster, a white man) was 21 years of age or a minor and whether he was upon the jury list of the county. In other words, the extent of the holding in that case was that an exception propter defectum to a juror accepted by a party on the trial could not be considered on a motion for new trial; but, from what appears here, this defendant, after having positively rejected the juror, was tried by him without fault on his part. To refuse him a new trial, under this state of facts, would be to deprive him of his right of peremptory challenge.

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—APPEAL—AFFIDAVIT OF INABILITY TO GIVE BOND—SUFFICIENCY.

Where an appeal is entered by a firm from a judgment in a justice's court to a jury in the superior court, and no appeal bond is given, but the individual members of the firm make affidavit that each member of said firm separately, "owing to his poverty, is unable to give the security required by law," there was no error in dismissing the appeal on the ground that the affidavit did not show that the firm was unable to give the bond required by law. Marlow v. Hughes Lumber Co., 17 S. E. 922, 92 Ga. 554; Kline v. Swift Specific Company, 45 S. E. 314, 118 Ga. 514.

2. MOTIONS—ORAL MOTIONS—DEFECTS ON FACE OF PLEADINGS.

The defect, being apparent on the face of the pleadings, could properly be taken advantage of by oral motion. It is only where the powers of the court are invoked touching matters that lie outside the pleadings that a written application or motion is required. Civ. Code 1895, § 5046; *Smith v. 1. CORPORATIONS—ACTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF—CORPORATE EXISTENCE—TRIAL—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE.

In a suit on a promissory note by the payee therein named, where the allegation is made that the plaintiff was a corporation, it would be incumbent upon the defendant to prove affirmatively that no such corporation existed. This would be true, without such allegation, where the name of the plaintiff itself imports a corporation. Wilson v. Sprague Mowing Machine Company, 55 Ga. 672; Cribb v. Waycross Lumber Company, 82 Ga. 597, 9 S. E. 428; Mattox v. State, 115 Ga. 219, 41 S. E. 709. Therefore, in such a suit, where the defendant in his pleading admits the execution of the note, such admission, with the presumption of corporate existence, makes a prima facie case for the plaintiff, and the defendant would be entitled to the opening and conclusion, although by his answer he had expressly denied the allegation that plaintiff was a corporation.

Error from City Court of Elberton; P. P. Proffitt, Judge.

Action by T. M. Swift, for the use of J. Y. Swift, against Elbert county. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

C. P. Harris, for plaintiff in error. Z. B. Rogers, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. T. M. Swift, for the use of J. Y. Swift, brought suit against Elbert county for damages to land. The trial court overruled a demurrer, and the case was submitted to a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $175. A motion for a new trial was made and denied. The defendant excepts to the judgment overruling the demurrer and to the refusal to grant a new trial. This court will not consider the question made by the demurrer, but will decide the case on the merits, as shown by the facts.

The plaintiff was the owner of a certain tract of land located on the public road from Elberton to Petersburg. This tract of land had no improvements upon it, but by reason of many natural advantages, which are fully described in the petition and by the evidence, it was "unsurpassed in beauty and grandeur" as a site for a residence. Besides these natural advantages, it was located directly on the public road, which gave it additional value; and it was the intention of J. Y. Swift, who held the beneficial interest in the property, to erect on the same a family residence. The road which ran between Elberton and Petersburg and directly alongside this property had been the public highway for a long time, and it was by this road that ingress and egress was had to and from the property. The evidence is silent as to the value of the property in question, except that it was "chiefly valuable for a building site." In the spring of 1905 the commissioners of roads and revenues of Elbert county cut out, graded, and opened a new road. The new road leaves the old one some distance above the property in question, and comes back into it some distance below. Between this property and the new road there is an embankment of trees and bushes which completely hides the property from the road, "and is a gruesome and unseemly sight in front thereof." Although the old road was not closed up, it was practically abandoned by the traveling public, who preferred the new and better road. The old road, however, still remained as a highway, and as a means of ingress and egress, into and from the property. The damage resulting to the property in question by the opening of the new road was alleged substantially as follows: The property could not be seen from the new road, and therefore its beauty as a building site was destroyed. The property was left off the traveled highway, because the old road is practically abandoned, and has not been worked by the county since the building of the new road. There was no way of getting to the new road from the property, or from the new road to the property, except through the intervening woods, or going for some distance on the old road. Instead of a valuable and beautiful residence site on a public road, which afforded easy access to it, it has become property without special advantages for residence purposes, located on an abandoned, unused, and unworked road. There is no evidence as to the market value of the property before the new road was opened, or since, and no evidence as to value at all, except the single statement, by the owner and his witnesses, that the property had been damaged at least $500 by the opening of the new road and the practical abandonment of the old road. All the witnesses for the plaintiff concurred in the opinion that the property in question was chiefly valuable as a building site because of its natural advantages and of its location alongside the old road, and that it had been damaged by the new road and the abandonment of the old road, for such use, from $500 to $1,000. This is a substantial statement of the material evidence for the plaintiff. Without reference to the evidence for the defendant, does this evidence for the plaintiff make a case for the recovery of damages?

1. Under the Constitution of 1877, if private property is damaged by the construction of roads or any improvement made for the use of the public, its owner can recover whatever damage he has actually sustained. Campbell v. Metropolitan Street R. Co., 82 Ga. 320, 9 S. E. 1078. Under this provision of our Constitution a recovery may be had in all cases where private property has sustained a substantial injury from the making and use of an improvement that is public in its character, whether the damage is direct, as when caused by trespass or physical invasion of the property, or consequential, as in the diminution of its market value. City of Atlanta v. Green, 67 Ga. 390; Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 8 Sup. Ct. 820, 81 L. Ed. 638. Unquestionably, also, the owners of land adjacent to public roads have a private right to have free access to their land and buildings thereon from the roads. 82 Ga. 320, 9 S. E. 1078, supra; Street Ry. v. Cumminsville, 14 Ohio St. 523. Applying these general principles to the facts as shown in behalf of the plaintiff, is this case one for damages? Certainly there is not shown any physical injury to his property, or any trespass thereon by the acts of the county commissioners in constructing the new road. Do the facts show any consequential damage, diminishing the market value of the property? Has his private property sustained any substantial injury from the making of the new road? It cannot be said that there is any diminution of its market value, for the very simple reason that it is not shown by the evidence to have had any market value either before or since the opening of the new road.

It is contended that its value as a building site has been damaged $500 at least, because it is no longer adjacent to a public road, from which it can be seen, and to which there is easy access. The estimate of this damage is purely speculative, for there is no evidence whatever as to its value as a building site before the new road was made. Abstractly considered, the property still retains all of its natural advantages as a building site. We think damages might be recoverable for any diminution of the value of the property in connection with the use or uses to which it had been put, or to which it was peculiarly adapted; but we think it entirely too remote and speculative to give damages for a supposed injury to the mere ethical value of property for a certain use. Legal redress is given for substantial, and not imaginary, injury to property—for damage to market value, and not injury to landscape beauty. In this case the opening of the new road did not affect the physical advantages of the property. It is true "the embankment of trees and bushes" between the road and the property was left, "a gruesome and unwholesome" obstruction intervening between the road and the property; but this obstruction was not placed there by the ruthless hand of the county. It was the unappreciative act of nature. We know of no law that required this unsightly "embankment of trees and bushes" to be removed by the county authorities, so that the natural beauties of the property could be seen and admired from the public road.

On the question as to interfering with or preventing access to the property from the public road, the evidence shows that the old road is still open, and if the owner of the property desires to use the same for residential purposes, and to afford the traveling public the benefit of its beauty as they pass on by, or to afford him ingress and egress to and from the public road, he has only to call upon the county authorities, under the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 41), to work this road and keep it in proper condition. It is somewhat remarkable that, notwithstanding the fact that this property was so unsurpassed in its beauty for residence purposes, it had never been improved by the present owner, although he had been in possession thereof for many years. The unsurpassed advantages of this favored spot for an "ideal country home" seem to have been overlooked or neglected by those who so greatly appreciated its beauties until the opening of the new road. This public improvement was the flashlight that brought into view and value the hidden beauties of the place. We do not know of any law that requires a county to pay damages to a private citizen whose eyes have only been opened to the beauties of his private property by an improvement of public utility.

2. All claims against counties must be presented within 12 months after they accrue. Pol. Code 1895, § 362. The allegation of the petition is that "in the spring of 1905" the county cut out, graded, and built the new road which damaged the property, and that the petitioner "made a written demand on the defendant for the sum of $500 damages," which had been refused. No time is stated when such written demand was made. The evidence on the subject is that the attorney for the plaintiff handed to the clerk of the board of commissioners a written claim for damages, in the amount of $500, and that the board received it and declined to pay it. It is not stated when such written claim for damages was made. The suit for damages was not filed until July 24, 1906. It nowhere appears, therefore, either by allegation or by evidence, that any demand was made on the county within 12 months from the spring of 1905, when the claim for damages was alleged to have accrued. Treating the filing of the suit as a written demand, it does not show that such demand was made within the 12 months, for it was filed July 24, 1906.

Let the judgment of the court refusing to grant a new trial be reversed.

DUNLAP HARDWARE CO. v. THARP.
(No. 305.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 24, 1907.)

1. JUDGMENT—DORMANT JUDGMENTS.

The proper officer to record on the execution docket of a county court entries on executions issued from that court is the judge of the court. The sheriff has no authority to make such record. Therefore, where the sheriff recorded on the execution docket of the county court from which the execution issued an entry made by him as sheriff on the execution, there was no such compliance with the law as would prevent the dormancy of the judgment upon which the execution was based.

2. EXECUTION—RETURN—RECORD.

When the record on the execution docket of an entry on an execution is made by the proper officer, he should date such record as of the date when made.

3. JUDGMENT—DORMANT JUDGMENTS.

The entry as it appears on the execution should be recorded on the docket, and a substantial compliance with this requirement is necessary.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Houston County; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

Action by the Dunlap Hardware Company against A. H. Tharp. The hardware company obtained a judgment against Tharp, and levy of execution thereon was made by the sheriff on the property of defendant, whereupon defendant filed an affidavit of illegality on the ground that the judgment was dormant at the date of the levy. From a judgment sustaining the allegation of illegality and dismissing the levy, the hardware company brings error. Affirmed.

Hardeman & Jones, for plaintiff in error.
C. E. Brunson and Wm. Brunson, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The Dunlap Hardware Company (plaintiff in error) obtained a judgment against Tharp (the defendant in error) in the county court of Houston county, on October 21, 1895. Execution was issued, and duly entered upon the execution docket, October 30, 1895. Nulla bona was entered upon the execution on March 11, 1901. The execution docket of the county court, opposite the entry of the execution, showed the following entry: "Return nulla bona made by sheriff on this fi. fa. March 11, 1901." Levy of this execution was made by the sheriff on property of the defendant January 2, 1906, and the defendant thereupon filed an affidavit of illegality, on the ground that the judgment was dormant at the date of the levy. The issue thus presented was submitted to the decision of the judge without the intervention of a jury. The execution was introduced in evidence, with entries above noted. The entry of nulla bona on said execution appeared as follows: "Georgia, Houston County. Due search made, and no property of the defendant found upon which to levy the within execution. This the 11th day of March, 1901. [Signed] M. L. Cooper, Sheriff." Opposite the entry upon the execution docket was the following entry: "Return nulla bona made by sheriff on this fi. fa. March 11, 1901." M. L. Cooper, the sheriff, testified that he made the entry of nulla bona on the fi. fa., and also the entry on the execution docket. He did not remember when it was made, but he did not make any entry and date it back. This was the only evidence; and the court sustained the illegality and dismissed the levy.

The only question presented in the case is whether the entry made by the sheriff on the execution docket of the county court was sufficient to prevent the dormancy of the judgment. "An entry made by a proper officer upon an execution issued from a judgment, unless recorded upon the execution docket of the court from which the execution issued, will not, even as between the parties to the judgment, arrest the running of the dormancy statute." Nowell v. Haire, 116 Ga. 386, 42 S. E. 719. See, also, Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3761, 3762; Smith v. Bearden, 117 Ga. 822, 45 S. E. 59; Palmer v. Inman, 126 Ga. 519, 55 S. E. 229; Benton v. Fish, 1 Ga. App. 656, 57 S. E. 1079. It is contended in this case that the record on the execution docket, relied upon to keep the execution in life, was not sufficient for that purpose, under the law, because made by the sheriff, who was not the proper officer to make it, and it does not appear that he was in any way authorized to make it; because it was not dated; and because it was not a true transcript of the entry on the execution. The proper officer to make entries on executions on the execution docket of the county court is the judge of that court. Civ. Code 1895, § 4185. The sheriff has no authority to make such record on the docket. No presumption arises as to the regularity of the sheriff's act in making such record, because he has no authority upon the subject whatever. Regularity in the performance even of a ministerial act will not be presumed, unless the ministerial officer was authorized by law to perform the act. In other words, the question of regularity in the performance of an act cannot arise where no duty is imposed by law, or authority given by law to do the act. Civ. Code 1895, § 3763, requires that the clerk, or proper officer, making the entry on the execution docket, shall date such record when it is made. In this case the entry on the execution docket is as follows: "Return nulla bona made by sheriff on this fi. fa. March 11, 1901." This date clearly applies to the entry made by the sheriff on the execution, and not to the date when the entry was recorded by him on the execution docket. We do not think this sufficient. The date when the record is made on the execution docket should be clear and unequivocal, for the time of the record upon the execution docket is the all-important fact from which to determine the question of dormancy; the language of statute being: "No judgment shall be enforced after seven years from its rendition, when no execution has been issued upon it and the same placed upon the execution docket, or when execution has been issued and seven years have expired from the time of the record, upon the execution docket of the court from which the same issued, of the last entry upon the execution made by an officer authorized to execute and return the same." Civ. Code 1895, § 3761.

To save the judgment from becoming dormant the statute requires that the entry on the execution must be recorded on the execution docket of the court which the same issued. A substantial compliance with this requirement is essential. What was placed on the execution docket by the sheriff in this case was, not the entry which was on the execution, but a mere statement, according to the sheriff, of what the entry was. The reason for this requirement is that the execution docket must show a proper entry of the sheriff on the execution. The entry on the docket of the words, "Return nulla bona made by the sheriff on this fi. fa. March 11, 1901," is shown by reference to the entry on the fi. fa. not to be a correct transcript. It is true, as contended by the learned counsel for plaintiff in error, that the Supreme Court in many cases has given to the dormancy statutes an equitable construction; but such construction has been limited to those cases where the acts of the plaintiff in execution to enforce his execution, by reason of their public character, served to keep the judgment alive. It has never been held by the Supreme Court that entries on the execution can be effective for this purpose when not recorded in the manner prescribed by the statute. In the case of Columbus Fertilizer Co. v. Hanks, 119 Ga. 955, 47 S. E. 224, the Supreme Court holds that, if the act of 1885 (Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3761, 3762) means anything, "it is that entries on an execution cannot serve to keep the judgment in life unless the entries are properly recorded."

We think it very clear that the judgment of the trial court, for the reasons stated, should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Early County; W. O. Worrill, Judge.

Monk Sawyer was convicted of a violation of an ordinance of the city of Blakely prohibiting the possession of intoxicating liquor kept for the purpose of an unlawful sale, and he brings error. Affirmed.

The plaintiff in error was convicted before the mayor, presiding in the police court of the city of Blakely, for a violation of the following municipal ordinance: "If any person shall have in his possession in said city any intoxicating liquors for the purpose of unlawful sale or giving away thereof, on conviction thereof such person shall be punished as prescribed in section 17 of the city ordinances. In prosecutions for the violation of this ordinance, one-half the fine shall be paid to the informer." By section 17 of the city ordinances all persons convicted thereunder are to be punished according to section 13 of the city charter (Acts 1900, p. 223), which prescribes that the officer presiding in the police court shall have the authority to punish persons convicted therein of violating the city ordinances by fine not exceeding $100, by imprisonment in the jail of Early county, or such other place as the city council may provide for a prison, for a term not exceeding 100 days, either or both, and to coerce the payment of fines by imprisonment. Labor in the chain-gang or on the streets, not exceeding 100 days, may be allowed as alternative to fine or imprisonment. Sentence may be cumulative. Upon the trial the accused moved a discharge on the ground that there was no sufficient charter authority for the passage of the ordinance under which he was being tried. The mayor denied the motion, and to this one of the exceptions is taken. The evidence was conflicting; but the mayor adjudged the defendant guilty and imposed a fine of $50, with the alternative of 50 days' work on the streets of the city. The defendant sought certiorari, which was denied by the judge of the superior court.

Among the grounds for certiorari it is contended that the judgment and sentence of the police is void, because section 13 of the city charter is in violation of article 1, § 1, par. 2 (the due process of law clause), of the state Constitution, "because it provides for a penalty of 3½ months' servitude in the chain-gang or on the streets of Blakely, without providing for the due process of law in the trial of offenders; the process allowed petitioner consisting of a warrant sworn out before the mayor, on which he was put upon trial, without a copy of the accusation charging him with a crime, and without a trial by jury, and with nothing more on the record than the name of the arresting officer, the names of the witnesses for the prosecution, the offense charged, and (after the trial) the judgment and sentence of the court." A paragraph of the petition for certiorari also asserts: "Your petitioner avers that he has been denied the equal protection of the laws, contrary to and in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States (Civ. Code 1895, § 6030) which says that no state shall 'deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws,' in that he was convicted of a crime whose punishment was more severe than the average punishment of misdemeanors in the state courts of our state, yet he was not furnished with an accusation of the crime, nor allowed a trial by a jury; and this deprivation of your petitioner's constitutional rights he assigns as error." It appears that the accused did not appeal to the city council, but sought a certiorari directly from the mayor's decision.

Section 14 of the city charter provides: "Any person convicted in the police court may obtain certiorari directly from the decision of the officer presiding in said court under the same rules as certiorari is obtained from the decisions of county judges in criminal cases, or he may waive his right to apply for certiorari, and may, within four days from the rendition of the decision in the police court, enter an appeal to the city council, who shall hear the case anew, and their decision shall be final. There shall be no certiorari from the decision of the council." In the petition for certiorari the applicant seeks to make the point that this provision of the charter is contrary to section 4634 of the Civil Code of 1895, which provides that certiorari can be had to correct errors in any inferior judicature, and is therefore unconstitutional, as being a special law in contravention of a general law.

Park & Collins, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Pottle, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts). 1. The ordinance under which the accused was convicted is valid. The charter of the city of Blakely (section 25) contains a broad "general welfare clause," and in addition thereto adopts by reference section 696 of the Political Code of 1895, which itself is broad enough in terms to authorize this ordinance. Mayson v. Atlanta, 77 Ga. 662 (3); Bagwell v. Lawrenceville, 94 Ga. 654, 21 S. E. 903 (2); Paulk v. Sycamore, 104 Ga. 24, 30 S. E. 417, 41 L. R. A. 772, 69 Am. St. Rep. 128; Reese v. Newnan, 120 Ga. 198, 47 S. E. 560 (1).

2. The mayor's finding was supported by the evidence. Rooney v. Augusta, 117 Ga. 709, 45 S. E. 72 (2); Reese v. Newnan, 120 Ga. 198, 47 S. E. 560 (2).

3. The point that the section of the charter under which the punishment was imposed is unconstitutional and void will not be considered, nor certified to the Supreme Court; for certiorari lies, not to correct that which is void, but only that which is irregular or erroneous. Levadas v. Beach, 117 Ga. 178, 43 S. E. 418 (2); Bass v. Milledgeville, 122 Ga. 177, 50 S. E. 59.

4. The question as to the constitutionality of so much of the fourteenth section of the city charter as requires the accused to waive his right of certiorari in order to appeal to the city council, and makes the finding of that body final, is not properly before us; for the accused did not appeal to the city council, and no court has yet denied to him the right of certiorari from any decision of that body. The time to decide that question will not be at hand until the right to certiorari from the decision of the city council is judicially denied and that judgment is brought under review. Courts will not gratuitously decide moot constitutional questions. Judgment affirmed.

ANDERSON v. STATE. (No. 395.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 16, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—WRIT OF ERROR—PRESENTATION IN LOWER COURT OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION.

Before a reviewing court is authorized to pass upon the constitutionality of an act of the General Assembly, it must appear that the question was made or presented in the court below and was passed upon by the trial judge; also the alleged repugnancy of the statute to some portion of the Constitution must be specifically asserted.

(a) An allegation of the repugnancy of a statute to the Constitution is not sufficiently specific, unless the clause or paragraph of the Constitution claimed to be violated is set out.

(b) No constitutional question is properly presented in this case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 2619.]

2. INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

An indictment is sufficient which states the offense in the terms or language of the statute, or so plainly that the nature of the offense charged may be easily understood by the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Indictment and Information, § 182.]

3. CRIMINAL LAW—MISDEMEANORS—PUNISHMENT—STATUTES—PROSPECTIVE OPERATION.

By Pen. Code 1895, § 1089, a definite punishment is prescribed for "every crime declared to be a misdemeanor." The effect of this section is not merely confined to the misdemeanors enumerated in the Code, but has a prospective force.

4. GAMING—SPECULATION IN FUTURES—GAMING HOUSE—WHAT CONSTITUTES—ACTUAL DELIVERY—NECESSITY.

A place where futures are bought and sold on margins is a gaming house.

(a) This is true, although "the contracts are telegraphed out of the state," if the actual wagering or the settlement of the wagers take place in this state.

(b) The Boykin act (Acts 1906, p. 95) has withdrawn from the business of dealing in futures on margins whatever legislative sanction there was to be implied from the fact that by the tax act of the state a license tax had been imposed upon "bucket shops."

(c) An assertion, although made in each transaction, by the customers of an office where futures are bought and sold, that actual delivery is contemplated and understood in all cases, will not prevent the keeper of the office from being guilty of maintaining a gaming house, if as a matter of fact the customers, throughout a continued course of dealings, do not make, tender, or accept actual delivery, but, through the proprietor of the office, settle their winnings and losses in money. The actual facts of the case must override the contradictory alleged contemplation of the parties.

5. CRIMINAL LAW—WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where an indictment contains two counts, and the defendant has been found guilty on both counts, and only one sentence has been imposed, and the evidence authorizes the conviction, errors assigned relating to one count only are immaterial. In this case the evidence authorized the verdict on both counts. The trial having been entirely free from error as to the count in the indictment charging the maintenance of a gaming house, this court will not pass upon alleged errors in the instructions of the court to the jury in relation to the count charging a violation of the Boykin act, commonly known as the "Anti-Bucket Shop Law." [Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 3154.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

C. N. Anderson was convicted under an indictment charging in one count a violation of the Boykin act (Acts 1906, p. 95), commonly known as the "Anti-Bucket Shop Law," and in another a violation of the statute prohibiting gaming houses, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson and Rosser & Brandon, for plaintiff in error. C. D. Hill, Sol. Gen., T. W. Rucker, and R. R. Arnold, for the State.

POWELL, J. This is what is known as the "Bucket Shop Case," being the first to come to this court from a prosecution under the Boykin act (Laws Ga. 1906, p. 95). The title of that act is as follows: "An act to prohibit contracts and agreements for the sale and future delivery of cotton, grain, provisions and other commodities, stocks, bonds and other securities upon margin, commonly known as dealing in futures; to declare such transactions unlawful, and to constitute a misdemeanor on the part of any person, association of persons or corporation participating therein, whether directly or indirectly; to prohibit the establishment, maintenance or operation of any office or other place where such contracts are made or offered; to define what shall constitute prima facie evidence of guilt; to compel all persons participating in such transactions to testify concerning their connection therewith; to provide that no discovery made by any witness which would tend to subject him to conviction or punishment under this act shall be used against such witness in any penal or criminal proceeding, and that he shall be altogether pardoned therefor; to provide that regular commercial exchanges and other bona fide trade organizations may post quotations of market prices, and for other purposes." Section 1 (page 96) provides that "from and after January 1, 1907, it shall be unlawful for any person, association of persons or corporation, either as principal or agent, to establish, maintain or operate an office or other place of business in this state for the purpose of carrying on or engaging in the business, forbidden by this act, commonly called 'dealing in futures on margins,' and any person violating the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." In section 2 it is provided that "every contract or agreement, whether or not in writing, whereby any person or corporation shall agree to buy or sell and deliver, or sell with an agreement to deliver, any wheat, cotton, corn or other commodity, stock, bond, or other security to any other person or corporation when in fact it is not in good faith intended by the parties that an actual delivery of the articles or thing shall be made, is hereby declared to be unlawful, whether made or to be performed wholly within this state or partly within and partly without this state; it being the intent of this act to prohibit any and all contracts or agreements for the purchase or sale and delivery of any commodity or other thing of value on margin, commonly called 'dealing in futures,' when the intention or understanding of the parties is to receive or pay the difference between the agreed price and the market price at the time of settlement: provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to apply to transactions by mail or wire between persons in this state, and persons outside this state where the person outside this state is not represented in this state by any broker, agent or attorney in said transaction." Section 3 makes any person who shall become a party to any of such contracts, personally or as agent, directly or indirectly, or who shall do anything to aid or further such an agreement, guilty of a misdemeanor. Section 4 makes participants competent witnesses and provides immunity from punishment for such as are called to testify. Section 5 (page 97) makes proof of certain things prima facie evidence of guilt of a violation of sections 2 and 3. Section 6 is as follows: "Proof that anything of value agreed to be sold and delivered was not actually delivered, and that one of the parties to such agreement deposited or secured, or agreed to deposit or secure, what are commonly known as 'margins,' shall constitute prima facie evidence of a contract declared unlawful by the terms of this act." Section 7 provides that "proof that any person, association of persons or corporation, either as principal or agent, has established an office or place where are posted or published from information received the fluctuating prices of cotton, grain, provisions, stocks, bonds or other commodity or thing of value, or either of them, shall constitute prima facie evidence of guilt of the offense or offenses prohibited in section 1 of this act." And section 8: "This act shall not be so construed as to prevent or render unlawful the posting or publishing of market quotations or prices of commodities, stocks, bonds, and securities by any regularly organized commercial exchange or other bona fide trade organization in which no purchase or sale for future delivery on margin is permitted; that no person or corporation committing any of the acts or things prohibited in defense thereof to plead the payment of any license or other tax to the state, or to any county or municipality thereof, nor shall the payment of any license or other tax in any wise operate to relieve such offender from the penalties imposed by this act." Conflicting laws are repealed.

The indictment contained two counts, one under this act and the other one under the statute prohibiting gaming houses. The substance of the first count is that the defendant, with others, "in the county aforesaid, on the 25th day of January, in the year of our Lord, 1907, with force and arms, did establish, maintain, and operate an office and place of business for the purpose of carrying on and engaging in the business commonly called 'dealing in futures on margins,' and did then and there, in said office and place of business established for the purpose aforesaid, maintain and operate and engage in a business commonly called 'dealing in futures on margin.'" The second count charges that the same persons did, "in the county aforesaid, on the day aforesaid, keep and maintain a gaming house." The defendant demurred to the first count of the indictment, on the following grounds: "(1) Because the first count of said indictment does not state facts sufficient to charge the defendants, or either of them, with a crime under the laws of the state of Georgia. (2) Because it is not averred in said count that the business which the defendants are alleged to have established, maintained, and operated is 'forbidden' by the act of the Legislature (Acts 1906, p. 95), nor that the business is one in which contracts are made for the future delivery of commodities, and that actual delivery of such commodities is not contemplated. (3) Because the allegations of said count are consistent with innocence under the law, and said count does not point out the details, nor in what ways or particulars the penal laws were violated. (4) Because the act of the Legislature aforesaid, upon which said count is based, prescribes no penalty or punishment for a violation of said act." The demurrer was overruled, and exceptions were duly taken.

The material parts of the evidence are as follows:

The first witness for the state had been a clerk in the defendant's office, both prior and subsequent to January 1, 1907. He testified that in the defendant's office stocks, cotton, and other commodities were bought and sold on margins for future delivery. He was with the defendant for over a year, and no actual deliveries were ever made during that period. On January 1, 1907 (the date the Boykin act went into effect), the defendant made a slight change in the name of his firm; and the room in which they had formerly posted market quotations was turned over to the Atlanta Commercial Exchange. A door which had opened between the defendant's office and this quotation room was closed up, and also the opening through a window. In the larger room, after January 1st, was the Atlanta Commercial Exchange; and in there a blackboard was kept, an operator was on duty, and the fluctuations of the market were posted. None but members of the Atlanta Commercial Exchange were admitted to this room. There were some 60 to 80 members.

"To become a member you just make an application to the secretary and pay $1 a month dues. If a man wants to buy anything, any cotton or stocks or bonds, or wants to sell, he can get the quotations in the larger room, from the blackboard where they are posted; but he can't make a trade in there. For instance, if he wants to buy 100 bales of March cotton, or sell 100 bales of March cotton, he sees that in the larger room on the blackboard, and then if he wants to make a trade he goes to the next room to Mr. C. N. Anderson's [the defendant's] office, coming out of the corridor of the Prudential Building, stepping about 10 feet into another door. Yes, sir; he would come out into the corridor, and go around about 10 feet into another door, to get in where Mr. Anderson is. In there with Mr. Anderson is Mr. Hufaker, an operator, and a boy and myself when I was employed with them. When he goes into Mr. Anderson's office, if he wants to make a trade, he has first to sign a power of attorney, on a blank furnished. Yes; I have seen a great many men make trade there. I have known only one man to make a trade in that place since the 1st of January of this year. The money was handed either to myself or to Mr. Anderson, by Mr. Ewing, to buy stock. I think it was he was buying. I have seen Mr. Ewing do that a great many times since the 1st of January. If he wanted to buy, for instance, $100 worth of stock, he would pay the money to C. N. Anderson & Co.—to Mr. C. N. Anderson. It would be placed to Mr. Ewing's credit. If the stock went down, or whatever he bought went down, he would have to put up additional margin, if he wished to carry the stock. Yes; I have known him to do that. For instance, if he bought any particular stock, expecting it to go up, and it went down, I have known him to come in and put up margins to stay in. Yes, sir; I have seen that done more than once in this county, since the 1st of January, by Mr. Ewing. If Mr. Ewing won, then Mr. Anderson paid him the money in his office, which was adjoining the blackboard room. Yes, sir; they settled by the figures of quotation on the blackboard. The money was paid to Mr. Ewing, if he won, by Mr. Anderson, at that place; if he lost, the money he had already paid was kept by Mr. Anderson and forwarded to whoever the broker was he placed the trade with. His correspondent outside of the state and county was Campbell & Co. That was the only correspondent he had. I don't know who Campbell & Co. was, except they are in Cincinnati. No, sir; I could not swear there was a Campbell & Co. Yes; if he lost, he paid his loss to Mr. Anderson in that room. If he wanted to let his trade go, Mr. Anderson kept the money; and if he wanted to stay in the market, he would have to put up additional margins with Mr. Anderson. If the price of a particular stock he had bought went down, and he didn't put up a margin, the money he had already put up was exhausted, and was sent to Cincinnati by Mr. Anderson. If there was a rise in the price of an article he had bought, and he wanted to close out, then he got his money from Mr. Anderson in that building. He would get the difference between what he bought it at and what he sold at, less the commission. * * * From the room containing the blackboard I would say you would have to go about 15 or 16 feet to get where Mr. Anderson sat."

On cross-examination this witness testified: "The business that C. N. Anderson undertook to do was just acting as agent for people, to transmit orders for execution in some other state. As to my connection with C. N. Anderson & Co., and the duties I performed in connection with that firm, I was clerk, you might say. If any came in, and couldn't write quick enough, and wanted a quick execution, I would assist them in writing it, and they signed all the blanks. I never actually transmitted any of the orders that went through C. N. Anderson & Co. to Cincinnati, except handing them to the operator. In the case of Ewing he came and signed the telegram himself, on a Western Union telegraph blank, and I handed that to the operator, and the operator transmitted it over the wire. Yes; that is true. C. N. Anderson & Co. had no interest in that transaction, except to receive a commission or brokerage from Ewing; that is all. Yes; Ewing paid me and Anderson & Co. the margins to put up for him, and C. N. Anderson & Co. put that up with Campbell & Co. O. N. Anderson, acting as broker for Ewing, when this telegram had been sent in and executed and the trade confirmed, took the margin and sent it on to Campbell & Co. Campbell & Co. were the brokers in Cincinnati. C. N. Anderson & Co. paid Campbell & Co. part of the brokerage they received from Ewing on any other trade that came in. Yes; it is true that, when a telegram was handed to the operator to be forwarded to Campbell & Co., no order was executed, or no statement of execution was handed out to the trader, until Campbell & Co. were heard from. The purpose was, when Ewing filed the telegram with the operator, that wire was sent on to Campbell & Co., and when Campbell & Co. telegraphed back, then C. N. Anderson & Co. took the margin from Ewing and sent it on, and the trade was executed. I cannot recall specifically the several trades that Ewing made, or the exact date. I simply know that Mr. Ewing came in and made trades. I am really testifying about the course of business more than anything else. I can't recall any specific trade where he made a profit or loss. I am satisfied Mr. Ewing made some profit, but I do not recall any specific instance. No; I cannot recall any other person. I was with L. J. Anderson & Co. from the 31st of January, 1906, and with C. N. Anderson from the 1st of January this year, until about the 13th of January or the 15th of January. * * * I don't know whether it was for actual delivery or not. No; I do not know that there was ever any understanding had with Ewing or any other trader that the goods were not to be actually delivered when called for. I don't know anything about that. The members of the association were not required, if they wanted to make trades, to make them through C. N. Anderson & Co. at all. I know of some members of the exchange that did not make any trade at all. Mr. Lincoln is one, a grain man here doing business in Atlanta. I cannot recall any others just now, but I presume I do know others. It is true that there are a number of the members of the exchange who did not have anything to do with C. N. Anderson & Co., and did not operate in there at the time I was there. The two places of business were entirely distinct. C. N. Anderson & Co. had no control over the operations of the exchange. They were brokers pure and simple, for commission, operating only for a commission on employment. I do not know positively that persons who wanted to trade through C. N. Anderson & Co. took their quotations from the board of the Atlanta Commercial Exchange, but I know a great many of them did. Yes; as a matter of fact I simply know that some members of the exchange traded through C. N. Anderson & Co. Yes; C. N. Anderson & Co. had their own operator. It is true, as a matter of fact, that when a trade was closed with which C. N. Anderson & Co. were connected it was closed with the quotation of prices as given by Campbell & Co., in Cincinnati, or by themselves if they made a limited order. If they made a limited order, it went out at that limit, or the trade closed at that time. Whether there was a profit or not, it was settled according to the limit. Q. But where that was not true, where the operator's margin was exhausted and his trade was closed, or where he ordered it closed at a certain figure, that was all done by quotation from Campbell & Co. straight, wasn't it? You didn't have to go to the board for that, did you? A. I will have to commit myself to answer that question. I will have to commit Anderson to answer that question. Q. You say you can't answer that, then? When you stated on direct examination that Anderson always closed the trade and settled by the quotations on that board, you didn't mean that, did you? A. Well, you ask me a direct question now. They were both on the same wire. They got their quotations over the same wire, and that is the reason why I stated what I did on the direct examination. It is a mere deduction of mine. No; it is not true, as a matter of fact, since I think about it, that Anderson & Co. had to go to that blackboard to get the quotations at all. Yes; it frequently happened that a trader who wanted to purchase cotton for future delivery would simply have his order telegraphed in to purchase at the prevailing quotations, and that was all done in Cincinnati. A telegram was simply sent in to Campbell & Co. to execute an order the best they could upon the market at the time they got it, according to the market when they got it, when it was sent without a limit to it. Yes; it frequently happened, when a prospective purchaser wanted to buy at a certain figure and the market in the meantime ran up, that Campbell & Co. could not buy at all, and when they ordered the trade closed out upon the market, whatever the market might be, that was done by Campbell & Co. in Cincinnati, and the market telegraphed in, when the trade was wound up or closed. No; that was not done by any inspection of these blackboards at all."

On redirect examination this witness testified: "As to the purpose of having that blackboard in the room where the quotations and fluctuations of the market were posted, it was to furnish quotations to the members. No; a man could not know anything about the market until he went in to that board, unless he could make a guess at it. A member would get his information upon which he made his trade from this blackboard. The information on the blackboard came from Campbell & Co. That information from Campbell & Co. came on the same wire as C. N. Anderson & Co. They were the same line—the same wire; but Anderson's operator did not take those that were put on the board, you know. Yes; it came over that wire. The same quotations that went on that board came over Anderson's wire. There were two operators, one in Anderson's room and one where the blackboard was, and both of them took the same information of the rise or the fall, or fluctuations, of stock, bonds, cotton, etc., from Campbell & Co. of Cincinnati. Mr. Anderson got those commissions. As to the expense of those quotations, telegraph service, the cost of a wire a day, it didn't cost anything to get those messages, so far as I know. I don't know who paid for them. It cost nothing to my knowledge. I don't know about that. I know prior to the 1st of January it didn't cost, but after the 1st of January I couldn't swear positively whether it cost anything or not. As to how many employees were in those rooms, the two places, there were two where the blackboard was—the operator, and the secretary and treasurer, who was the doorkeeper. The operator marked the quotations. In the other room were only three, after I left; four when I was there. The operator was paid $30 a week, and I was paid $20 a week, and the office boy was paid $3.50 a week. I said that the last I knew of it there were about 75 or 80 members of the exchange that paid a dollar a month."

The Mr. Ewing referred to above was also called as a witness. He testified: "I have bought up there several times since the 1st of January, 1907, but I could not tell you how many times. We have got a board of trade up there, you know, something over 100 members, and we put the quotations on the board as they come in, and we see the quotations, and then send our orders anywhere we please. When I would go in and get the quotations from the board, I would go around in the other room, where Mr. Anderson stayed, to make my trade, when I wanted to go and trade there. I believe Mr. Danne was staying there, and I gave the money to him. Yes; I have paid money to Mr. C. N. Anderson—I have no idea how many times, but 30 or 40 times, I suppose—since the 1st of January, 1907. When I would go and get the quotations from the blackboard and wanted to buy a commodity, I would usually go in and give it to Mr. C. N. Anderson. If the market went up, I got my money from Anderson; if it went against me, I don't know where it went. If it went against me, and I wanted to stay in the market, I would put up more money. When I would put up more money in order to stay in the market, I would give it to Mr. Anderson usually. * * * I am a member of the Atlanta Commercial Exchange. The only good that membership did me was the information it gave me by seeing quotations on the blackboard. That is the reason I went into it. I wanted to see the market. We were not required to trade with C. N. Anderson & Co., not confined to him at all. We could have went anywhere and traded we wanted to. It is true it was explained to us that if we wanted to trade with C. N. Anderson, that they could not act in any other capacity than our agents, and that they would act in that way, if we paid a commission. We always signed a contract to that effect to Anderson, that he was to act as our agent. Yes; we went in there with the understanding that C. N. Anderson & Co. would not act with reference to dealings in any other way, except upon employment to be paid a commission for their services. That was the understanding, and I always signed a contract to that effect—appointed him as my agent. When I put up a margin there I telegraphed through the operator, over the Western Union wire, to the Cincinnati brokers, and they had to telegraph back confirming the trade. Always when I put in an order for a trade I put the money in that way, with the order, and that money was to be forwarded by Mr. Anderson on my behalf, as my agent, when I made the trade through him. I had to put the money in for his protection. He was employed as my agent, to pay it to the people outside the state. I frequently put in orders for a trade and never got it; but I always got my money—no trouble about getting my money back. Yes; I regarded him, through all those transactions, as my representative, my agent, to place orders for me outside the state, for which I paid a compensation. That was the understanding when I began; and when I closed the trade, if there was money coming back to me, I instructed him, as my representative, to get it back and pay it to me. That is all there was of it, and I never had any trouble. He acted mighty nice with me. I took his receipt for the money, and if I didn't get the trade I would go and give him the receipt, and he would give me the money back. I have done that often. Very frequently I would not get a trade at all. Yes; I signed all of these orders that were made and sent over the wire, and they were directed to Campbell & Co., of Cincinnati, and that is the way they were directed. I never got any actual cotton, or stocks, or bonds. I never asked for it. They never offered it to me, and I never did want it. As to whether or not I would buy 100 bales of cotton straight out, I wouldn't have that much money. I could not have paid for 100 bales of cotton. If I bought 100 bales of cotton I would pay $100. I suppose cotton was worth about $45 or $50 a bale. No, sir; I never had any understanding with Campbell & Co. that they would make actual delivery if I required it, because I never expected any actual delivery. No; I had no understanding with them that they would be relieved from delivering cotton if I required it. I never had any contract of that kind at all. I have always understood they would deliver the cotton if I did require it. No; I never saw one of them in my life (referring to Campbell & Co.). The only contract I had was when I wired an order and they confirmed it. That is all; nothing at all said about actual delivery. Nothing was ever said at all about any stipulation between me and them that if they wanted to deliver the stock I would not be required to take it. I don't reckon they knew a thing about my financial responsibility. I never saw Campbell & Co. I was expecting Mr. Anderson to look after that. I have heard a good deal about Campbell & Co., and I supposed I was dealing with them through Anderson. I never settled, except on the rise or fall of the market. That is the way I settled."

The district superintendent of the Western Union Telegraph Company testified that the telegraph wire above referred to connects the defendant's office with Odell's office in Cincinnati. It is a leased wire, and the rental rate is $25 per mile per annum. It is about 500 miles from Atlanta to Cincinnati.

The manager of the Prudential Building, in which these offices are located, testified that the lease of these rooms stands in the name of Walter Campbell, but by Campbell's instructions the rents are paid by draft on the Odell Stock & Grain Company. This includes both rooms, Anderson's office and the blackboard room. The two rooms rent for $1,000 per year.

Another witness testified: "I am in and out there [referring to defendant's office] two or three times a day. I have bought a little cotton up there by telegraph every day. I would sign a telegram, I think, to Cincinnati. I am not positive where it went, but I gave it to a young man there in the office, and he bought me some cotton in Cincinnati, he said. I got the quotation of the cotton, the basis for my trade, in another office, down this way next to the Neal Bank. I think just two doors between, or maybe just one door. There is one door in Mr. Anderson's office, and then I come down this way and go into the blackboard and look up there, and that is where I get my quotations. When I bought cotton I went in the room where Mr. Anderson was. I don't think I bought but 50 bales of cotton, and paid $1 a bale for what I bought. Cotton is worth now, I suppose, about $50 for the actual stuff. I put up $50, and bought 50 bales. That is the way I bought it, or $25 for 25 bales. I think I bought 50 bales up there. I think I made a little on my transaction. Mr. Anderson gave me a check, I think. Yes; in that building there. I work for the Bell Telephone Company. No; I never asked for the delivery of that cotton. They never offered to deliver the cotton to me. I would settle on rise and fall of the market, of course—on the fluctuation."

On cross-examination the same witness testified: "I was in there two or three times a day. Mr. Hamilton occupies the exchange and seems to be in charge there—a gentleman who sits at the door, old man Hamilton, I think. He seems to be manager of the place in there. He tells me he is. Yes; unfortunately, I am a member of the exchange. I pay a dollar a month for the privilege of going in and looking at the board. No; I do not pay anything for the privilege of trading anywhere. I go in and look on the board and get these quotations, and then go and trade where I please. Of course, I could trade in New York or anywhere else I wanted to. I am under no obligations to trade with Anderson any more than with Curran, or any other broker or commission merchant in the city of Atlanta; none whatever. Mr. Whittlesey is the man who puts the quotations on the board. No; I do not believe I have seen either one of those gentlemen in Anderson's office. As to these gentlemen, Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Whittlesey, going to their work every morning just like the clerks in Neal's Bank, they are there; but I don't stay there. As to whether they go home at night when they close business I do not know. I could not tell you where they go. I do not remember ever to have seen them go to Anderson's office. When I go to Anderson's office to make a trade, I just write out a telegram. Yes; I sign my name to it, and I think it goes to Cincinnati, but I am not positive. The order goes to buy or sell a certain number of bales of cotton, according to the rules of the exchange. I saw Mr. Anderson in his office, and I think probably he has a stenographer and operator that I saw in there. No, sir; I never saw these people in the exchange office doing anything. I do not stay there. I have never seen Mr. Anderson and his force doing anything in the exchange at all. I don't remember now to have ever seen Mr. Anderson in there. Yes; that is the way I have understood it, that those two businesses were separately conducted, so far as I can see. No more connection between Anderson and this exchange than between the Neal Bank and the exchange, so far as I can see or know. Those quotations are put on a board in the exchange room. I never saw any board in Anderson's office. There are no quotations published in Anderson's office, any more than in the Neal Bank. I never gave Mr. Whittlesey, the operator in the Commercial Exchange, an order for cotton, stocks, oats, grain, barley, or anything else. As to whether or not I would have seen if anybody else had given an order while I was there, I don't pay much attention to that. I just pass in and out, you know. No; I never saw anybody give Mr. Hamilton, the secretary, an order, and I never saw anybody pay him any money for stocks or bonds or futures. In that room where the Commercial Exchange is conducted, the only business done is transacted by Mr. Hamilton, the secretary (who sits at the door and admits members and puts out nonmembers), and the receiving of quotations by Mr. Whittlesey, the operator, and putting them on the blackboard—is all I have seen done there. If anything else was done in there I would have seen it, I suppose. As you go into that room from the hallway the operator sits to your right, as you enter, and Mr. Hamilton sits to the left, close to the door, with a table to his left, and the members of the exchange sit and watch the board, or come in or go out. This is all I have ever seen done in that room—the operator posting the quotations on the board, and Mr. Hamilton, the secretary, admitting the members and keeping out nonmembers. I don't think I ever traded for anything but a little cotton. I think I gave my orders to Mr. Anderson or the operator. I am not positive which. I don't remember exactly, but I think my telegrams were addressed to Cincinnati, Ohio, to buy a certain number of bales of cotton at a certain price. I fixed the price. Supposing I order 50 bales of cotton, say of May deliveries, say at 9 cents, the price of the order I gave would be fixed at the place of execution in Cincinnati. If I should send a dispatch to buy me 50 bales of cotton at the market quotation, the price would be the quotations at Cincinnati, I would think. I went by the prices on the board in the Commercial Exchange room, but it was confirmed in Cincinnati. I suppose, when I would go in and see the price of cotton, if May delivery was 9.50, and I would send a telegram to Cincinnati, to buy me a certain number of bales, I suppose they would buy it at the market where the concern was that was representing it. I suppose they would buy it at the market they had there, in the state of Ohio. Yes; before my order was executed I would get a return wire from Cincinnati, confirming my trade, telling me they had executed my order in Cincinnati, at 9.50, or 9.45, or whatever the price might have been. I suppose that is the way it is done. Yes; in this transaction Mr. Curtis Anderson, the broker, was simply my agent executing my order. That is what he said. Of course, he was my agent. I was trading through him. I paid him a commission to represent me. It cost me so much to make the trade. No; I never did go into Mr. Anderson's place of business and telegraph an order to any other place in Georgia for execution; but I always telegraphed my order outside of the state. That is my understanding. The $50 I would put up for 50 bales of cotton, I suppose, was just the margin in the trade, you know. I don't remember that I saw the contract under which I purchased that cotton. They handed me a telegram, I think. They always gave you a contract. No; I have not a copy of one of those contracts. No; I don't know what the intention of Campbell & Co., or anybody else that I bought this cotton from, was. There was no agreement between me and my agent, C. N. Anderson & Co., or between the firm in Cincinnati, that there was not to be a delivery of this cotton; no contract between us at all; no actual agreement about it; nothing that I know of. I bought this amount of cotton, and paid this amount of money, the amount named in the contract, for future delivery, and that was the whole contract; all I know about it. Just buy so many bales of cotton, and pay so much money. I have been told that there were about 100 members of this exchange. That is all I know. I see the members of this exchange in there, when I would go in from time to time. The members of the exchange go in there and look at the quotations, and then go out and send their orders anywhere they please. Yes, sir; there are a great many members of this exchange who are dealing in grain and other commodities, flour men and so on, who go in there; but I couldn't say whether they made trades or not. I would see them in there with other members."

For the defense several gentlemen testified that they were members of the Atlanta Commercial Exchange, and that they themselves had no relation with the defendant. They did not buy or sell futures; but, being in the actual business of dealing in grain, etc., desired the market quotations for business purposes.

The defendant's statement is as follows: "I am a member of the firm of C. N. Anderson & Co., who are general brokers in the city of Atlanta. We consulted attorneys before we ever began our business, and believed that we were within the law of Georgia, and we had no intention of violating the laws and would not do so if we knew it. We are purely brokers; got no interest in these transactions you have heard about whatsoever, except to receive our commission. We require every customer who places one of these orders to sign a power of attorney, authorizing us to act as their agent, before we place any orders whatsoever. Campbell & Co. are brokers in Cincinnati, and trade on the different exchanges throughout the country, not for themselves, but for their clients. We have no connection whatever with Campbell & Co. of Cincinnati, not the slightest. The only connection whatsoever we have with them is to get our commission from our customers. We pay them a part of that commission to handle these orders for our customers. We pay our rent to Walter Campbell. As to the commercial agency, I don't know anything about their rent. Their business is entirely separate from mine, and we have no connection with them whatsoever."

Samples of the contracts signed by the defendant's customers were introduced. They were in the following terms: "I do hereby constitute and appoint C. N. Anderson & Co. my lawful agents and brokers, with authority to place for me such orders as I may give them, with such persons and in such markets as they may select, located outside of the state of Georgia, for the purchase or sale of bonds, stocks, cotton, grain, and other produce, either for present or future delivery, and I agree to pay them the usual and customary commission allowed by brokers for like services, for all such services rendered to me by them; and, in cases of orders for future delivery, I agree to furnish them with the usual and customary margins required, to be placed for my account with those to whom said orders are given, provided that the said agents and brokers shall not be bound to place any orders given to them by me, unless they so desire."

The defendant also introduced samples of the statements sent by Campbell & Co. to Anderson & Co., showing daily transactions. These statements contained, at the head thereof, the following language: "Below we submit a statement of business transacted for your account as ordered. On all marginal business the right is reserved to close transactions when margins are running out, without giving further notice; we being governed in this by the market quotations as received at our office. We solicit and receive no business, except with the understanding that the actual delivery of the property bought or sold upon orders in all cases is contemplated and understood. All unfilled orders expire with the day, unless ordered open."

Defendant also put in evidence the articles of association of the Atlanta Commercial Exchange, in substance as follows: "The undersigned do, by subscribing this agreement, hereby associate ourselves together in good faith, as a trade organization or association, for the purposes hereinafter stated, agreeing among ourselves to do and perform the matters and things hereinafter set out; and we consent and agree that any person or persons who may hereafter duly sign this agreement, or any correct copy thereof, shall become a member of the organization, or association. The purpose of this association or organization is to establish a place and conduct an office, or offices, for the posting and publishing of market quotations or prices of commodities, stocks, bonds, and securities, upon blackboards or otherwise, for the mutual benefit and advantage of the members of the association. It is agreed and distinctly understood that the organization or association shall neither directly nor indirectly purchase or sell, for future delivery on margin, any of the articles or things the market prices of which are quoted and published thereby; nor shall it, directly or indirectly, permit any person, or persons, or corporation, to use its offices, or in connection with the association, in the purchase or sale, for future delivery on margin, of any such articles or things. The publication in its offices of market quotations, or prices, as aforesaid, is to be strictly for the advantage and benefit of the members of the association or organization, and each of them, in the conduct of their private affairs, and in conformity with the act of the General Assembly of Georgia, relative to dealing in 'futures,' approved August 20, 1906. It is agreed and understood that, so soon as practicable, the association or the members thereof shall be duly incorporated under the laws of Georgia, under the name and style of 'Atlanta Commercial Exchange,' or such other name or style as may hereafter be agreed upon. It is further agreed and understood that a president, or other executive of the association, shall be forthwith elected, as also a secretary and treasurer, who shall hold their position, with such duties attached thereto as are usual in connection with such offices, until the association shall be duly incorporated, organized, and regular officers elected. Such president or executive head to receive a monthly salary of _____ dollars, and such secretary and treasurer to receive a monthly salary of _____ dollars. It is agreed that the president or executive head may employ an operator, rent offices, and equip the same, and undertake any other expense, within reason, as he may deem necessary to the proper operation of the offices and the conduct of the business of the association, until the due incorporation thereon. Our attorneys, Messrs. Anderson & Anderson, of Atlanta, Georgia, are herewith authorized forthwith to proceed to incorporate said association, in accordance with the spirit of this agreement, and to prepare by-laws for its operation, and submit the same to the incorporators upon the organization of the company. This the 28th day of December, 1906." Signed by C. N. Anderson and about 75 others.

1. Since it is the duty of this court to certify to the Supreme Court, for instructions, any questions as to the constitutionality of the statute under which the defendant was indicted, if such a question is properly made and is necessary to the determination of the case by this court, we have first investigated the record with the view of ascertaining whether any such questions are so made. We find the following assignments of error in which apparent attempts to attack the constitutionality of the Boykin act, or portions thereof are made. In the bill of exceptions, in assigning error upon the exceptions pendente lite, the following ground is set forth: "That the court erred (and the verdict of the jury was void) for that said act of the Legislature of Georgia, known as the 'Boykin Act,' is absolutely void, in that it contravenes the Constitution of the state of Georgia, because it is a special act prescribing a rule of law where there are general provisions of law covering the case, and because said act violates the Constitution of the United States, in that it denies to persons falling under the operation of the law the equal protection of the laws; and because said act, as a whole, opposes and nullifies the fundamental rule of law in American criminal jurisprudence, that a person charged with crime is presumed to be innocent until proven guilty by the prosecuting power beyond a reasonable doubt." This fails to raise a constitutional question, for two reasons: Reviewing courts will not pass upon the constitutionality of an act of the General Assembly, unless it appears that the question was made or presented in the court below and was passed upon by the trial judge; nor unless it clearly appears from the record what clause or paragraph of the Constitution it is claimed that the statute violates. S. F. & W. Ry. Co. v. Hardin, 110 Ga. 433, 437, 35 S. E. 681; Jones v. Oemler, 110 Ga. 209, 35 S. E. 375; Brown v. State, 114 Ga. 60, 39 S. E. 873; Newkirk v. So. Ry. Co., 120 Ga. 1048, 48 S. E. 426; State v. Henderson, 120 Ga. 781, 48 S. E. 334 (7); Henderson v. State, 123 Ga. 466, 51 S. E. 385; Mpore v. Houston County, 124 Ga. 898, 53 S. E. 506; Prey v. Oemler, 120 Ga. 224, 47 S. E. 546 (2); Laffitte v. Burke, 113 Ga. 1000, 39 S. E. 433. See, also, Vanderford v. Brand, 126 Ga. 72, 54 S. E. 822; Sowell v. State, 126 Ga. 108, 54 S. E. 916; Seale v. State, 126 Ga. 643, 55 S. E. 472.

In one of the grounds of the motion for a new trial error is assigned upon the court's having instructed the jury, in the language of the Boykin act, that "wherever it is proven that any person, association of persons, or corporation has, either as principal or agent, an established office or place where are posted or published, from information received, the fluctuating prices of cotton, grain, provisions, stocks, bonds, or other commodity or thing of value, or either of them, this shall constitute prima facie evidence of guilt of the offense prohibited in section one of this act," and as ground of error it is set out that "the portion of the charge complained of was also error, because the section of the Boykin act which provides that proving that one has an office, or place of business, where there are posted the fluctuating prices of the market, constitutes prima facie guilt of maintaining or operating an office or other place of business for the purpose of carrying on and engaging in the business commonly called 'dealing in futures on margins,' is void. It violates the fundamental principle which has come down to us from our forefathers, and which applies to all criminal cases, that one charged with crime should be presumed to be innocent until proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. The provision of the act referred to absolutely makes the doing of a thing, not only innocent under the act, but distinctly permitted by the act, an evidence of the commission of a crime; that is to say, it makes the proof of an innocent thing prima facie evidence of the commission of a thing entirely distinct and separate which is made penal. Said provision of the Boykin act is also void because it is a special act prescribing a rule of law where there are general provisions of law covering the case. It makes a particular rule of evidence, and raises a particular presumption as to a certain offense made penal, whereas there are general provisions of law (1) to the effect that in all criminal cases the defendant must be proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt; (2) that in all criminal prosecutions which rest upon circumstantial evidence the circumstances must be sufficient to exclude every hypothesis other than guilt; otherwise, there can be no conviction. The provision of the Boykin act above referred to, therefore, violates the Constitution of the state, that any special legislative enactment, where there is a general law applicable, is void." Although presented to the trial court, this assignment fails to properly present the constitutional question, since no clause or paragraph of the Constitution is specified therein. We may be pardoned for saying, obiter, that, if these questions had been properly presented, the constitutional objections could hardly have been regarded as meritorious, in the light of the decisions of the Supreme Court in Banks v. State, 124 Ga. 15, 52 S. E. 74, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1007, and Loeb v. State, 75 Ga. 263, and of this court in Mulkey v. State, 1 Ga. App. 521, 57 S. E. 1022.

2. In regard to the point raised by demurrer, as to the first count of the indictment, that it does not negative the idea that in the business alleged to have been carried on by the defendant the actual delivery of commodities was contemplated, it will be noted that the title of the act does not incorporate this exception, and, if this exception exists at all, the act has nevertheless declared in general terms the dealing in futures on margins to be unlawful. The spirit of the following cases so clearly confutes this point that a citation of them seems sufficient: Williams v. State, 89 Ga. 483, 15 S. E. 552; Rumph v. State, 119 Ga. 121, 45 S. E. 1002; Herring v. State, 114 Ga. 96, 39 S. E. 866; Kitchens v. State, 116 Ga. 847, 43 S. E. 256; Tigner v. State, 119 Ga. 114, 45 S. E. 1001; Sowell v. State, 126 Ga. 105, 54 S. E. 916 (2); Kemp v. State, 120 Ga. 158, 47 S. E. 548 (4); Seale v. State, 121 Ga. 745, 49 S. E. 740; Oglesby v. State, 121 Ga. 602, 49 S. E. 708. The first section of the act, in general terms, makes criminal the maintenance of an office or place of business for the carrying on of the business commonly called "dealing in futures on margins"; and the words, "forbidden by this act," are merely in the nature of an epithet, and do not limit the generality of the section. The second section of the act is a legislative amplification of the definition of the words, "commonly called dealing in futures," but does not have the effect of taking from them anything adhering in their ordinary meaning. Not only is it unlawful to do those things commonly called "dealing in futures," as the words in their ordinary acceptance mean, but also to do any of the other things mentioned in the second section of the act, if they are not already included in the ordinary meaning of the words "dealing in futures." An indictment is sufficient which states the offense in the terms and language of the statute, or so plainly that the nature of the offense charged may be easily understood by the jury. Pen. Code 1895, § 929.

3. The contention in the demurrer that the act prescribes no penalty is altogether without merit. A violation of its provisions is declared to be a misdemeanor; and by Pen. Code 1895, § 1039, a definite punishment for "every crime declared to be a misdemeanor" is prescribed.

4. Error is assigned upon the following charge of the court: "If the defendant conducted an establishment where transactions of the kind just described were permitted (that is, dealing in futures on margins, contrary to the Boykin act), allowed, and encouraged, to the defendant's knowledge, and with his participation therein, or, that is, if persons came together and bought or sold commodities, with an agreement for future delivery, when it was not in good faith intended to deliver the commodities, and when the undertaking of the parties is to receive or pay the difference between the agreed price and the market price at the time of settlement, then the defendant, if that is established beyond a reasonable doubt from the evidence in this case, would be guilty of maintaining a gaming house, as defined in the second count of this indictment." This raises the distinct question whether one who operates an office where "futures" are bought and sold is guilty of the offense of keeping a gaming house. We do not think that at common law such an office would have been a gaming house. We also recognize the distinction between the meaning of the words "betting," "wagering," "gaming," and "gambling." Yet we are constrained to hold that by judicial evolution and legislative enactment the common-law offense of keeping a gaming house has been so broadened in its scope as to include any place wherein persons are allowed to assemble for the purpose of betting, wagering, gaming, or gambling, and especially where such practices are encouraged by the proprietor. We cannot give full credit to the spirit of the cases of Thrower v. State, 117 Ga. 753, 45 S. E. 126, and Jones v. State, 120 Ga. 186, 47 S. E. 561, without reaching this conclusion. It may be that in the cases just cited the Supreme Court gave to the meaning of the word "gaming house" an unwarranted extension (we do not say they did, or did not), and it may be that a strained distinction may be drawn between the business under consideration in this case and that denounced in those cases; but if we give those cases full faith as precedents, as not only propriety, but also the Constitution itself, requires us to do, we are obliged to hold that a gaming house is no longer to be regarded as a place prohibited, as at common law, because the spirit of amusement found there entices laborers and apprentices from their wonted toil, but as a place which it is criminal to keep because persons congregate there to wager or to hazard money or other things of value, whatever be the device whereby it is accomplished, whether by games of amusement or otherwise. However, it may be noted that by English statute antedating our adoption of the laws of the mother country it was contemplated that the word "gaming house" should have a progressive meaning. By St. 33 Hen. VIII, c. 9, § 11, it is enacted that "no manner of person or persons, of what degree, quality, or condition soever he or they be, from the feast of the nativity of St. John the Baptist now next coming, by himself, factor, deputy, servant, or other person, shall for his or their gain, lucre, or living, keep, have, hold, occupy, exercise, or maintain, any common-house, alley or place of bowling, coytling, cloysh-cayles, half-bowl, tennis, dicingtable, or carding, or any other manner of game prohibited by any estatute heretofore made, or any unlawful new game now invented or made, or any other new unlawful game, hereafter to be invented, found, had or made, upon pain to forfeit and pay for every day keeping, having or maintaining, or suffering any such game to be had, kept, executed, played, or maintained within any such house, garden, alley, or other place, contrary to the form and effect of this estatute, forty shillings." 1 Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown (8th Ed.) 721. In the case of Rex v. Howell (K. B. 1872) 3 Keble, 510, "the defendant being convicted of keeping a common cock-pit six days, the court conceived it an unlawful game and took their measure by St. 23 Hen. VIII, of 40s. a day, though the indictment were at common law."

As to whether buying and selling cotton futures is within this category of gaming, wagering, and gambling, we quote from the opinion in Cunningham v. National Bank, 71 Ga. 403, 51 Am. Rep. 266: "But what is the transaction termed 'futures'? It is this: One person says that I will sell you cotton at a certain time in the future for a certain price. You agree to pay that price, knowing that the person you deal with has no cotton to deliver at the time, but with the understanding that when the time arrives for delivery you are to pay him the difference between the market value of that cotton and the price you agreed to pay if cotton declines, and if cotton advances he is to pay you the difference between what you promised to give and the advance market price. If this is not a speculation on chances, a wagering and betting between the parties, then we are unable to understand the transaction. A betting on a game of faro, brag, or poker cannot be more hazardous, dangerous, or uncertain. Indeed, it may be said that these animals are tame, gentle, and submissive, compared to this monster. The law has caged them and driven them to their dens. They have been outlawed, while this ferocious beast has been allowed to stalk about in open mid-day, with gilded signs and flaming advertisements, to lure the unhappy victim to its embrace of death and destruction. What are some of the consequences of these speculations on 'futures'? The faithful chroniclers of the day have informed us, as growing directly out of these nefarious practices, that there have been bankruptcies, defalcations of public officers, embezzlements, forgeries, larcenies, and death. Certainly no one will contend for one moment that a transaction fraught with such evil consequences is not immoral, illegal, and contrary to public policy. In the case of Rudolf v. Winters, 7 Neb. 126, the Supreme Court of that state held 'that a contract to operate the grain options, to be adjusted according to the difference in the market value thereof, is a contract for a gambling transaction which the law will not tolerate. It is contra bonos mores, and against public policy.' We recognize this ruling to be sound, and we adopt the same. This was also ruled by the Supreme Court of Illinois. Pickering v. Cease, 79 Ill. 328. Likewise in Wisconsin. Everingham v. Melghan, 55 Wis. 354, 13 N. W. 269; Barnard v. Backhaus, 52 Wis. 593, 6 N. W. 252, 9 N. W. 595; Lyon v. Culbertson, 83 Ill. 33, 25 Am. Rep. 349; Gregory v. Wat-towa, 58 Iowa, 713, 12 N. W. 726; Hawley v. Bibb, 69 Ala. 52; Rumsey v. Berry, 65 Me. 574; Yerkes v. Salomon, 11 Hun (N. Y.) 473; Story v. Salomon, 71 N. Y. 420; Peabody v. Speyers, 56 N. Y. 230; Knapp v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. Ry. Co., 6 Mo. App. 206;

Gregory v. Wendell, 39 Mich. 337, 33 Am. Rep. 390, s. c. 40 Mich. 432; Sampson v. Shaw, 101 Mass. 145, 3 Am. Rep. 327; Clarke v. Foss, 7 Biss. 540, Fed. Cas. No. 2,852; In re Green, 7 Biss. 338, Fed. Cas. No. 5,751; Beveridge v. Hewitt, 8 Ill. App. 467; 5 Moore, 571; Thompson Bros. v. Cummings & Co., 68 Ga. 124; Porter v. Massengale, 68 Ga. 296."

The same decision also quotes approvingly from Brua's Appeal, 55 Pa. 298, as follows: "Anything which induces men to risk their money or property, without any other hope for return than to get for nothing any given amount from another, is gambling, and demoralizing to the community, no matter by what name it may be called."

It is insisted, however, that since the current tax act (Acts 1905, p. 28) levies a tax of $1,000 upon all persons engaged in the business of buying or selling futures, such legislative sanction has been given to this business as to prevent the maintenance of an office for that purpose from being a gaming house. It is true that it was held in Miller v. Shropshire, 124 Ga. 829, 53 S. E. 335, that, "irrespective of whether a purely speculative transaction in cotton is a 'gaming' contract, within the meaning of Civ. Code 1895, § 3671, inasmuch as the General Assembly permits one paying a license tax to engage in the business of buying and selling 'futures,' he cannot be subjected to the penalty imposed by that section, which declares that 'money or property delivered up upon' a gaming consideration 'may be recovered back from the winner by the loser, if he shall sue for the same in six months after the loss,' or, if he shall fail to bring suit within that period, 'by any person, at any time within four years (thereafter), for the joint use of himself and the educational fund of the county.'" However, by the Boykin act all legislative sanction is expressly withdrawn from such transactions. See Odell v. Atlanta, 97 Ga. 670, 25 S. E. 173. The Boykin act, being the latest expression of the legislative mind, controls; and it pro tanto repeals so much of the tax act as previously had the effect of sanctioning, for any purpose, dealing in futures.

The point is also made that this charge is entirely unjustified by the evidence; and it is contended that the evidence shows, without conflict, that Anderson was a broker, pure and simple, who acted only for parties in the state of Georgia, upon their employment, as their agent, for a commission paid by them; that he dealt only with parties outside the state in executing orders for future delivery; and that in all cases the parties outside of the state and C. N. Anderson contemplated actual delivery. A very similar contention was disposed of in Jones v. State, supra. As was said there: "When a man desired to make a bet, he filled out an application to be telegraphed to Roots in New Orleans, and at the same time handed in the amount of money he wished to risk on the horse selected. This money was received by Jones, or one of his agents. So far as appears from the record, the applicant never received any notice, before the race was run, as to whether his bet was accepted or rejected. After the race was over, the result of the race was announced, and another agent of Jones, in the same house, paid the winnings to those who had won. Where the bet was lost, the money which had accompanied the application was deposited by Jones to the credit of Roots. Under this state of facts we think that the money was hazarded in the house in question. The bettor deposited it there, and lost it if he failed to win, or regained it if he did win. The whole transaction as to the money took place in this house. This was the very object for which the house was kept. It was of itself an invitation to the people to go to that place and make their offers to bet, depositing their money with the proprietor of the house. While there is no law in this state to punish the bettors, there is a law for the punishment of the proprietor of such a house in which people can meet daily to bet on horse races and hazard their money thereon. The money was not sent to New Orleans. It was placed in the keeping of the accused, and he kept it if the bettor lost, or repaid it, together with the winnings, if the bettor won. It is clear to our minds that the money was hazarded in the house kept by Jones. The fact that Roots had the right to accept or reject an offer to bet makes no difference. The proof shows that he did accept bets from several of the witnesses, or at least that they were paid or not according to the result of the race. It seems to us that the whole system was a mere device or sham to evade the criminal law upon this subject—an effort to evade, based upon a technical definition of the word 'betting,' and an artificial distinction as to where the bet was consummated. As was once said by Judge Bleckley: 'It is something easier for an offender to baffle the dictionary than the Penal Code; for the former is perplexed with verbal niceties and shades of meaning, while the latter grasps in a broad, practical way at the substantial transactions of men.'" The facts of this case are so very similar to those of the Jones Case as to make further comment unnecessary.

We are not unmindful of the fact that in the case at bar the defendant furnished to his customer a statement of business on which was printed the words: "Actual delivery of property bought or sold upon orders in all cases is contemplated and understood." But we are not forgetful of the fact that in all the transactions of the defendant's office no actual delivery ever took place. If actual delivery was "contemplated," its inchoate entity never developed into tangibility. If it was "understood," the temptation to ridicule becomes irresistible. One of the definitions of the word "understand" is "to supply mentally as in explanation of an ellipsis," and the course of dealings which took place through defendant's office will not authorize a wider meaning, for from the evidence there was an entire ellipsis of actual deliveries. Such devices rarely fool intelligent judges or juries. Only the very simple would be deceived into believing that a house of assignation was a respectable hotel because there might happen to be a notice posted at the door stating that "Ladies accompanied by gentlemen other than their lawful husbands will not be furnished accommodations here."

5. We have set out at great length, we fear unduly so, the evidence in this case. But we think that through this full statement of the facts as shown on the trial any impartial mind will be able to discover that a device, elaborate in detail, was planned for the evasion of the law, but that, despite it all, the defendant failed to conceal plain and unmistakable evidences of his guilt. We have no hesitancy in saying that the evidence authorized the verdict under both counts; but, since it will be unnecessary for us to pass upon errors in instructions given or refused as to matters relating only to the first count, if the conviction can be upheld under the second count (for only one sentence was imposed), we may rest our judgment upon the sufficiency of the evidence as to the conviction on that count alone. In this view of the case, errors, if any were committed, which relate only to the first count are immaterial, and therefore would not authorize a reversal. Having held that one who keeps an office for the purpose of affording an opportunity to persons to buy and sell futures on margins can be convicted of keeping a gaming house, irrespective of whether the contracts are telegraphed out of the state or not, we have no difficulty in sustaining the conviction. It is not necessary that we should pass upon the question whether it is essential that the wagering intent—the intent to speculate, without bona fide contemplation of actual delivery—should be present in the minds of both the contracting parties before the transaction is unlawful; for in every trade which took place through the defendant's office, so far as the evidence discloses, and, therefore, so far as the legality of this conviction is concerned, it is conclusively shown that no actual deliveries were had, and that no such intention bona fide existed in the mind of either party. When one of the defendant's customers lost, the other party to the contract did not require delivery. He took the money deposited with the defendant. When the customer won, this undisclosed counter party did not tender delivery; but Anderson at once paid over to the customer the amount of his winnings. In such a course of dealings the irresistible inference is that both parties acted upon the contract as a purely wagering transaction, and that the defendant was the mere go-between, the mutual agent of both parties. If two gentlemen had met in the defendant's office, and had called for cards and poker chips, and the defendant had furnished them, charging so much for the chips, being stakeholder as it were, and at the end of the game had cashed these chips, would he be heard to assert, in defense to an indictment for keeping a gaming house, that one of the gentlemen did not intend to play for money, that he was merely playing for amusement, that in fact, at the very time of paying for his chips, he signed a written statement that it was always contemplated and understood that the playing was for amusement only, and not for money or other thing of value? No matter how solemnly either one or both of these gentlemen who played at this game of futures may have asserted that actual delivery was contemplated and understood, as matter of fact they did not play that way. The record discloses the identity of some of the gentlemen who played on one side of this fascinating game, but it is silent as to who was the counter party or parties. Be that as it may, it is very clear that this undisclosed player had a representative present in the transaction, who took care of his winnings and who paid his losses—the defendant. He may not have known the defendant, and the defendant may not have known him; but one may be an agent for an unknown and unseen principal.

These outlawed occupations often attempt to conceal their true inwardness by devious ways and indirect dealings; but the law looks only to the real substance of the transaction. Think of the shrewd device by which, on January 1, 1907, when the Boykin act went into effect, the door between the two rooms formerly used en suite by the defendant was closed and nailed up, and the room, in which continued those acts denounced by the statute as evidences of guilt, was transferred to the apparently complete custody of the Atlanta Commercial Exchange, an organization containing in its membership several excellent gentlemen who needed market quotations for absolutely legitimate purposes, as well as several others who had no such legitimate uses for them; e. g. telephone employes who bought and sold cotton. But who paid for the maintenance of this room where the fluctuating market was represented on the blackboard? Will it be contended that the office rent, the wages of the employes, and the annual rental, of approximately $12,500, for the leased wire to Cincinnati, were paid out of the modest sum of $1 per month contributed by each of the 100 members of this exchange? Is there not some significance in the fact that a telegraph instrument in the defendant's office ticked simultaneously with the other on the same wire in the quotation room, and that the Odell Stock & Grain Company paid the drafts for the rent of both rooms; that the Odell Company paid the rent, though the lease stood in the name of Campbell, and that to Campbell the defendant's customers telegraphed; and that from

Campbell came the statements in return, and that this telegraph wire had one terminus in Odell's office in Cincinnati and the other in this quotation room, touching the defendant's office en passant? Such a tangled web to be so innocent! Perhaps the jury may have conceived the idea that the defendant and Campbell were merely the Odell Company's agents; that this same Odell Company was the undisclosed principal, whose losses the defendant paid, whose winnings he collected. If they did, we shall not say that they have thereby outraged logic.

We find the trial free from material error, and the verdict well supported by the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

(2 Ga. App. 53)

VINSON v. WILLINGHAM COTTON MILLS.

WILLINGHAM COTTON MILLS v. VINSON.

(Nos. 233, 234.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 24, 1907.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—DUTY TO PROVIDE SAFE MACHINERY.

It is not incumbent upon persons or corporations using machinery in the prosecution of their business to procure the best and safest machinery which can be made. It is sufficient if the machinery is of a kind in general use, and reasonably safe for all persons who operate it with ordinary care and diligence. "No manufacturing or business establishment is bound at its peril to make use only of the best implements and the best machinery and the safest methods." Cooley, J., in Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Smithson, 7 N. W. 793, 45 Mich. 219.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 173.]

2. SAME—WARNING AND INSTRUCTING SERVANT—INEXPERIENCED AND YOUTHFUL EMPLOYE.

An employé 18 years of age, who has had 7 months' experience and 2 months' special instructions in her particular line of work, and in connection with the special kind of machinery used in such work, is not an inexperienced child of tender years, so as to impose upon her employer any exceptional degree of care.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 141.]

3. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In a suit by a servant against his master for personal injuries, the burden is upon the servant to show negligence, causing the injuries, by the master; and a servant, while working with dangerous machinery, is bound to exercise due diligence to avoid any casualty to himself, and if he fails to exercise such care he cannot recover, though the master himself may have been at fault.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 674.]

4. NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Negligence, to be the basis of a recovery, must be the proximate cause of the injury; and if the injury would have occurred, regardless of the negligent act, there can be no recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, §§ 69, 71, 73.]

5. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The evidence introduced by the plaintiff, and all reasonable deductions therefrom, failed to establish the allegations of negligence against the master, but, on the contrary, showed that the servant's injury was caused by her own neglect to exercise ordinary and due care in connection with her work.

6. SAME.

Under the foregoing well-settled principles of law, the judgment granting a nonsuit was right.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 987-994.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by Lella Vinson, by next friend, against the Willingham Cotton Mills. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Defendant assigns a cross-bill. Judgment affirmed on the main bill of exceptions, and the cross-bill dismissed.

Glawson & Fowler, Jos. H. Hall, and J. E. Hall, for plaintiff in error. Hardeman & Jones and John P. Ross, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Plaintiff in error, a minor 18 years of age, by next friend, sued her employer, the defendant in error, for injuries sustained while engaged at the work she was employed to do. Her petition alleged that she was operating a loom, and, while so employed, was struck in the eye with a shuttle, which was thrown out of its place. Her employer was alleged to have been negligent in the following particulars: (1) In failing to provide a shuttle guard, an appliance in general use in cotton mills of similar character; (2) in failing to instruct and warn its employé of the great danger attending her work as a loom operator because of the absence of a shuttle guard on the loom, the employé, by reason of immaturity and inexperience, not knowing and having no opportunity to know of this danger. These two allegations of negligence, although somewhat elaborated by the allegations and the evidence in support thereof, present substantially the charges of negligence made against the employer. We will consider these two grounds in their order.

The machinery was not alleged to have been defective or out of repair, and there was no latent defect; but, because of the defendant's failing to provide a shuttle guard, it was charged that the machinery was not equal in kind to that in general use, and was not reasonably safe for all persons to operate it with ordinary care and diligence. A shuttle guard is a steel rod fixed to the "reed cap," directly over the shuttle as it passes from side to side of the loom. This guard extends directly over the path of the shuttle, and is a device in general use in all cotton mills. It prevents the shuttle from flying up while the loom is in operation. It does not prevent it from flying out. The flying shuttle strikes the guard, and is thus deflected from its course, and is prevented from flying up, and made to fly out on the side by the guard. The loom in use by the defendant was of the Crumpton & Knowles manufacture, and they make the best and most modern types of looms. These looms were used for the manufacture of hose and belting duck, and no shuttle guards are ever used on these looms in the manufacture of such material; but, in the place of a shuttle guard, there is used what is called a "reed cap," projecting above the race board of the shuttle, and occupying, with reference to the shuttle, the place of the shuttle guard. In other words, a reed cap on the Crumpton & Knowles loom for the manufacture of hose and belting duck, such as were used in the defendant's mills, performs the same functions as the shuttle guard. The evidence on this allegation of negligence, as introduced by the plaintiff, therefore, established the fact that the machine in question was manufactured by machinists of the best skill and character, was of the best and most modern type, and had the usual appliance attached to such looms for the protection of operatives from flying shuttles. It is a general rule of law that the master is not required to provide an absolutely safe machine, but only one equal in kind to that in general use. Civ. Code 1895, § 2611; Ala. Midland Ry. Co. v. Guilford, 119 Ga. 523, 46 S. E. 855; Davis v. Augusta Factory, 92 Ga. 712, 18 S. E. 974. As illustrating the danger or safety in operating this character of looms, the plaintiff testified that during the six or seven months in which she had been occupied operating one of the looms only one shuttle had flown out, from over 100 looms in operation, and that this one was from a loom which was out of fix. We therefore conclude that the testimony failed to support the allegation of negligence as to the dangerous character and condition of the machinery used by the master.

But, if not having a shuttle guard was a dangerous defect, it was perfectly patent to the operator. It is insisted that she was a minor of tender years, and inexperienced in the use of such machinery, and that her employer was guilty of negligence in failing to instruct and warn her of the danger attending her work as a loom operator because of the absence of shuttle guards on the looms. The evidence for the plaintiff showed that she was 18 years of age, and she was not shown to have been deficient in intelligence. She had been running a loom for 6 or 7 months, and had 5 months' experience in running the loom by which she was injured and 2 months' special instruction by her employer before she was permitted to run the loom. It is therefore fair to presume that she knew how to operate a loom. She knew that shuttles did sometimes fly out of the looms; for one flew out of her loom once before. She knew that it was the duty of the operator to watch the shuttle, so that, if the thread broke or got tangled, she could stop the loom and fix it; and she knew that, if the broken threads got tangled or "wadded up," it would cause the shuttle to fly out. The evidence showed that the shuttles do not fly out in front, where the operator should stand when operating the machine, but that they do fly out either to the right or left. The plaintiff's testimony on the foregoing points shows that she was not inexperienced. It shows that she knew how to operate a loom. She stated that she had been in the habit of operating two looms, but that on the day she was injured she was only operating one; that while her loom was in operation she took her seat upon the stool on the side of the loom, and with her back to it, and was reading a newspaper or book. She knew that her duties required her to constantly watch the shuttle to prevent an accident if the threads broke or got tangled. Her own expert witness testified that such conduct on her part was unsafe. "It was unsafe for the weaver to sit in front of the loom, with her head on a level with the shuttle, and be engaged in reading at the time, and not watching the shuttle for the purpose of filling the shuttle and repairing the breaks. It is the duty of the operator to watch the work, to repair such breaks as soon as they occur. It is unsafe for the operator to run a loom, paying no attention to the loom, and leave breaks in a warp thread unrepaired, and then sit down with her head on a level with the shuttle course or lath of the loom." It might, therefore, be conceded that the master was negligent in not providing a shuttle guard, yet, as shuttle guards do not prevent shuttles from flying out at the slides, but only out at the front, the plaintiff's own negligence was the proximate cause of her injury. It cannot, under her own testimony and that of her expert witness, be reasonably contended that she was in the exercise of due care; but her own carelessness was the cause of her injury. This evidence overwhelmingly shows that the safe way to operate a loom was to stand up in front and constantly watch, and that the unsafe way was to sit down at the end of the loom and become absorbed in reading. It can hardly be doubted that, if the plaintiff had been watching to prevent the result of broken threads, she would not have been hurt. Having, with her experience and knowledge, voluntarily selected the unsafe way to perform her work, she cannot recover. Civ. Code 1895, § 2612; Brush Electric Co. v. Wells, 103 Ga. 515, 30 S. E. 533; McDaniel v. Acme Brewing Co., 113 Ga. 80, 33 S. E. 404; Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Skipper, 125 Ga. 368, 54 S. E. 110.

In addition to what has been stated, it may be said that the proof is clear that the absence of a shuttle guard in no wise contributed to the injury of the plaintiff. If there had been a shuttle guard, it would have prevented the shuttle from flying out towards the front and have deflected it to the side. In other words, with a guard the shuttle would have taken the same course that it did take, and it is not unreasonable to suppose that the reed cap, which on this type of machine occupies the same place that the shuttle guard does to other machines, did prevent the shuttle from flying out to the front, and did deflect it to the side. It seems, therefore, inevitable that the shuttle guard in this case would not only have prevented the injury to the plaintiff, but, in connection with her own careless conduct, would actually have caused the injury. "It needs no citation of authority to sustain the proposition that negligence, to be the basis of a recovery, must be connected with the injury which is the subject of the suit." Moseley v. Schofield's Sons Co., 123 Ga. 199, 51 S. E. 310. It must have been the proximate cause of the injury to the servant, or the master is not liable therefor. Richmond, etc., R. Co. v. Dickey, 90 Ga. 491, 16 S. E. 212; Hamby v. Union Paper Mills Co., 110 Ga. 1, 35 S. E. 297.

We therefore conclude that under no view of the proof submitted by the plaintiff in support of the allegations of negligence, and all fair and reasonable deductions therefrom, under well-established principles of law, would a verdict for the plaintiff have been supported; and the court did not commit an error in granting the motion to nonsuit.

Judgment affirmed on the main bill of exceptions; cross-bill of exceptions dismissed.

(2 Ga. App. 181)

JOHNSON v. STATE. (No. 436.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 20, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—CERTIORARI—SERVICE OF NOTICE.

Failure to serve the Solicitor General with a notice of the sanction of a petition for certiorari in a criminal case within the time prescribed by law, except in case of "unavoidable cause" preventing such service, is ground for dismissal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 2725.]

2. SAME—UNAVOIDABLE CAUSE.

Where several months elapse between the date of the death of counsel for the plaintiff in certiorari and the expiration of the time within which notice could regularly have been given, such death will not be considered as unavoidable cause.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Quitman County; W. C. Worrill, Judge.

Lonnie Johnson was convicted of swindling, and brings error. Affirmed.

Raines & Gurr, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Laing, Sol. Gen., by Arnold & Arnold and J. B. Ridley, for the State.

POWELL, J. The accused was convicted of the offense of cheating and swindling under the acts of 1903. Gen. Laws 1903, p. 90. Under decisions of this court and of the Supreme Court, he was not guilty, because he was a minor and was prevented from performing his contract by parental authority. See Heywood v. State, 1 Ga. App. 530, 57 S. E. 1025; Mulkey v. State, 1 Ga. App. 521, 57 S. E. 1022; Patterson v. State, 1 Ga. App. 782, 58 S. E. 284; Howard v. State, 126 Ga. 538, 55 S. E. 239; Anthony v. State, 126 Ga. 632, 55 S. E. 479 (2). We regret, therefore, that the result of our judgment herein must be to leave in force the punishment imposed. However, we cannot look to the merits when they have not been presented in the manner prescribed by the statutes. In criminal matters, we have no extraordinary or equitable jurisdiction, whereby we may relieve an innocent defendant who, through his negligence, has been caught in the meshes of legal technicalities. Chancery jurisdiction in criminal cases, if the figure of speech be allowable, is conferred upon the Governor and the prison commission, and not upon the courts.

The judge of the superior court dismissed the certiorari brought by the accused to set aside the illegal conviction, and this judgment we must affirm. The conviction was had in the county court, petition for certiorari was duly presented, sanctioned and filed, and the writ was issued and answered. Upon the call of the case on the certiorari docket, the Solicitor General moved to dismiss, because the notice of the sanction and of the time and place of hearing required by Civ. Code 1895, § 4644, had not been given. It was shown to the court that in August, 1906, soon after the sanction of the certiorari, counsel for the applicant became ill and died. The writ was returnable to the March term, 1907, and at that term the present counsel were employed. They could not say whether the notices had been given or not. The Solicitor General stated that he had no recollection of ever having received the notice.

The burden of showing service of the notice was upon the plaintiff in certiorari; and the showing made did not establish the fact. Jones v. Gill, 121 Ga. 93, 48 S. E. 688. Failure of service, unless prevented by providential cause, is fatal. See Butts v. State, 90 Ga. 450, 16 S. E. 96; Moore v. State, 96 Ga. 309, 22 S. E. 960; McElhannon v. State, 112 Ga. 221, 37 S. E. 402. The statute says that "in default of such notice (unless prevented by unavoidable cause) the certiorari shall be dismissed." "Unavoidable cause" means more than "excusable negligence," and relieves against the default only when prompt measures are thereafter taken. Southern Railway Co. v. Carr, 118 Ga. 355, 45 S. E. 409. Sickness or death of counsel for applicant are primarily to be classed as unavoidable cause; so, also, would be the death or absence of the Solicitor General in a criminal case; but the service must be prevented by this cause, and not by the applicant's neglect to take prompt measures after such cause has been ascertained and can be relieved against. In this case counsel for the applicant died in August or September, 1906. The time for service did not expire until March, 1907. Hence the failure to serve must be attributed to negligence, and not to unavoidable cause.

Judgment affirmed.

some length the situs of contracts, and by the law of what place they are determined. We think, however, that the discussion is not relevant. It withdraws our consideration from the Constitution and statute of Alabama; and it is manifest the contention based upon it, if yielded to, would defeat their purpose. The prohibition is directed to the doing of any business in the state in the exercise of corporate functions; and there can be no doubt that petitioner considered that it was exercising such functions in the state. * * * The application of Denson was presumably solicited as other applications were, and, if what was done in pursuance of it did not constitute doing business in the state, the effect would be, as expressed by the Circuit Court of Appeals, that petitioner and other foreign associations, engaged in the same business of loaning money on real security may safely flood the state of Alabama with soliciting agents, make all the negotiations for the loans, take real estate securities therefor, and fully transact all business pertaining to their corporate functions as though incorporated therein, and yet neither be obliged to have a known place of business, or any authorized agent within the state, nor pay any license tax or fee, as required of nonresident corporations doing business therein."

2. The next question to be determined is whether the act of 1904, as hereinafter mentioned, is in violation of the contract by which the petitioner was permitted to do business in this state. When the petitioner was granted permission to carry on its business in this state, the acts of 1888 and 1892 were of force, certain provisions of which were incorporated in the Code of Laws as section 1800, and are as follows: "Every foreign insurance company of any class—fire, life, marine, surety, security, guarantee, hailstorm, live stock, accident, plate glass, and other like insurance companies—foreign land associations, foreign building and loan associations, foreign banking associations, and all other like classes of like business not incorporated under the laws of South Carolina, except national banks and except benevolent institutions organized under the grand lodge system, shall each, before transacting any business in this state, pay an annual license fee of one hundred dollars to the Comptroller General, on or before the thirty-first day of March in each year, to be deposited by him in the treasury of the state. It shall be unlawful for any such foreign companies, as are required to pay license fees, to transact any business in this state, until they shall have and keep some duly appointed resident agent in this state, on whom legal process may be served, so as to bind the company he represents, and service of process upon this agent at his main office, shall be sufficient to give jurisdiction to the court issuing same, in any county in this state. The license issued by the Comptroller General, shall give to the company obtaining the same, power and authority to appoint any number of agents to take such risks, or transact any business of insurance in each and every county of the state, and the same shall be so granted as to expire on the 31st of March of each year. But the Comptroller General must be notified of such appointment before such agent takes any risks or transacts any business, as aforesaid, giving the postoffice address, residence and a certified copy of the resolution, appointing such agent or agents, duly signed by the president and secretary of such company." The petitioner paid the license fee therein mentioned. The act of 1893 (21 St. at Large, p. 409) was effective at the time the petitioner was allowed to do business in this state, and contains the provision "that foreign corporations duly incorporated under the laws of any state of the United States, or of any foreign country, in treaty and amity with the said United States, are hereby permitted to locate and carry on business within the state of South Carolina, in like manner as the natural born citizens of the states of the United States, or of such foreign country might do under the law, existing at the time, subject, nevertheless, to the terms and conditions in this act hereafter set forth." This provision became section 1779 of the Code of Laws. Section 7 (page 410) of the act of 1893 was as follows: "All and every such foreign corporation carrying on business or owning property in this state, shall be subject to the laws of this state, but nothing herein contained shall be construed to permit any such foreign corporation, to exercise any franchise or enjoy any privilege or immunity, other than the right to own property and carry on business in like manner as individuals, natural born citizens of such state of the United States, or of foreign countries, might do, and subject to the terms and conditions of this chapter."

This is now section 1790 of the Code of Laws. The act of 1893 was amended in 1904 by an act entitled "An act to amend section 1779 of the Civil Code [being volume 1, Code of Laws 1902], relating to the formation of foreign corporations" (24 St. at Large, p. 435), so as to read as follows: "Foreign corporations duly incorporated under the laws of any state of the United States, or of any foreign country in treaty and amity with the said United States, are hereby permitted to locate and carry on business within the state of South Carolina, in like manner and with like powers as corporations of like kind and class created under the laws of this state, subject, nevertheless, to the terms and conditions in this chapter hereafter set forth." Sections 4 and 5 (page 464) of the act of 1904 (the title of which has already been set out) are as follows: Section 4: "Every corporation organized under the laws of this state to do business for profit, other than railroad companies, express companies, street railway companies, navigation companies, water works companies, power companies, light companies, telephone companies, telegraph companies, parlor, dining and sleeping car companies, shall, upon the filing of the report required of them in section 1, pay to the State Treasurer, on or before the first day of April, in each year, an annual license fee of one-half of one mill upon each dollar paid in to the capital stock of said corporation, said license fee to be not less than five dollars in any case." Section 5: "Upon the filing of the report required of foreign corporations in section 2, the Comptroller General shall, from the facts thus reported, and any other facts coming to his knowledge, determine the value of the property of such corporation used within this state by them in the conduct of their business, and shall file a statement of the value so determined, with the license tax payable thereon, with the State Treasurer, who shall charge and collect from such companies, in addition to the initial fees provided for in the Code of Laws for South Carolina, in 1902, and acts amendatory thereto, an annual license fee of one-half mill upon each dollar of the value of the property of such corporation used within this state in the conduct of its business."

The petitioner's attorneys rely upon the case of Am. S. & R. Co. v. Colorado ex rel. Lindsley, 27 Sup. Ct. 198, 51 L. Ed. 393, in which it was held that a right to do business in the state, without being subject to any greater liabilities than those imposed upon domestic corporations, was acquired by a foreign corporation upon its admission into the state of Colorado, under the laws then of force, which subjected foreign corporations to the liabilities, restrictions, and duties imposed upon domestic corporations of like character, and such right was impaired by an act of that state subsequently enacted, which required such corporations to pay an annual license fee in double the amount of that imposed upon domestic corporations. The court uses this language: "A provision in a statute of this nature, subjecting a foreign corporation to all the liabilities, etc., of a domestic one of like character, must mean that it shall not be subjected to any greater liabilities than are imposed upon such domestic corporation. The power to impose different liabilities was with the state at the outset. It could make them greater or less than in case of a domestic corporation, or it could make them the same. Having the general power to do as it pleased, when it enacted that the foreign corporation, upon coming in the state, should be subjected to all the liabilities of a domestic corporation, it amounted to the same thing as if the statute had said the foreign corporation should be subjected to the same liabilities. In other words, the liabilities, restrictions, and duties upon domestic corporations constitute the measure and limit of the liabilities, restrictions, and duties which might thereafter be imposed upon the corporations admitted to do business in this state. It was not a mere license to come in the state and do business therein, upon payment of a sum named, liable to be revoked or the sum increased at the pleasure of the state. It was a clear contract that the liabilities, etc., should be the same as the domestic corporation, and the same treatment in that regard should be measured out to both. If it were desired to increase the liabilities of the foreign, it could only be done by increasing those of the domestic corporations at the same time and the same extent. * * * Nor is this a case where the power given by the state Constitution to the General Assembly to alter, amend, or annul a charter is applicable. The act does not alter the charter, or annul or amend it. It simply increases the taxation which up to the time of its enactment had been imposed upon all foreign corporations doing business in the state. * * * It is unnecessary to refer to the many cases cited by both parties hereto. Some of them refer to the question as to the nature of such tax, while others decide upon the facts appearing in them, whether there was a contract or not. As already stated, the name of the tax or its kind is not important, so long as it is plain that the act of 1902 increases the liabilities of the foreign corporation over those which obtain in that of the domestic. And in regard to the case of contract, while the principle that a contract may arise from a legislative enactment has been reiterated times without number, it must always rest for its support in the particular case upon the construction to be given the act, and in this case we are greatly aided by the former cases regarding taxation and legislative contract."

The respondent's attorneys, however, contend that section 7 of the act of 1893, heretofore mentioned, prescribes the terms upon which foreign corporations were permitted to do business in this state, to wit, that they should be subject to the laws in like manner as corporations chartered under the laws of South Carolina. It will be seen by reference to sections 1 and 7 of said act that they are inconsistent, and it would be difficult to reconcile them. It seems that the Legislature did not entertain the view that it placed foreign and domestic corporations on the same footing; hence the necessity for passing the act of 1904 (page 435) amending it. But, conceding that such was the effect of section 7, the act of 1904 (page 462) distinguishes between domestic and foreign corporations. Section 4 of that act provides for an annual license fee of one-half of one mill upon each dollar paid in to the capital stock of a domestic corporation, while in the case of a foreign corporation it is required, in addition to the initial fees, to pay a license fee of one-half of one mill upon each dollar of the value of the property used within the state in the conduct of its business.

But the respondent's attorneys also contend that the state has the right to prescribe the conditions upon which foreign corporations shall be permitted to do business in the state, even when they are more burdensome than those imposed upon domestic corporations (which cannot be denied); that the license granted the petitioner in 1894 expired on the 31st of March, 1895, and, when the license was granted in each subsequent year, it expired on the 31st of March of the year next ensuing; that the granting of the license in each year was a new contract, and, when in 1904 the petitioner took out a new license, it was subject to the provisions of the act of 1904 (page 462), which was approved on the 29th of February, 1904. They cite the cases of Security L. Ins. Co. v. Prewitt, 200 U. S. 446, 28 Sup. Ct. 314, 50 L. Ed. 545; Security L. Ins. Co. v. Prewitt, 202 U. S. 246, 28 Sup. Ct. 619, 50 L. Ed. 1013; Ph. F. Ins. Ass'n v. New York, 119 U. S. 110, 7 Sup. Ct. 108, 30 L. Ed. 342. In the last-mentioned case the court uses this language (page 119 of 119 U. S., and page 113 of 7 Sup. Ct. [30 L. Ed. 342]): "This Pennsylvania corporation came into the state of New York to do business by the consent of the state, under this act of 1853, with a license granted for a year, and has received such license annually, to run for a year. It is within the state for any given year under such license, and subject to the conditions prescribed by statute. The state, having the power to exclude entirely, has the power to change conditions of admission at any time for the future, and to impose as a condition the payment of a new tax, or a further tax as a license fee. If it imposes such license fee as a prerequisite for the future, the foreign corporation, until it pays such license fee, is not admitted within the state or within its jurisdiction. It is outside, at the threshold, seeking admission, with consent not yet given." After most careful consideration, we have reached the conclusion that this objection must be sustained.

It is also contended that the petitioner had not complied with the requirements of the statute in 1894 when it received a license, and that it has no right to carry on its business in this state. The objection, however, cannot be sustained, as each license was a new contract, and the petitioner complied before the last license was granted.

It is the judgment of this court that the petition be dismissed.

JENNINGS v. TALBERT.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 2, 1907.)

1. WILLS—NATURE OF ESTATE.

A testatrix's devise to her husband for life, "investing him with power to rent or lease," to collect rents, and conferring power of sale

"and to distribute the proceeds of such rents and sales between my two daughters and their heirs," gives the husband a life estate.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, §§ 1418-1430.]

2. SAME—PATENT AMBIGUITIES.

Ambiguities in a will are patent where the uncertainty arises upon the words of the will, and before any attempt is made to apply them to the object which they describe.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, §§ 1033-1036.]

3. SAME—LATENT AMBIGUITY.

Where there is no defect on the face of a will, but there is an uncertainty in attempting to put it into effect, the ambiguity is latent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, §§ 1033-1036.]

4. SAME.

Where the ambiguity in a will is latent, parol testimony is admissible to reach a correct conclusion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, §§ 1033-1036.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Abbeville County; Purdy, Judge.

Action by Lillie May Jennings against R. J. Talbert, individually and as executor. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wm. J. Thurmond, for appellant. Wm. N. Graydon, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. Mrs. Georgia A. Talbert died in September, 1900, seised of certain real estate in Abbeville county. According to her last will and testament, she willed, devised, and bequeathed certain property "to my beloved husband, Dr. R. J. Talbert, during the term of his natural life, investigating [investing] him with power to rent and lease said lands and building, and collect rents for the same, and I further confer upon him power to sell, make, execute and deliver titles to all singular, the property above described or any part thereof, and to distribute the proceeds of such rents and sales between my two daughters, Anna P. Robinson and Lillie May Jennings, and their heirs, share and share alike." In October, 1906, plaintiff, Lillie May Jennings, commenced this action against R. J. Talbert, individually and as executor of the estate of Mrs. Talbert, and against Anna P. Robinson, who refused to join as plaintiff. The complaint alleged concealment of the will by Dr. Talbert; that, according to its terms, he held the property in trust for plaintiff and Anna P. Robinson; that defendant Talbert had committed waste by selling timber off of said land. It demanded a judgment against him for one-half of the rents and profits of said real estate and for timber and other property disposed of; that defendant be enjoined from further waste; that he give bond for the faithful performance of his duties as trustee or be removed; and, finally, that plaintiff have judgment against him for one-half of the rents and profits of the real estate and for one-half the value of timber and other property disposed of. Defendant answered and gave notice that, upon the calling of the case, a demurrer would be made to the complaint on the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that it appeared upon the face of the will that defendant, R. J. Talbert, had a life estate in the property. After hearing the motion, Judge R. O. Purdy refused to sustain the demurrer or construe the will, saying: "That in a case of this kind, where the language bears two constructions, it would be committing an injustice for the court to undertake to pass upon the rights of the parties without knowing something of the circumstances relating to the property or the parties." By agreement the question as to waste was omitted in this hearing. The defendant appeals.

In his conclusion we think the circuit judge committed error. That there is some unclearness or ambiguity about the will is undeniable. Ambiguities, however, are patent and latent; the distinction being that in the former case the uncertainty is one which arises upon the words of the will, deed, or other instrument as looked at in themselves, and before any attempt is made to apply them to the object which they describe, while in the latter case the uncertainty arises, not upon the words of the will, deed, or other instrument as looked at in themselves, but upon those words when applied to the object or subject which they describe. 2 Ency. of Law, 388. Thus, where there is conflict in words or clauses of a will or other instrument, the ambiguity is patent. Where, however, there is no defect upon the face of the paper, but, when attempting to put it into effect, it appears that there is uncertainty, as for instance where there are two legatees of the same name or two pieces of property which the description fits equally well, the ambiguity is latent. In the former case the construction and intention must be derived solely from the words contained in the instrument. In the latter case parol testimony may be received to enable the reaching of a correct conclusion. 30 Ency. of Law, 678; Donald v. Dendy, 2 McM. 130; Patterson v. Leith, 2 Hill. Ch. 17. The ambiguity here is too clearly patent to require discussion. Therefore parol testimony could not be received for enlightenment on the subject.

The words in which doubt occurs are those quoted above. It will be noticed that by the first words used an absolute estate for life is conferred upon the defendant. Continuing, the testator invests him with power to rent and lease the said lands and collect rents for the same, and, in case he saw fit, to even sell all, or any part thereof, and to distribute the proceeds of such rents and sales between testator's daughters. The most that can be said of these additional clauses is that they invest defendant with certain discretionary powers. It seems reasonable to suppose that had Mrs. Talbert wished her husband to hold the property in trust for her daughters, as plaintiff contends, she would have said so, thus removing all doubt. A more reasonable inference is that on account of the high regard in which she held her husband, and resting implicitly on her confidence in him, she chose to leave it to his discretion as to the best way in which her daughters' interests in the property should be guarded. In regard to plaintiff's contention, we remark there is a tendency in modern decisions to restrict within very narrow limits the implication of trusts where they are not expressly declared; the ground being that any ordinary person wishing to create a trust would do so in mandatory words, that method being simplest and most certain. Mr. Pomeroy, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence (section 1015) says: "Judges for some time past have shown a decided leaning against the doctrine of precatory trusts and a strong tendency to restrict its operation within reasonable and somewhat narrow bounds. Many of the earlier decisions would certainly not be followed at the present day." He further adds, in the following section: "Upon the authority of the more modern decisions, the whole doctrine may be summed up in a single proposition: In order that a trust may arise from the use of precatory words, the court must be satisfied from the words themselves, taken in connection with all the other terms of the disposition, that the testator's intention to create an express trust was as full, complete, settled and sure, as though he had given the property to hold upon a trust declared in express terms in the ordinary manner." To the same effect is Story on Equity Jurisprudence, § 1068b. The rule adopted in this state, and in a number of other jurisdictions, is that, where an absolute and unqualified estate is first created in words which import absolute uncontrollable ownership, words relied on to show that the testator intended to cut down such an estate, or to affect it with any trust, must not only be mandatory, but must in themselves show the manner in which they are to operate, so that the purpose of the testator may be clearly apparent—how or in what degree he intended to cut down the estate previously created, or what was the precise nature of the trust he intended to impress upon it. Howze v. Barber & Drennan, 29 S. C. 470, 7 S. E. 817, and authorities; 30 Ency. of Law, 687, and authorities.

Viewing the words now under consideration in the light of these rules of law, we think plaintiff's contention cannot be sustained. It is admitted by all that the first clause standing alone would vest the defendant, R. J. Talbert, with a life estate. In order to cut down the estate, the language must be mandatory; that is, a clear command, or, in the language of the criterion above quoted, the terms taken in connection with the whole will must show the testator's intention to establish a trust as clearly as if he had declared a trust in express terms. Certainly there is nothing mandatory in the terms used, nor showing a clear intention to create a trust. The terms "investing him with power to rent," etc., "and further conferring upon him power to sell," etc., as was said above, imply absolute discretion in the matter. But granting that they are mandatory, even more is required; they must go further and show in what manner they are to operate, how or in what degree the testator intended to cut down the estate previously granted, or what was the precise nature of the trust he intended to impress upon it. This condition is also unfulfilled. By reference to the words, it is almost impossible to reach the testator's intention should we adopt the view of the implication of a trust. Suppose, for instance, instead of renting the property under consideration, defendant should have utilized it for his own purposes, would he be responsible for rents? Again, when are the rents to be distributable? Numerous other difficulties might conceivably arise if we endeavor to impress upon the property a trust.

We think, and therefore hold, that Mrs. Talbert's intention was to invest her husband with a life estate in the property. That much is clear. In construing the remaining clauses, if we take into consideration the esteem in which she, according to the language of the will, held her husband, a very probable inference is that it occurred to her that the defendant would at all times have the welfare of his daughters in mind and that possibly circumstances might arise in which he might wish to rent the land or even sell it for their benefit. In that case she wished him to have the power to utilize the property as he saw fit. Of course, the grant of the life estate gave him power to rent and collect the rents so long as the property was in his possession, but by expressing the power it cannot be said that the necessary inference was that he should hold the property in trust for his daughters. The testator seemed to rest entirely upon her husband's discretion. Hence we think plaintiff has no right to complain of his actions so long as he does not injure her future estate. The ground of the demurrer is well founded, and should have been sustained.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

3. CARRIERS—FREIGHT—NOTICE TO CONSIGNEES.

Where it was shown that it was the custom of defendant carrier to notify consignees of arrivals of their goods, the presumption is that, if the goods for the loss of which plaintiff sued had arrived, notice would have been given.

4. COMMERCE—INTERSTATE COMMERCE—LIABILITY OF INITIAL CARRIER.

Code 1902, § 2178, makes the initial carrier liable for loss of goods shipped over its line and connecting lines unless a receipt in writing is produced from the connecting carrier. Held, that the act is not unconstitutional, as seeking to impose any burden on interstate commerce.

5. CARRIERS—INITIAL CARRIERS—RECEIPT FROM CONNECTING CARRIER.

A receipt within Code 1902, § 2178, making initial carrier liable for loss of goods shipped over it and connecting lines unless it produces a receipt in writing, is not required to be in any particular form, and evidence of a freight agent of the railroad company testifying from a record of his office, known as the "per diem sheet," that the goods shipped were received on a waybill on a certain date and transferred to a car of another railroad company for such railroad company, and were receipted for by them at a certain hour on that day, was sufficient.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Union County.

Action by the Jonesville Manufacturing Company against the Southern Railway. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Sanders & De Pass and Townsend & Townsend, for appellant. J. Ashby Sawyer, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. This action was begun on August 4, 1905, by the plaintiff to recover of the defendant railroad company the value of five cases of hosiery delivered to it at Jonesville, S. C., consigned to Kaufer, Smithing & Co., Millwaukee, Wis., the same being five of a shipment of seven cases. The defendant admitted the receipt of the goods, but alleges that they were lost by a connecting carrier, and produced in evidence a contract of carriage, signed by both parties, by which it was agreed defendant's liability should be limited to its own line. Also, by its amended answer, it set up loss by the act of God. The case came on for trial before his honor, Judge Geo. E. Prince, and a jury at the June, 1906, term of court for Union county, and resulted in a verdict of $318.39 for the plaintiff. A motion for a new trial having been refused, defendant appealed.

1. The first question we consider is whether a nonsuit should have been granted. If there is any evidence to go to the jury, or if the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case, a nonsuit will not be granted. Norris v. Clinkscales, 44 S. C. 315, 22 S. E. 1; Jacobs v. Gilreath, 45 S. C. 46, 22 S. E. 757; Springs

v. Railway, 46 S. C. 104, 24 S. E. 166, and numerous other cases. Here plaintiff proved delivery to the defendant and that the goods were not received by the consignee. Defendant contends, however, that there was no evidence showing the goods did not arrive at Milwaukee, and therefore the presumption is that they did arrive; that the circuit judge was in error in charging that it was incumbent upon the railroad to give the consignee notice of the arrival of the goods at their destination. The last contention must be sustained. The law of South Carolina does not require notice. Bristow v. Railway, 72 S. C. 44, 51 S. E. 529. The law of Wisconsin, not having been proved, will be presumed to be the common law as understood and enforced by the courts of this state. But, apart from this, it was shown that it was the custom of the defendant to notify Kaufer, Smithing & Co. of the arrival of their goods, as was done in the case of the two cases received. The presumption, therefore, is that, if these goods had arrived, notice would have been given to the consignee. Hence, plaintiff having shown delivery to the defendant and that Kaufer, Smithing & Co. never received any notice of their arrival, a prima facie case was made out and the nonsuit was properly refused.

2. The controlling question in the case is the construction of section 2176 of the Civil Code of 1902, which provides: "In case of loss or damage to any article or articles delivered to any railroad corporation for transportation over its own or connecting roads, the initial corporation or corporation first receiving the same, shall in every case be liable for such loss or damage, but may discharge itself from liability by the production of a receipt in writing, for the said article or articles from the corporation to whom it was its duty to deliver such article or articles in the regular course of transportation. In which event, the said connecting road or roads shall be severally so liable, but may in succession and in like manner discharge themselves respectively therefrom; but if any such corporation shall willfully fail or refuse, upon reasonable demand being made to it by any party interested in the production of such receipt, to produce the same, then it shall not be entitled to claim the benefit of such exemption in any action against the said railroad corporation to render it liable for such loss or damage." The circuit judge charged and held, in overruling the motion for a new trial, that under this statute defendant was absolutely liable if it failed to produce a receipt from its connecting carrier. Defendant attacked the constitutionality of the act as applied to carriers beyond the borders of the state. We think the act is constitutional. It does not seek to impose any burden on interstate commerce. There is no attempt in any way to try to prevent the carrier from making a contract limiting its liability to its own road.

Where such a contract is entered into, however, the road remains responsible until it proves that it did not cause the loss or damage. The act in question was intended only to establish a rule of evidence by which the connecting carrier could relieve itself of such liability, which, according to the case of Richmond, etc., Railroad v. Patterson Tobacco Company, 160 U. S. 312, 18 Sup. Ct. 335, 42 L. Ed. 760, a state has a right to do.

The question arises, then: What constitutes a receipt in writing? The term usually implies a formal paper signed by one party and delivered to another. This was doubtless the meaning of receipt in the mind of the circuit judge when he charged the jury in this case. We do not, however, think that such a limitation should be put upon the act. Its purpose was to enable railroads to relieve themselves from liability for loss of goods by showing by written evidence that they had been delivered to a connecting carrier. In the case of Miller Bros. v. Railway, 33 S. C. 359, 366, 11 S. E. 1093, 1959, 9 L. R. A. 833, in which objection was made to the admission of certain evidence, thus raising the identical question raised here, the court said: "Without now undertaking to decide whether there are circumstances under which parol testimony may be admissible to prove the delivery of property by one carrier corporation to its next connecting line, we think the testimony of Cudworth as to the receipt of the property by the steamship line cannot be said to be 'merely oral.' He said 'he recollected the receipt of the goods by referring to my receipts.' Being shown the paper, dated October 4, 1887 (Exhibit C), he said: 'That is the original in my handwriting. These [describing the property] are checked off as received. They are records of my office; duplicates were furnished the South Carolina Railway Company,' etc. We do not understand that the act requires the receipt spoken of to be in any particular form. The intention was to require the delivering company, in order to discharge itself, to produce such written evidence of the receipt of the property by the connecting carrier to which it is delivered as will shift the liability to account for the property to that company. As it seems to us, the paper dated October 4, 1887, and signed by Alfred Cudworth 'for steamer,' sufficiently identifies the property received, and is substantially such 'receipt in writing' as to be a discharge to the railroad company." Applying this language to the case now under consideration, we think there is such production of a receipt as will prevent the circuit judge from holding that there was a total failure on the part of the defendant to produce a receipt in writing, and therefore it could not possibly get a verdict in its favor. Witness Pollard, the freight agent of the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company at St. Louis, testified from a record of his office, known as the "per diem sheet," that "the seven cases billed K. F. products were received at East St. Louis, June 4, 1903, in Southern car No. 24082, from Corinth, Miss., on waybill 25, dated June 1, 1903; that they were transferred, on June 5, 1903, into C. & A. car, No. 15173, which was delivered to the Terminal Railroad Association at East St. Louis, Ill., for the C. & A. road on June 6, 1903, and were re-ceived for by them at 3:45 that day." According to the testimony, the per diem sheet accompanies all cars transferred from one railroad company to another, and is signed by the agent for both receiving and delivering roads, and it is an acknowledgment of the receipt of the car by the receiving company. It is to establish the delivery of cars to the railroad interested. This sheet was also introduced in evidence and was, according to the language of the court above cited, of itself apart from other records and testimony based upon them, sufficient receipt of the goods by the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company.

This conclusion, we think, is decisive of the case. There are other exceptions, but the decision of this question either decides them or makes consideration of them un-profitable.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.

KIRVEN v. VIRGINIA-CAROLINA CHEMICAL CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 5, 1907.)

1. JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA—IDENTITY OF ISSUES.

A judgment in the United States court on a note for fertilizers is not res judicata in an action in a state court for damages to defendant's crops, caused by the use of such fertilizer, where the same question was raised in the United States court, but was withdrawn by consent of the court.

2. SAME—MATTERS LITIGATED.

Under the rulings of the United States Supreme Court, a judgment is not res judicata in a second action on a different cause of action, unless the question was actually litigated in the original action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, § 1244.]

Pope, C. J., and Jones, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Darlington County; Klugh, Judge.

Action by J. P. Kirven against the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wilcox & Wilcox, W. F. Dargan, Dargan & Coggeshall, and Mitchell & Smith, for appellant. E. O. Woods, Geo. W. Brown, and Stevenson & Matheson, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff as the result of using certain fertilizers in the cultivation of his crops, manufactured and sold to him by the defendant.

As the main question herein is whether the issues raised by the pleadings had already been adjudicated in an action between the same parties, in the Circuit Court of the United States, it will be necessary to state briefly the proceedings in the two cases.

On the 15th of November, 1898, the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company, as plaintiff, filed a complaint in the court of common pleas for Darlington county, state of South Carolina, against J. P. Kirven, as defendant, in which it was alleged that on the 14th of March, 1898, the defendant made his certain note, whereby he promised to pay to the order of S. M. McCall $2,228 on the 25th of October thereafter, that the said note was indorsed for value to the plaintiff, and that no part thereof had been paid. On the 30th of November, 1898, his honor, Judge Watts, on motion of plaintiff's attorneys, granted an order that the cause be discontinued, without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to commence another action at such time as it might be advised. On the 11th of April, 1903, the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company filed a complaint in the United States Circuit Court, setting forth the facts mentioned in the first complaint. On the 30th of May, 1903, the defendant, J. P. Kirven, served an answer to the complaint, in which he set up the following defenses: First. That S. M. McCall was the owner of the fertilizers for which said note was given; that at the time the note was assigned to the plaintiff, and at the time of the commencement of said action, S. M. McCall and the defendant, J. P. Kirven, were residents and citizens of the state of South Carolina, and therefore that the Circuit Court of the United States was without jurisdiction. Second. That the plaintiff was a foreign corporation, and could not maintain the action, for the reason that it had failed to comply with the requirements of the statute relative to foreign corporations doing business in this state. Third. "That the note sued upon in this action was given by the defendant to S. M. McCall for fertilizers, for which he agreed to pay a sound price, which is set forth in the note sued upon, and were purchased for the use of the defendant himself and his tenants and customers in making a crop for the year in which the said note was given, but the said fertilizers were so unskillfully manipulated and manufactured and prepared, and were of such inferior quality, that, instead of being of benefit to the crops of defendant and his tenants and customers to whom he furnished the same, they were deleterious and destructive to the crops and destroyed the same in large part, and there was an entire failure of consideration to the defendant for said note." On the 12th of April, 1904, his honor, W. H. Brawley, United States judge, granted leave to the defendant, J. P. Kirven, to file such additional answer or counterclaim as he might be advised. On the 6th of March, 1905, the defendant, J. P. Kirven, filed his answer, reciting that he "by leave of the court first had and obtained files this, his supplemental answer, hereby withdrawing any former answer heretofore filed by him herein."

The amended answer contained the first two defenses hereinbefore mentioned, and as a third defense, by way of counterclaim, alleged that under attachment proceedings in North Carolina the plaintiff had in his possession the proceeds of 70 bales of cotton, amounting to $2,450, belonging to the defendant, J. P. Kirven, and for which he demanded judgment. But the third defense, hereinbefore mentioned, was withdrawn by leave of the court, and no reference was thereafter made in the pleadings to the defense of failure of consideration. Consequently, during the progress of the trial, when the defendant, J. P. Kirven, commenced to testify about the crops, his honor, the United States judge, promptly ruled that such testimony was not admissible, and excluded it. In that action the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $911.07, and on the 4th of April, 1905, judgment was duly entered thereon. On the 11th of October, 1906, a certified record of the said judgment was filed in the office of the clerk of the court of common pleas for Darlington county. On the 8th of February, 1904 (before judgment was entered in the Circuit Court of the United States), J. P. Kirven commenced the present action in the court of common pleas for Darlington county against the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company, alleging that said defendant caused damage to his crops in the sum of $1,995 by reason of selling to him acid phosphate and dissolved bone which "had been manufactured with such gross negligence and want of skill that, instead of being advantageous to the crops to which they were applied, they destroyed the same in large part, and were not only worthless to the plaintiff, but by destroying his crops damaged him very heavily." The answer of the defendant to this complaint was practically a denial. Subsequently, however, leave was granted for it to file a supplemental answer, whereupon it set up as a defense that the issues in this action were adjudicated, or could have been determined, in the action in the Circuit Court of the United States. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $1,995.

In their argument the appellant's attorneys state that the main issue in the case is whether the judgment rendered in the Circuit Court of the United States on the note given for the fertilizers, and here alleged to have destroyed plaintiff's crop, did not adjudicate all issues between the same parties in this cause. As a preliminary question, it will be necessary to determine what force and effect is to be accorded the judgment rendered in the Circuit Court of the United States. When the court derives its jurisdiction from the citizenship of the parties, and no question is raised in the case involving a right under the Constitution or laws of the United States, then the judgment of the court of the United States is only entitled in a state court to the force and effect it would have had if it had been rendered in the state court. But in all other cases the court of the United States will determine the question of res judicata upon principles settled by the Supreme Court of the United States. Hancock Nat. Bank v. Farnum, 176 U. S. 640, 20 Sup. Ct. 506, 44 L. Ed. 619; Deposit Bank v. Frankfort, 191 U. S. 499, 24 Sup. Ct. 154, 48 L. Ed. 276; Gunter v. Railroad, 200 U. S. 273, 26 Sup. Ct. 252, 50 L. Ed. 477. In the case heard by the Circuit Court of the United States the question was presented under a statute of the United States whether the assignee of the note had the right to maintain the action. When the judgment was urged as a bar to the action in the state court, a federal question was presented, and must be determined in accordance with the decisions of the United States Supreme Court.

The appellant's attorneys in their argument say: "Speaking generally, it may be said that the decisions of these courts establish that, when the second suit involves the same claim as the first, the judgment in the first case is an absolute bar, not only to the matters actually litigated, but as to every matter that might have been litigated; that, if the second suit is upon an entirely different claim, the estoppel only extends to the matter decided"—and cite the leading case of Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351, 24 L. Ed. 195, in which Mr. Justice Field, in behalf of the court, thus states the principle: "In considering the operation of this judgment, it should be borne in mind, as stated by counsel, that there is a difference between the effect of a judgment as a bar or estoppel, against the prosecution of a second action upon the same claim or demand, and its effect as an estoppel in another action between the same parties upon a different claim or cause of action. In the former case the judgment, if rendered upon the merits, constitutes an absolute bar to a subsequent action. It is a finality as to the claim or demand in controversy, concluding parties and those in privity with them, not only as to every matter which was offered and received to sustain or defeat the claim or demand, but as to any other admissible matter which might have been offered for that purpose. Thus, for example, a judgment rendered upon a promissory note is conclusive as to the validity of the instrument and the amount due upon it, although it be subsequently alleged that perfect defenses actually existed, of which no proof was offered, such as forgery, want of consideration, or payment. If such defenses were not presented in the action, and established by competent evidence, the subsequent allegations are as conclusive, so far as future proceedings at law are concerned, as though the defenses never existed. The language, therefore, which is so often used, that a judgment estops not only as to every ground of recovery or defense actually presented in the action, but also as to every ground which might have been presented, is strictly accurate when applied to the demand or claim in controversy. Such demand or claim, having passed into judgment, cannot again be brought into litigation between the parties in proceedings at law, upon any ground whatever. But, where the second action between the same parties is upon a different claim or demand, the judgment in the prior action operates as an estoppel only as to those matters in issue or points controverted upon the determination of which the finding or verdict was rendered. In all cases, therefore, where it is sought to apply the estoppel of a judgment rendered upon one cause of action to matters arising in a suit upon a different cause of action, the inquiry must always be as to the point or question actually litigated and determined in the original action, not what might have been thus litigated and determined. Only upon such matters is the judgment conclusive in another action."

The present action and that in the Circuit Court of the United States, it is true, were between the same parties, but upon a different claim or demand; one being upon a promissory note and the other for unliquidated damages, arising from the destruction of plaintiff's crops, through the alleged gross negligence on the part of the defendant in the manufacture of the fertilizers used upon said crops. Therefore plaintiff is not estopped from raising this question unless it was actually litigated and determined in that action. The record, however, shows that the claim upon which this action is based was withdrawn and not abandoned, and that, when J. P. Kirven offered to introduce testimony as to the crops, his honor, the presiding judge, ruled that it was incompetent.

The first and second exceptions are overruled:

The third exception cannot be sustained, for the reason that, when the charge is considered in its entirety, it will be seen that it is not susceptible of the inferences which the appellant has drawn from it.

The fourth exception must be overruled, as the fact that in a number of instances in which the fertilizers were used the crops were destroyed afforded some evidence tending to show that the fertilizers were worthless and deleterious to the crops.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

WOODS, J. (concurring). The question of res judicata is close and difficult, but I think the conclusions reached by Mr. Justice GARY are right on principle and authority. The Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company, defendant in this action, sued the plaintiff, Kirven, in the federal court on notes aggregating $2,228, given for the purchase money of fertilizers. Kirven set up, among other defenses, failure of consideration, in that the fertilizers were not only worthless, but positively deleterious. Subsequently this defense was withdrawn, and on the trial of other issues the defendant recovered judgment for $1,723.40. While the suit on these issues was pending in the federal court, Kirven commenced action against the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company in the court of common pleas for Darlington county to recover damages to his crop from the use of the fertilizer for which the notes were given; the essence of the complaint being contained in this paragraph: "That the said fertilizers, to wit, acid phosphate and dissolved bone, had been manufactured with such gross negligence and want of skill that, instead of being of advantage to the crops to which they were applied, they destroyed the same in large part and were not only worthless to the plaintiff, but, by destroying his crops, damaged him very heavily, and by the injury which was inflicted on his crop of cotton and corn, by fertilizers which were manufactured and sold for use upon them, he was damaged in the sum of $1,995 and costs." The Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company answered by a general denial, but, after the determination of the suit on the notes, by supplemental answer alleged that the claims set up by Kirven had been adjudicated in the action on the notes in the federal court. Having introduced the record in the federal court, on this ground the defendant requested the state court to direct a verdict in its favor. It is clear that Kirven's claim might have been set up as a counterclaim in the federal court; and the appellant first contends that the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902 expressly requires all counterclaims to be set up in the answer. This position is thoroughly unsound.

Section 170, which is relied on, is: "The answer of the defendant must contain: (1) A general or specific denial of each material allegation of the complaint controverted by the defendant, or of any knowledge or information thereof sufficient to form a belief. (2) A statement of any new matter constituting a defense or a counter-claim, in ordinary and concise language, without repetition." All that this means is that any paper purporting to be an answer must contain either a denial of a material allegation of the complaint or new matter constituting a defense or a counterclaim, or it will be no answer. It cannot in any view be considered a legislative enactment that any separate cause of action which might have been, but was not, used as a counterclaim, shall not be available in a separate action. There are such enactments in the Codes of some states, but they are very different from section 170 of our Code. The Codes of California and Minnesota are examples. Brosnan v. Kramer, 66 Pac. 979, 135 Cal. 36; Lowry v. Hurd, 7 Minn. 356 (Gil. 282). Mr. Pomeroy clearly lays down the rule that provisions for the counterclaim, such as are contained in our Code, do not preclude the defendant from bringing a separate suit on a cause of action which might have been set up as a counterclaim. Pomeroy's Rem. § 804.

Counsel for appellant strongly argued, however, even if this is true, as a general rule "this rule does not apply where the subject-matter of the set-off or counterclaim was involved and adjudicated in the former action in such wise that the judgment therein necessarily negatives the facts on which the defendant would have to rely in order to establish his demand." This statement of an exception to the general rule, taken from 23 Cyc. 1202, may be accepted as true, yet I do not think this case falls under it. Had Kirven gone to trial on the plea of failure of consideration, saying nothing of his counterclaim for damages, and had lost on that issue, the judgment would have been conclusive that there was no failure of consideration, and hence obviously no basis for a separate action for damages for injury done by the fertilizer sold. The case in that condition would have been within the exception. But he had his election to use the fact, if fact it be, of the worthlessness of the fertilizer as a defense by pleading failure of consideration, or, by separate suit, assert as a distinct cause of action the fertilizer to be positively deleterious, and claim damages for the injury which resulted from its use. Inasmuch as he did not submit the issue of failure of consideration in the federal court, the judgment in that court did not adjudicate that there was no defect in the goods or injury from their use. It only precluded Kirven from setting up defects as a defense ever thereafter on the familiar rule that a defendant must set up all his defenses or lose the benefit of them. Therefore, as a defense, failure of consideration was gone. But when Kirven elected not to use, as a defense, the fact of worthlessness, which might have been available in the action of the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company against him, he was not precluded from using the very different facts of deleteriousness and positive injury caused by appellant's alleged negligence in the manufacture of the fertilizer as the basis of an independent cause of action. Having such a cause of action against the Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company, Kirven had a right to choose his own time and his own tribunal for asserting it, and could not be forced to assert it at the time and before the tribunal chosen by the company. This conclusion is, I think, in accord with the principles laid down in Hart v. Bates, 17 S. C. 40. The reason for it is thus clearly stated in the lucid opinion of Judge Sanford, in Brown v. Bank, 132 Fed. 450, 452, 66 C. C. A. 293: "The reason for this rule is that the damages resulting from the plaintiff's wrongful act may be indeterminate, or may not have entirely accrued, when he brings his action, and it might be unjust or inequitable to permit him to determine the time when the defendant must present and prove his claim for the damages which he has suffered from the breach of the plaintiff's contract." In Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351, 24 L. Ed. 195, Justice Field uses this language: "But, where the second action between the same parties is upon a different claim or demand, the judgment in the prior action operates as an estoppel only as to those matters in issue or points controverted, upon the determination of which the finding or verdict was rendered. In all cases, therefore, where it is sought to apply the estoppel of a judgment rendered upon one cause of action, the inquiry must always be as to the point or question actually litigated and determined in the original action, not what might have been thus litigated and determined. Only upon such matters is the judgment conclusive in another action." This language is quoted with approval in Willoughby v. Railroad Co., 52 S. C. 174, 29 S. E. 629, where, however, the doctrine of res judicata was held to apply because the very questions made in the second suit had been actually litigated and decided in the first.

It has been repeatedly held that a judgment for the purchase price of goods does not preclude a separate action against the seller for breach of warranty, and the principle has been extended to other like cases, unless the purchaser had set up the breach as a defense or counterclaim. Black on Judgments, §§ 761-769; Van Fleet on Former Adjudication, §§ 168-170; 23 Cyc. 1202; Pomeroy's Rem. § 804; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. 785; Riley v. Hale, 33 N. E. 491, 158 Mass. 240; Dewsnap et al. v. Davidson, 26 Atl. 902, 18 R. I. 98; Jones v. Witousek et al., 86 N. W. 59, 114 Iowa, 14; Uppfalt v. Woermann et al., 46 N. W. 419, 30 Neb. 189; Kennedy v. Davisson, 33 S. E. 291, 46 W. Va. 433; Van Epps v. Harrison (N. Y.) 40 Am. Dec. 326, note; Johnson v. Reeves (Ga.) 37 S. E. 980, 112 Ga. 690; Pub. Ass'n v. Fisher, 54 N. W. 759, 95 Mich. 274; Green v. Bank, supra. Cases like Ryan v. Association, 50 S. C. 185, 27 S. E. 618, 62 Am. St. Rep. 831, are not opposed to this conclusion. There Ryan sued to recover double the sum alleged to have been received by the defendant association for usurious interest. The charging of usurious interest was under the statute a defense to the action on the debt, but the penalty was recoverable as a counterclaim or in a separate action only for usurious interest actually received. Before any action was brought on the debt, usurious interest had been charged, but not received. To this action, therefore, Ryan had a defense for usury, but no counterclaim for a penalty. He did not set up the defense, and therefore it was held, after judgment against him on the debt, the defense of usury was forever shut off, just as the defense of payment would have been. It was held, further, that the excess of interest having been received, not on the contract, but on the judgment into which the agreement had been merged, the penalty could not be recovered. But it was not held nor intimated that, if usurious interest be received on a contract before judgment, the debtor could not bring a separate action for the penalty, though he had chosen not to set up the defense of usury against the suit on the contract. On the contrary, the opinion was expressed that he could bring such an action without having set up the defense of usury. It is difficult to understand how the failure of the crops on the land, where the fertilizer in question was used, could have been caused by negligence in its manufacture, but there was much evidence for the consideration of the jury on that point, and the judgment, therefore, cannot be reversed for an entire lack of testimony to sustain it.

POPE, C. J. (dissenting). Being unable to concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice GARY, I state briefly my views.

The Code of Civil Procedure of 1902 (section 170) provides: "The answer of the defendant must contain: (1) A general or special denial * * *. (2) A statement of any new matter constituting a defense or counter-claim in ordinary and concise language, without repetition." Section 171 provides: "The counter-claim mentioned in the last section must be one existing in favor of the defendant, against a plaintiff between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of the following causes of action: (1) A cause of action arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim or connected with the subject of the action. (2) In an action arising on contract, any other cause of action arising also on contract, and existing at the commencement of the action. The defendant may set forth by answer as many defenses and counter-claims as he may have, whether they be such as heretofore have been denominated legal or equitable, or both. They must each be separately stated, and refer to the causes of action which they are intended to answer, in such manner that they may be intelligibly distinguished."

For a proper understanding of the spirit which prompted these sections, it will be necessary to refer briefly to the state of procedure as it existed at the time of the adoption of the Code. It will be remembered that prior thereto tribunals for the trial of questions of law were separate and distinct from those which had to deal with equity issues. Likewise there were numerous forms in accordance with which it was necessary to bring the various classes of cases then existing.

Consequently all procedure was fraught with much technicality. Choice of a wrong form or failure to distinguish between legal and equitable issues often proved fatal to causes of action. With the progress of the science, however, it was impossible that such a state of affairs could continue. Formality had to give place to materiality. The relief sought was embodied in the Code, which provided for the abolition of all distinction between suits in equity and actions at law and the abolition of all common-law forms and the establishment of one form to be known as the civil action. It was intended that the new procedure should be highly remedial. Instead of having to split action and bring law issues in law courts and equity issues in equity courts, or law defenses in law courts and equity defenses in equity courts, there was to be but one action, in which all joined in interest must be made parties and every question connected with the case was to be adjudicated. Litigation would be thus convenience and multiplicity of suits prevented.

Proceeding to carry out this design, the framers of this legislation were met with cases in which, although it might be an advantage to litigants to pursue a certain course, yet there was no special advantage to be gained as a matter of public policy. Others occurred in which justice and public policy demanded certain methods of procedure. In providing for the former permissive words were used, while in the latter cases the language is mandatory. Attention is called to this for the purpose of emphasizing the word "must" in the act now under consideration. The Legislature having used the term, this court must take for granted that it was used advisedly and for the purpose of remedying some existing evil. It has no authority to hold that the term was used inadvertently. The act also provides that the defendant may set up as many defenses or counterclaims as he has, however inconsistent they are with each other. This is to give him the benefit of all his claims. Construing this clause with the whole act the strong implication is, if he fail to set up any one of his defenses or counterclaims, he is after judgment precluded from again asserting what might have been his right. This is the only construction consistent with the mandatory injunction as to what the answer shall contain. Of course, it does not apply to defenses or claims not included in the statute. The law gives the defendant an opportunity, but does not attempt to compel him to take advantage of it; that is, it does not attempt to say that he shall set up all of his claims and defenses. Under our statute one action makes a finality. Pomeroy in his work on Remedies (section 804) says, in the absence of statutory provision, it is not necessary to plead counterclaims in defense. Implicitly, however, where statute does require it, all claims and defenses must be set up.

Is the statute above quoted applicable to the case now under consideration? Section 171 provides, among other things, that counterclaims mentioned in the preceding section must exist in favor of the defendant against the plaintiff, and must arise out of the same transaction or be connected with the subject-matter of the suit. This language, while to some extent indefinite, is sufficiently clear to remove all doubt from this case. It seems plain that the claim on which the action here is brought arose out of the transaction as to the fertilizer. But, if this be doubted, certainly no one can doubt but that it is connected with the subject-matter of the former suit. The fertilizer sold was productive of the alleged damage here sought to be recovered for. Therefore it should have been set up as a defense. There are no cases exactly in point, but McAlley v. Barber, 4 S. C. 48, and Rice v. Mahaffey, 9 S. C. 282, to some extent support the position taken.

But, aside from the statutory provision, there is a strong ground for holding that the plaintiff here cannot now maintain this action. The general rule will not be doubted that a direct final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction on the same subject-matter, between the parties and privies in law or estate, is conclusive, and cannot be re-examined in a subsequent action in the same or any other court. Manigault v. Deas, Bailey's Eq. 293; McDowall v. McDowall, Bailey's Eq. 326; Davis v. Murphy, 2 Rich. Law, 560, 45 Am. Dec. 749; Hart v. Bates, 17 S. C. 35. The difficulty, however, arises in the application of the rule. What constitutes the same subject-matter and what are the issues decided? The rule as laid down by Taylor on Evidence (volume 2, § 1513), that, "except in special cases, the plea of res judicata applies not only to points upon which the court was actually required to form an opinion and pronounce judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the litigation and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time, is supported by much authority. 24 A. & E. Ency. of Law, 781; Outram v. Morewood, 3 East, 346; Gould v. Railway, 91 U. S. 528, 23 L. Ed. 416; Henderson v. Henderson, 3 Hare, 115; Stafford v. Clark, 2 Bing. 382; Miller v. Covert, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 487; Bagot v. Williams, 3 B. & C. 241; Roberts v. Helm, 27 Ala. 678; Dunham v. Bower, 77 N. Y. 76, 33 Am. Rep. 570; Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351, 24 L. Ed. 195; Dowell v. Applegate, 152 U. S. 327, 14 Sup. Ct. 611, 38 L. Ed. 463; and numerous other United States cases. Equally well founded is the principle that a party cannot split up his defenses. Beloit v. Morgan, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 619, 19 L. Ed. 205; Henderson v. Henderson, supra; Gunter v. Railway, 200 U. S. 273, 26 Sup. Ct. 252, 50 L. Ed. 477.

Without passing on these questions, however, we proceed to the principle that seems conclusive of the case. Without conflict are the authorities in holding that where judgment goes against the defendant, and he afterwards sues the plaintiff on a cross-claim, which he might have presented in the first suit, but did not, if the facts which he must establish to authorize his recovery are inconsistent with the facts on which the plaintiff recovered in the first action, or in direct opposition to them, the former judgment is a bar. Black on Judgments, § 676; 23 Cyc. 1202; Ryan v. Association, 50 S. C. 187, 27 S. E. 618, 62 Am. St. Rep. 831; Blair v. Bartlett, 75 N. Y. 150, 31 Am. Rep. 455; Bigelow on Estoppel (2d Ed.) p. 36; Reichert v. Krass, 41 N. E. 835, 13 Ind. App. 348; Dunham v. Bower, supra; Association v. Wellington (C. C.) 116 Fed. 100; Fayerweather v. Ritch, 195 U. S. 301, 25 Sup. Ct. 58, 49 L. Ed. 193. This rule is founded on grounds of reason and public policy. Without it the conclusiveness of judgments would become a will-o-the-wisp, a mere phantom existing in the imagination of minds. The second court obtaining jurisdiction, if it sustains the claim of the plaintiff, would in effect reverse the decision of the former court, and make it a mere nullity in many cases. A state of facts found to exist by a jury of 12 men could be declared by 12 others not to exist. Never could a plaintiff, who recovered judgment in an action, feel assured that the defendant was not keeping back some counterclaim by which he meant to make his judgment of no effect. Courts of justice would be robbed of much of their justice-dispensing power, and great multiplicity of suits would result.

With this principle in view, let us examine the facts of the present case. There can be no doubt that, although the former action in this case was brought upon a note, it was in fact for the recovery of the value of the fertilizer here alleged to have caused the damage. Plaintiff himself in the record admits this. What issue was decided then in that former case? Plaintiff there alleged that it had sold to the defendant fertilizer to the value of a certain sum. This defendant denied. The issue went to the jury, and they found for the plaintiff. Interpreting their verdict, they in effect say that plaintiff did sell the defendant fertilizers, that they were valuable to him to the amount claimed, and, therefore, defendant should pay plaintiff such amount. The defendant now brings this action, alleging damages arising from the deleterious quality of the fertilizers. This would have been a perfect defense to the action above referred to if defendant could have proved it. He could even have claimed his damage, and the jury, instead of finding that the fertilizers were of value to him, could have found that they did him damage, and could have given him a judgment against the plaintiff.

This case is identical in principle with the case of Blair v. Bartlett, supra. In that case plaintiff brought an action for malpractice. Prior to this action the defendant had brought an action against him in which he recovered the full amount claimed for his services. To this action he pleaded res judicata. The court sustained this plea, saying that the former case had established the facts of the rendition of the services, and that they were valuable to the defendant since he was compelled to pay for them. But, if of value, they could not have been useless; and, if of use, they could not have been harmful. Identical are the facts found here. The former action settled, beyond all question, that plaintiff received the fertilizers and that they were of value to him. Applying the reasoning of the court above, if they were of value, they could not have been useless, and, if of use, they could not have been harmful. Value and harm are antipodal terms. They cannot coexist in the same material. The former action having found that the fertilizers were valuable, if the plaintiff is now allowed to recover in this action, he must necessarily impute error to the former finding of a court of competent jurisdiction, a thing which, according to the authorities and as a matter of public policy, he will not be allowed to do.

For these reasons I think the judgment should be reversed.

JONES, J. I concur in the view that there should be a reversal upon the ground last discussed in this opinion.

Remittitur is held up to permit appellant to take this case to the United States Supreme Court.

FLEMING v. POWER, Auditor.

TAXATION—LEVY OF TAX—INJUNCTION—REMEDY AT LAW.

An application to enjoin a county auditor from collecting an income tax, under Civ. Code 1902, §§ 328-331, will be denied, plaintiff having a complete remedy under Civ. Code 1902, § 413, authorizing payment under protest and an action against the county treasurer for the recovery of the same.

Application by J. O. C. Fleming for injunction against C. A. Power, auditor of Laurens county, to restrain him from levying income tax. Petition dismissed.

Dial & Todd, for petitioner. M. P. De Bruhl, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the respondent.

POPE, C. J. This is an application by the petitioner, J. O. C. Fleming, to this court, in its original jurisdiction, for a writ of injunction against the respondent, as auditor of Laurens county, to enjoin him from proceeding under an act of the General Assembly entitled "An act to raise revenue for the support of the state government by the levy and collection of a tax on incomes," approved the 5th day of March, 1897, and now incorporated in the Code of Laws of South Carolina, 1902 (Civil Code), volume 1, as sections 325 to 331, inclusive, to assess and charge against the petitioner a tax of 1 per cent. on each dollar of his income over and above the sum of $2,500, to wit, the sum of $30, and from adding thereto 50 per cent. thereof as a penalty for petitioner's failure to make a return of his income. A rule to show cause having been granted, the cause was heard by this court upon the facts stated in the petition, and in the answer and return of the respondent. There is no dispute in regard to matters of fact. The questions in issue are questions of law.

However interesting the merits of the case might be, this court will not consider them. It is well settled that, where there is an adequate remedy at law, courts of equity will not interfere. Therefore, in this case, if petitioner has an adequate remedy at law the injunction will not issue. Section 413 of the Civil Code of 1902 provides: "In all cases in which any county, state, or other taxes are now or shall be hereafter charged upon the books of any county treasurer of the State against any person, and such treasurer shall claim the payment of the taxes so charged, or shall take any step or proceeding to collect the same, the person against whom such taxes are charged, or against whom such step or proceeding shall be taken, shall, if he conceives the same to be unjust or illegal for any cause, pay the said taxes notwithstanding, under protest, in such funds or moneys as the said county treasurer shall be authorized to receive by the act of the General Assembly levying the same; and upon such payment being made, the said county treasurer shall pay the taxes so collected into the state treasury, giving notice at the same time to the Comptroller General that the payment was made under protest; and the person so paying said taxes may, at any time within thirty days after making such payment, but not afterwards, bring an action against the said county treasurer for the recovery thereof in the court of common pleas for the county in which said taxes are payable; and if it be determined in said action that such taxes were wrongfully or illegally collected, for any reason going to the merits, then the court before whom the case is tried shall certify of record that the same were wrongfully collected and ought to be refunded, and thereupon the Comptroller General shall issue his warrant for the refunding of the taxes so paid, which shall be paid in preference to other claims against the treasury: Provided, that the county treasurers shall be required to receive jury and witness tickets for attendance upon the circuit courts of the state receivable for taxes due the county in which the said services are rendered." Why this remedy is inadequate in this case we are unable to see. Petitioner having brought his action for recovery the court can then proceed to an inquiry as to the validity of the act, and, if it is found to be null and void, his money will be returned.

Petitioner contends, however, that even if in this instance he recovers the taxes so paid the above quoted remedy would be insufficient, for the reason that each year there would be an illegal assessment and collection, and as often he would be compelled to bring an action for recovery and would thus be put to much annoyance and expense. Clearly this contention cannot be upheld. The idea of county or state authorities attempting to collect a tax under a law declared void by the courts is absolutely repugnant to the principles upon which our government is founded. The power of the courts to pass upon legislative acts and declare them unconstitutional, if necessary, is regarded as one of the bulwarks of liberty and of the protection of property, and any action which in effect nullifies such authority or brings it into contempt will not be likely to occur.

In our opinion the petitioner has a full and adequate remedy at law, and therefore his petition is dismissed.

McMILLAN et al. v. McMILLAN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 6, 1907.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—CONTRACT—DEFINITENESS.

Unless the material stipulations of a contract are made out with sufficient definiteness for the court to do justice concerning them, it will not undertake to decree specific performance.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Specific Performance, § 61.]

2. SAME—PAROL CONTRACT—PAYMENT OF PRICE.

Payment of the purchase money alone cannot support an action for specific performance of a parol contract to convey land, where the possession was not changed after the alleged contract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Specific Performance, § 126.]

3. SAME—IMPROVEMENTS.

Improvements of such an extent that a reasonable man would not incur the expense of making them, except in reliance on a contract of purchase, are necessary to a suit for specific performance of a verbal contract on the ground of part performance.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Specific Performance, §§ 132, 133.]

4. SAME—RELIEF AWARDED—RECOVERY OF PRICE PAID.

Where a complaint in an action for specific performance of a parol contract to convey land stated that plaintiff was to have possession and use of the home place, support his mother, and pay off a mortgage, and on payment of the debt was to receive a conveyance of one-half interest in the entire tract, and the evidence was insufficient to permit a decree of specific performance, plaintiff could recover the money paid on the price of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Specific Performance, § 419.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Chesterfield.

Action by M. E. McMillan, individually and as administrator of John A. McMillan, and others, against M. J. McMillan. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. P. Pollock, for appellants. Stevenson & Matheson, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This action was brought against the defendant, Mrs. M. J. McMillan, by the plaintiffs, the widow and children of her deceased son, John A. McMillan, for specific performance of an alleged agreement to convey to John A. McMillan one-half interest in a tract of land containing 637 acres. On the testimony taken and reported by a referee, the circuit judge dismissed the complaint, and the plaintiffs appeal.

This tract of land with two others, of 124 acres and 10 acres, belonging to Thos. E. McMillan, the husband of defendant and father of John A. McMillan. Having been unsuccessful in a mercantile business investment, John A. McMillan in February, 1893, moved with his family to the home of his father. On his father's death, in November following, he became administrator of the estate and continued on the land with his mother until his own death, in October, 1901. The plaintiffs, his widow and children, remained until 1904, and since leaving have rented out and received the income from part of the place. In 1894, after the death of Thos. E. McMillan, the three tracts of land belonging to his estate were sold under an order of the court for the payment of his debts, and purchased by his widow, the defendant, for $1,100. To obtain the money to comply with her bid, she executed a mortgage to F. M. Welsh for $755. John aided her in arranging for the purchase of the property and in the negotiation of the loan. The complaint alleges a parol contract made between John A. McMillan and his mother, by which John was to have possession and use of the entire home place of 637 acres, support his mother, who was living with him, and pay off the mortgage, and, upon payment of the debt, he was to receive from his mother a conveyance of one-half interest in the entire tract. The question is: Was there a definite parol contract made out by the clear preponderance of the evidence with such partial performance as to take it out of the statute of frauds?

1. We do not think there was any inconsistency or variance in the evidence of the plaintiff's witnesses as to the subject-matter of the alleged contract. The principal witness, Welsh, testified: "Mrs. M. J. McMillan told me in the presence of John A. McMillan that, when John A. McMillan paid up the mortgage debt, she was going to convey to him one-half of the home tract." This did not necessarily mean one-half of the area of the tract, and is not inconsistent with the explanation by the witness, on being recalled, that "Mrs. McMillan said when the mortgage was paid she would transfer him one-half interest in the land." Indeed, it seems clear that all the plaintiff's witnesses, who undertook to state the contract, though using different language, meant to testify to a contract to convey a one-half interest and not one-half in area. Nor do we think the contract attributed to Mrs. McMillan was too indefinite as to the time within which the mortgage was to be paid. Time is not usually of the essence of such agreements. When no time for payment is mentioned, it should be considered that either immediate payment or payment in a reasonable time, according to the circumstances of the case, is intended. The failure to show an express stipulation as to the time of performance, especially as to payment of money, standing alone, should not be allowed to defeat a parol agreement for the sale of land, which is sufficiently definite in other respects. Thompson v. Dulles, 5 Rich. Eq. 387; Prothro v. Smith, 6 Rich. Eq. 332; 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. 37. In this case the mortgage, which it is said John A. McMillan was to assume, was payable at a future day, and it is a fair inference that he was to pay it at maturity.

There is more difficulty on the part of definiteness with respect to the period for which Mrs. McMillan was to live with her son, and receive support from him. It was not fixed by any of the witnesses. When a widow contracts to convey land either in fee or for her life for the consideration of her support, the obligation for support extends to the end of her life; but, when she makes no deed and only contracts for her support, in consideration for the use of agricultural lands without fixing the period for which the arrangement is to continue, the court cannot bind either party to any definite time, and either may terminate the arrangement at the end of any agricultural year. Here the agreement attributed to Mrs. McMillan contemplated the conveyance of a half interest in the land to John A. McMillan and his use of the whole, for which he was to pay the mortgage and support his mother. Nothing appears in the imputed contract as to how long the support was to continue. This was an important feature, not severable from the other elements of the contract. It was not pretended that there was one contract that John A. McMillan should pay the mortgage and have one half the land, and another that he should have the use of the whole land, or the remaining half, for the support of his mother. The court cannot, therefore, refer the support to the consideration of the use of the land exclusively, and say it was to end at the will of either party. Nor can it refer the support exclusively to the alleged promise to convey, and hold it was to continue for the life of the mother. In this essential feature the contract was altogether indefinite. Unless the material stipulations of a contract are made out with sufficient definiteness for the court to do justice concerning them, it will not undertake to decree specific performance.

But, assuming a sufficiently definite parol contract to have been made, there was no proof of such partial performance as would take the case out of the statute of frauds. John A. McMillan, it is true, at the time of his death, had paid all of the mortgage debt except about $200. This balance was paid by his mother after his death; and, before the commencement of this action, the plaintiffs tendered to her the amount so paid, and interest. Payment of the purchase money alone, however, cannot support an action for specific performance. Possession was not changed. John A. McMillan after his father's death continued to live on the place, managing the farm. This condition as to possession continued after the alleged contract of purchase. As a general rule, change of possession is necessary. Hatcher v. Hatcher, McMul. Eq. 318; Poag v. Sandifer, 5 Rich. Eq. 181; Charles v. Byrd, 29 S. C. 559, 8 S. E. 1. If the possession be not changed, there must be some act of the purchaser showing with equal clearness an assertion of dominion over the land in his own right as purchaser; and of such act the plaintiff must have notice. There was evidence of some building, ditching, and perhaps other improvements made by John A. McMillan. But the nature and extent of the improvements taken in connection with the relation of the parties did not indicate an assertion of exclusive title by John A. McMillan. He was one of three children, with an expectation of inheritance of all his mother's lands. The rental income of the lands used by him was from $350 to $400, and the only charge for it was his mother's board, and that for only a portion of the time. The improvements were for the comfort of his family, and for increasing the productiveness of the land, which he had the prospect of retaining for an indefinite period. Improvements of such extent that a reasonable man would not incur the expense of making them, except in reliance on a contract of purchase, must add strength to a claim of part performance of a verbal contract of purchase, especially if made with the consent or knowledge of the legal owner. But John A. McMillan, as a reasonable man, might well have made these improvements, expecting to receive the benefit of them without respect to any contract of purchase. There is no proof that the improvements and the support given to Mrs. McMillan were worth so much more than the use of the land, or that John A. McMillan had been induced by a verbal contract to so change his condition or prospects that it would be a fraud upon him not to enforce the alleged contract. Thus far the case has been considered solely on the version of the contractual relations between the defendant and her son, John, given by F. M. Welsh and other witnesses on behalf of plaintiffs, and we think this evidence, leaving out of view the evidence for the defendant, does not make out a case for specific performance. When the evidence for the defendant is considered, the terms of the agreement between John and his mother become involved in the greatest doubt and uncertainty. Mrs. McMillan flatly denied the contract of sale, and testified, on the contrary, that John was to pay the mortgage, and, as compensation, to have the land for three years. And her evidence is not without corroboration in the statements which other witnesses say were made to them by John A. McMillan. The evidence, therefore, as to the nature of the contract under which John A. McMillan occupied the land and made payments on the mortgage is contradictory, and does not produce any clear conviction that Mrs. McMillan agreed to convey him one-half interest in the land. It was to just such cases as this that the statute of frauds was intended to apply.

To sum up, specific performance must be denied for these reasons: (1) The existence of a parol contract to convey is not established by evidence clear and convincing. (2) Assuming such a contract to have been made, it is so indefinite in some of its material elements that the court could not do justice between the parties in a decree for specific performance. (3) There was no change of possession, and the acts relied on as a part performance of the contract to convey, contended for by the plaintiffs, are not inconsistent with the contract for a limited use of the land, testified to by the defendant.

2. Finally, the plaintiffs contend, if they have failed to make out a case for specific performance, the plaintiff M. E. McMillan, as administratrix of the estate of John A. McMillan, is entitled to recover the money paid by him on the purchase price of the land. We think the complaint is broad enough to cover such relief. But, as the relief specially asked in the complaint was a decree for specific performance and not a judgment for the recovery of money, the defendant should be allowed, if so advised, to set up the pleas of statute of limitations and laches. In ascertaining what amount, if any, is due by the defendant for money paid by John A. McMillan for her benefit on the purchase price of the land, she should be allowed credit for the reasonable rental value of the land, less the value of John A. McMillan's contribution to her support, and less the increased value imparted to the land by any substantial betterments placed on the land by him while occupying it.

With this modification, the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed, and the case remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary.

TODD v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 7, 1907.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR—TRIAL COURT'S DISCRETION—CONTINUANCE.

After motion to amend complaint during trial was granted, a refusal to continue the case on account of surprise is not reversible error, unless abuse of discretion is shown.

2. TELEGRAPHS—DELIVERY—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

In an action for delay in delivery of telegram, where the evidence was undisputed of an effort to deliver it and the delay was long, and it was not finally delivered because the addressee was located too late to render the message of any avail, the company is not liable for punitive damages.

3. SAME—MENTAL ANGUISH.

In an action for delay in delivering a telegram directing the recipient to furnish a carriage at a railway station, plaintiff cannot show mental anguish on account of not being able to get the carriage for his wife and children, where they were not mentioned in the telegram.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County.

Action by H. L. Todd against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Geo. H. Feasons and Evans & Finley, for appellant. Johnson & Nash, for respondent.

GARY, J. This action is based upon the failure to deliver a telegram. The allegations of the complaint material to the questions involved are as follows: "That on the 29th day of June, 1904, the plaintiff was at Clinton, S. C., with his family, consisting of his wife and several small children. At half past 8 o'clock in the morning of said day he delivered to the defendant, at its office in Clinton, a message directed to R. M. League, at White Stone, directing said R. M. League to meet him that afternoon at Glendale Mills with a carriage. That plaintiff then and there informed defendant of the importance of said message, and requested that it be sent immediately, so that he and his family would not be left at Glendale Mills, several miles from home, without means of conveyance. The defendant received said message, and promised to promptly transmit and deliver same as directed. That, although said R. M. League, who is a servant and employé of the plaintiff, was at his well-known place of business during the whole of said day, when said message could, and ought to have been delivered to him, and although said place of business was within 200 yards of the office of defendant at White Stone, and within the regular delivery limits of said office, said defendant wilfully, wantonly, with gross negligence, and in utter disregard of the rights of plaintiff failed to transmit and deliver said message, and said message has never been delivered to R. M. League, or to any one for him until this day, and no attempt even to do so has ever been made. That, if defendant had promptly and properly delivered said message, as it was its duty to do, R. M. League could and would have met plaintiff at Glendale Mills with a closed and comfortable carriage, and conveyed him and his family home to White Stone, without exposure to the inclement weather, and plaintiff would have been spared great mental stress and anguish, to which he was subjected by the wanton, willful, and negligent acts of the defendant." The defendant denied the allegations of negligence and willfulness, and set up as a defense "that if plaintiff suffered any damage, as alleged in the complaint, it was by reason of the negligence of plaintiff, and his failure to take advantage of the means at his command for preventing such damage." During the progress of the trial, the plaintiff's attorneys made a motion to amend the last of said paragraphs of the complaint, so as to make it read: "If they had delivered the telegram to R. M. League, he would have sent a closed carriage to Glendale, as directed by Mr. Todd." The motion was granted, whereupon the defendant's attorney made a motion for a continuance, on the ground of surprise, which was refused. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

1. Error is assigned in permitting the amendment, and in refusing thereafter to continue the case, but the exceptions raising these questions are overruled, for the reason that it has not been made to appear that there was an abuse of discretion.

2. The next question for consideration is whether there was any testimony tending to show that the plaintiff was entitled to punitive damages. The message was transmitted from Clinton, by way of Spartanburg, where it was received some time during the morning of the 29th of June, and shortly thereafter sent by telephone to White Stone Springs, about three miles from White Stone railroad station, which is about three miles, also, from Glendale Mills. White Stone Station was formerly known as Rich Hill, and the telegraph office at White Stone had been established only a short time. There was no telegraph office at White Stone Springs. The plaintiff testified that he arrived at Glendale Mills about 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

C. L. Mingus, a witness for the defendant, thus explains why the telegram was not delivered: "Q. Where did you live the 29th day of June, 1904? A. Spartanburg. Q. What was your occupation? A. I was manager of the Western Union Company. Q. State whether or not you received the telegram from H. L. Todd to R. M. League? A. Yes, sir. Q. Have you got the telegram? A. Yes, sir. Q.

State whether you received it at Spartanburg? A. Yes, sir; received it at Spartanburg. Q. State what was done with it? A. The message was received in the regular course of business, and telephoned to White Stone. Q. What time was it received? A. 10:24 in the morning. Q. And sent when? A. It was 'phoned two minutes later to White Stone Hotel. It was known in the telegraph rule book as White Stone. Q. You had a telephone connection with White Stone Hotel, and when you got a message you 'phoned it? A. Yes, sir. Q. All messages were 'phoned there? A. I had been 'phoning them always, because all the messages we had handled at the time addressed to White Stone went to White Stone Hotel. So far as I remember this is the first that I have ever found that was not really intended for White Stone Hotel addressed that way. Q. It was 'phoned down there and left with whom? A. Hotel clerk, Mr. Fox. Q. Did he receive it? A. Yes, sir; 10:20 a. m. He is the man who took the messages almost all the time. Q. What date was that message received? A. June 29, 1904. Q. Was it received at 10 o'clock on the 29th? A. 10:20, and two minutes later 'phoned to White Stone Hotel, and received by Mr. Fox, the hotel clerk. Q. Was that message returned to you? A. Some hours after that—I don't know the time of the day either, I made no record of it—but some hours after that time, as well as I remember, probably 3:30 to 4 o'clock, somewhere along there, the hotel called up and said they were unable to deliver the message—couldn't find any one about the hotel with that name. I asked them if they had sent it to the water house where they were shipping water, and there they found that they didn't know anything about this man League. And it was, I think, in the neighborhood of an hour—I won't say as to the time—they called again, and said they didn't know him there, but there was a man by the name of League at White Stone Station, and I looked at the message and I saw that Mr. Todd had gone there, and I saw it was entirely too late to accomplish the purpose, and to have forwarded it to White Stone Station under our rules and custom would have incurred an expense of 25 cents, additional, and, if it hadn't been paid there, it would have fallen on me to pay it, but it was entirely too late to carry out the purpose of the telegram, according to my information given in the telephone message." While there was long delay, there was undisputed evidence of an effort to deliver the message, and the reason it was not finally delivered was because it would then have been useless.

These facts bring the case within the principle announced in Roberts v. Telegraph Co., 73 S. C. 520, 53 S. E. 985, and Key v. Telegraph Co., 76 S. C. 284, 56 S. E. 949, that mere delay in delivering a telegram is not sufficient to send the case to the jury on the question of punitive damages when there is undisputed evidence of an effort to deliver. This assignment of error is sustained.

8. The last question for consideration is whether there was any testimony tending to show that the plaintiff suffered mental anguish. The plaintiff testified as follows: "Q. Did you suffer any mental anguish or distress? A. I did. Q. State the facts why you were worried? A. I was greatly worried and put out from the fact that it was threatening, and I had my wife with me— (Mr. Evans: Now, your honor, he is simply trying to get in this irrelevant testimony before this jury, which he has no right to do after the court has held that he cannot testify to that. Court: Don't say anything about your suffering with reference to your wife.) Witness: I was greatly worried from the fact that I could not get any conveyance, and it was coming on night, and all the teams were out from Glendale, and we had no way to get home." His honor, the presiding judge, ruled that the plaintiff could not introduce testimony for the purpose of showing mental anguish on account of not being able to get the carriage for his wife and children, as they were not mentioned in the telegram. The case of Capers v. Telegraph Co., 71 S. C. 29, 50 S. E. 537, decides that the mental anguish statute has reference to social and personal matters, as distinguished from business transactions; and, when the presiding judge ruled out the testimony as to the wife and children, there was no element of mental anguish, and it became purely a business transaction. The case is different from that of Toale v. Telegraph Co., 76 S. C. 248, 57 S. E. 117, in which the jury was allowed to consider the fact that the plaintiff informed the defendant's agent, when he delivered the message for transmission, that he was anxious to reach home, so as to be with his family. This assignment of error is also sustained.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded to that court for a new trial.

SPEEGLE v. SOVEREIGN CAMP OF THE WOODMEN OF THE WORLD et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 6, 1907.)

INSURANCE — BENEFIT INSURANCE — BENEFICIARY.

The certificate of membership of a mutual benefit society provided for payment of $3,000 on the death of a member to the beneficiary named, who under the by-laws must be either the wife, children, adopted children, parents, etc., and, if the member outlived the beneficiary named and died without naming another beneficiary, the benefit was to go to the member's next living relation in the order named. A member named his wife as beneficiary, and she died and he married again, leaving a second wife, without having changed the beneficiary. Held, that the second wife took the benefit.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 28, Insurance, § 1943.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County.

Action by Hattie K. Speegle against the Sovereign Camp of the Woodmen of the World and others. Judgment for all defendants, except the first, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

B. M. Shuman, for appellant. Cothran, Dean & Cothran, for respondents.

POPE, C. J. On June 19, 1896, J. E. Speegle became a member of the defendant corporation, Woodmen of the World, and received from it a benefit certificate for $3,000, payable at his death to his wife, Susan Speegle, subject to the conditions named in the constitution and by-laws of the corporation. The beneficiary, Susan Speegle, died in March, 1900, leaving seven children. No new beneficiary was named in the certificate. Thereafter J. E. Speegle married the plaintiff, Hattie K. Speegle, who is now his surviving widow; he having died on the 17th of October, 1905. She began this action on the 22d day of March, 1906, to recover the amount named in the certificate. The defendant corporation filed a petition for interpleader, alleging a dispute between the plaintiff, Hattie K. Speegle, and the above-named children of J. E. Speegle, deceased, as to who was entitled to the benefit provided for in the beneficiary certificate, and prayed that it be allowed to pay the fund into the court, and that the children of J. E. Speegle be made parties defendants, and contests with the plaintiff the right to the benefit. The petition having been granted, the children appeared and answered. After hearing the case, his honor, Judge R. C. Watts, held that they were entitled to the fund. The plaintiff appealed.

Section 3 of the constitution and by-laws of the defendant corporation, the section germane to this discussion, is as follows: "The objects of the order shall be to combine white male persons of sound bodily health, exemplary habits and good moral character, between the ages of fifteen and fifty-two years, into a secret, fraternal, beneficiary and benevolent order; provide funds for their relief, comfort the sick and cheer the unfortunate by attentive ministrations in times of sorrow and distress; promote fraternal love and unity; create a fund from which, on reasonable and satisfactory proof of death of a beneficiary member, who has complied with all of the requirements of the order, there shall be paid a sum not to exceed three thousand dollars, to the person or persons named in his certificate as beneficiary or beneficiaries, which beneficiary or beneficiaries shall be his wife, children, adopted children, parents, brothers, sisters, or other blood relations, or to persons dependent upon the member. * * * The name or names of the beneficiary or beneficiaries shall be written in every beneficiary certificate issued. In case such benefits are payable to one of the relations named herein, who shall at the time of the death of a member be also deceased, and no new designation has been made as hereinafter provided during life, the benefits shall be due and payable to the member's next living relation in the order named in this section; if there be no such relative surviving, then said benefits shall be forfeited to and remain in the beneficiary fund." Taking into consideration the philanthropic views stated in this by-law, we premise that one of the purposes uppermost in the minds of the founders of the organization was the protection of those near and dear to the members of the order from want in case of death. Therefore, subject to the general rules, that construction should be adopted which is most consistent with this view. The by-law permits the member to make any one of the above classes his beneficiary, but we do not think it going too far to say that the presumption was that the party nearest and most likely to be in need, should the insured die, would be named in the certificate as beneficiary. In case the person so named should die prior to the death of the member, then continuing the presumption that the benefit should be received by the person next closest to the member, it was provided that in such case "the benefit shall be due and payable to the member's next living relation in the order named in this section." Thus the rule of kinship is laid down by the certificate and necessarily binds the court (it being the contract of the parties) in arriving at a conclusion as to who is entitled to the benefit of the policy.

Difficulty arises, however, over the word "next," as used in the section quoted. Defendants contend that it refers to the beneficiary, and means the next class after that named in the certificate as beneficiary, while appellant contends that it is used as a synonym of "nearest" and refers to the member. There can be no doubt that there is a shade of difference between the words "next" and "nearest." It is likewise equally true that this shade of difference is often disregarded. Therefore, if by using the terms as synonymous the proper intention can be arrived at, we can legitimately do so. Evidently, as was said above, the intention was to see that the immediate connections of the member, that class nearest to him, should not suffer. This being the purpose, "next" must have the meaning of "nearest" and have reference to the member, not the beneficiary, otherwise the very nearest would often go unprovided for. The presumption being that the beneficiary was the person closest to the insured, then in case of death of the beneficiary, and afterwards of the insured, no change of beneficiary having been made, the by-law sought to provide for the next closest relation. In this sense we may give "next" the meaning contended for by the respondents; that is, the implication of a third person coming between. Thus in case the dying beneficiary was insured's wife, and there was a second wife at the time of his death, she, in the eyes of the framers of the by-law, was construed to be the relation next nearest to the member. Again, in the absence of a second wife, the children would be the nearest, and so on through the classes. The law works automatically, so to speak, there being no members of one class, the next class taking.

The respondents contend, however, that upon the death of the wife the benefit became practically vested in the children; and, further, that, by his failure to designate a new beneficiary, the deceased exhibited his intention that the children should be beneficiaries. These contentions cannot be sustained. In the first place, it is admitted by the respondents that the insured had the power to change the beneficiary at any time he saw fit; the matter being entirely under his control. Therefore, until his death, until he was no longer able to change his mind as to who should be his beneficiary, no one could be said to have a vested interest in the benefit. Even if there had been no second wife, the greatest interest that the children could possibly have had prior to the death of J. E. Speegle, in the absence of being expressly delegated as beneficiaries, was a mere expectancy or contingency.

As to the second contention, who can say that the deceased was not of the opinion that by failure to designate a new beneficiary the benefit would fall to his wife at his death. Clearly we think this opinion on his part as probable as the one contended for by the respondents. The certificate especially provided that, in case of the death of the named beneficiary, the next relation, beginning with the wife, should take. By his second marriage the deceased practically named, or rather made in the light of the by-laws, a new beneficiary, and thus caused the expectancy of the children to lapse. Mattison v. Woodmen of the World, 60 S. W. 897, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 214; Harris v. Harris (Tex. Civ. App.) 97 S. W. 504.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 11, 1907.)

LICENSES—SUBJECTS OF TAXES—OCCUPATIONS.

One operating a band sawmill, the product of which is lumber, and a box and roller factory, is engaged in two distinct businesses, taxed separately by an ordinance imposing an annual tax on sawmills and an annual tax on box or roller factories.

Action by the city of Washington against the Bureka Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Rodman, for appellant. Bragaw & Harding, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The ordinances of the town of Washington under authority of law prescribed among the subjects of taxation "mills and factories of all kinds, including band sawmills $25 per year; circular sawmills $20; barrel, box or roller factories $25 per year." The defendant has two buildings, 160 feet apart, built and formerly owned by distinct companies, but now connected by steam pipes and operated by the same company. In one of these buildings, which is a band sawmill, the finished product is lumber, in the other, the product is boxes and rollers. This last mill uses logs from which the product is made direct; only a very small percentage of its output being dressed lumber which comes in the rough state from the other mill.

From the above agreed facts, it is clear that there are two distinct businesses, taxed separately by the town ordinance. That both are conducted by the same company does not exempt one of them. Aray v. Commissioners, 138 N. C. 500, 51 S. E. 41, is exactly in point.

The complaint in an action brought in a court not having jurisdiction if it is on contract, alleging that plaintiff placed with defendant a horse to sell for him, that defendant received for it $149, which he has converted to his own use, and asking for recovery of such sum, and for arrest and bail of defendant, will be treated, in favor of jurisdiction, as an election to sue for that tort.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by T. W. White against Thomas Eley. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Winston & Matthews, for appellant. St. Leon Scull, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The complaint alleges that plaintiff placed with the defendant a horse to sell for him, that the defendant received for the horse the sum of $149, which he has converted to his own use, and asks for recovery of the sum so converted and for arrest and bail of defendant. The defendant demurred ore tenus that the superior court had no original jurisdiction because this is an action on contract. The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the action.

There is error. "When the action can be fairly treated as based either on contract or in tort, the courts in favor of jurisdiction will sustain the election made by the plaintiff." Brittain v. Payne, 118 N. C. 989, 24 S. E. 711; Schulhofer v. Railroad, 118 N. C. 1093, 24 S. E. 709. The plaintiff could sue either for the tort, the unlawful conversion, or on the contract. Bringing the action in one court when he might have brought it in the other is prima facie such election. Sams v. Price, 119 N. C. 574, 26 S. E. 170; Parker v. Express Co., 132 N. C. 130, 43 S. Railroad*, 108 N. C. 424, 12 S. E. 954, 956, 12 L. R. A. 113; Thompson v. Express Co., 144 N. C. 389, 57 S. E. 18. In Froelich v. Exp. Co., 67 N. C. 1, it was held that the complaint showed that the plaintiff had elected to sue on the contract for a sum less than $200, notwithstanding the action had been brought in the superior court.

The judgment dismissing the action is reversed.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—RISKS ASSUMED—ACTS OUTSIDE OF EMPLOYMENT.

Where a servant employed in a planing mill to straighten boards leaves his work without the order or request of the master, and as a favor to another servant in charge of a planer undertakes to operate the same, and is injured, the master is not liable.

3. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—PRESENTATION OF THEORY OF CASE.

It is error to refuse a special instruction asked as to a particular phase of the case presented by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 478.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by Louis Patterson against the North Carolina Lumber Company and others for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed for new trial.

This was a civil action which was tried before Lyon, J., and a jury at March term, 1907, of Halifax superior court. The plaintiff was employed by the defendant to straighten boards in its planing mill. He alleged, and there was evidence tending to prove, that, where any employé, who operated a planing machine, called upon him to take his place, while he was absent, he had been ordered by the manager to do so; that McWynn who had charge of one of the planers, left his place and requested the plaintiff to operate the machine while he was away. Plaintiff undertook to do so, and, while feeding the machine, his hand was cut and lacerated by a revolving cylinder; the machine being, as he alleged, in a defective condition, and to recover damages for the injury he brings this suit. There was evidence tending to show that the plaintiff had received no order to take McWynn's place, but that his duty was confined to straightening the boards. Among the several instructions requested by the defendant was the following: "Where an employé undertakes to do something not his duty to do, the master is not negligent; and, if the jury should find from the evidence that the plaintiff was acting outside the scope of his employment when he was injured, they will answer the first issue (as to negligence), 'No,' and the second issue (as to contributory negligence), 'Yes.' This instruction was refused, and the defendant excepted. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

Day, Bell & Allen and F. H. Busbee & Son, for appellants. Geo. C. Green and Albion Dunn, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). We think the defendant was clearly entitled to the instruction which was refused. Where the employé steps outside the line of his duty, or goes beyond the scope of his employment, and does something he is not required to do, he cannot recover from his master for any consequent injury, for in that particular he is not his servant, and his contract does not provide for the new risk which he thus assumes and to which he exposes himself. The result is the same, where the servant, without the order or request of his employer or his representative, or contrary to his orders, or at the request of another employé, who has no authority from the master to make it, undertakes to do something not assigned to him. In such a case he assumes all the risk of injury. The master contracts to exercise ordinary care for the purpose of keeping his premises, his machinery, his tools, and his appliances in a reasonable condition of safety for the protection of his servant employed to perform a stated service, and who is entitled to that protection while engaged in his work and so long as he continues therein and confines himself to what he is employed to do. The duty of the master to furnish safe and suitable implements and appliances, which due care for the protection of his servant would suggest, extends only to those employés who are required, permitted, or expected, in the course of the employment, to make use of the instrumentalities provided by him, or who, while in the performance of their work, may be injured by them if they are defective. Where the servant departs from the sphere of his assigned duty, the relation of master and servant is considered as temporarily suspended. The servant's position is then analogous to that of a trespasser, or perhaps of a bare licensee, and his master owes him no duty, nor is he under any legal obligation to anticipate his deviation from his instructions and the possible danger which may arise to him therefrom, and consequently to provide means for averting it. The servant becomes a volunteer as to the particular act which is outside the scope of his service and which he attempts to perform. He must therefore take things as he finds them, and suffer the consequences of his own error. The master cannot be held liable therefor, as the law will not, on obvious grounds of justice, compel the master to answer in damages for an injury which the servant has brought on himself by undertaking to do that which he was not directed or required to do, and it refers his injury not to the fault of the master but to his own unnecessary and gratuitous act. Where the servant leaves his own work to do something else for which he was not engaged, the duty of the master towards him reaches its vanishing point, as it has been said, at the moment of the transition, and his corresponding liability for a resulting injury disappears. There being no longer a contractual or legal relation imposing any duty on the master, for a breach of which he would be liable, it follows that there is nothing upon which to rest any claim for damages, because no cause of action arises from a failure to perform a mere act of humanity, or for the violation simply of a moral obligation, not involving any legal duty. This principle is well established, if not elementary. It is grounded in wisdom and justice. It is perfectly fair to the master and to the servant, and moreover is supported by the highest authority. 4 Thompson on Negligence, §§ 4677, 4678; Whitson v. Wrenn, 134 N. C. 86, 46 S. E. 17. It has been crystallized into one of the leading maxims of the law; for in applying the same doctrine in the case last cited (page 90 of 134 N. C., page 19 of 46 S. E.) we said: "The plaintiff in this case has simply done something which his master virtually told him not to do. He substituted his own will for that of his employer, and his case comes within the maxim 'Volenti non fit injuria.'" There are other expressions in that case illustrating the principle, which are directly applicable to the facts of this one. Mellor v. Manufacturing Co., 150 Mass. 362, 23 N. E. 100, 5 L. R. A. 792; Railway v. Hall, 105 Ala. 599, 17 South. 176; Allen v. Hixson, 111 Ga. 460, 36 S. E. 810; Parent v. Manufacturing Co., 70 N. H. 199, 47 Atl. 261; Walker v. Railway, 104 Mich. 606, 62 N. W. 1032. The recent case decided in this court of Martin v. Manufacturing Co., 128 N. O. 264, 38 S. E. 876, 83 Am. St. Rep. 671, is exactly in point. The identity of the two cases is striking.

Applying the principle we have stated to the facts of this case, we conclude that there was proof to sustain a finding for the defendant under the instruction, which was refused, namely, that the plaintiff had left the place of his work and, as a favor to McWynn, had undertaken to perform his duty in feeding the machine, when he was hurt, and the fact that there was evidence to the contrary cannot deprive the defendant of the right to have the disputed question submitted to the jury. It only made it the more necessary that such a course should have been taken. We have just held that, if a special instruction is asked as to a particular phase of the case presented by the evidence, it should be given by the court in substantial conformity to the prayer. Baker v. Railroad, 144 N. O. —, 56 S. E. 553. We so hold in this case, as the rule is manifestly a just and a most reasonable one. Horne v. Power Co., 141 N. C. 50, 53 S. E. 658, and cases cited.

We have examined the general charge of the court with the greatest care, and can find therein no substantial or adequate response to the rejected prayer, if there is any reference to it at all, and we think there is not. The charge, therefore, does not supply the omission to give the special instruction. The refusal to give the instruction, which the defendant requested, was error and entitles it to another trial. The questions involved in the other errors assigned may not again be presented, and, for this reason, we forbear to discuss them.

New trial.

RIDDICK v. DUNN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 11, 1907.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where, in an action for wharfage charges against a consignee, it appeared that wharfage charges had always been paid by the consignees for goods delivered at a wharf, and the bill of lading was not made a part of the case agreed on appeal from a judgment for plaintiff, it must be assumed that there was nothing in the bill of lading inconsistent with the custom as to the party liable for wharfage charges.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 8, Appeal and Error, § 3675.]

2. WHARVES—WHARFAGE—RIGHT TO.

A wharfinger is entitled to make a charge for the use of his wharf.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Wharves, §§ 13-17.]

3. CUSTOMS AND USAGES—APPLICATION AND OPERATION.

Plaintiff was a wharfinger, and his wharf was the only place at a certain port for the delivery of goods from the boats of the transportation company which carried the goods on which it was sought to collect wharfage charges. Prior to and at the time of the shipment of these goods he had always made wharfage charges, which were paid by consignees of goods delivered at his wharf. The charge sought to be collected was the customary one, and reasonable, and the custom to impose the same on consignees was well known to defendant consignee. The tariff rates of the company transporting the goods made no reference to wharfage charges. Held, that defendant was liable for the wharfage charges.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Customs and Usages, §§ 23, 24.]

4. WHARVES—RIGHT TO ESTABLISH AND MAINTAIN.

A riparian owner has a right to erect and maintain wharves subject to Revisal 1905, § 1696, declaring that navigation shall not be obstructed, etc.

5. SHIPPING—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—DELIVERY.

Where a consignee of goods did not inform a transportation company of his intention not to be bound by the established custom at a certain port to make wharfage charges against consignees and not against the carrier, the carrier was entitled to unload the goods at the wharf, which was the usual place of deposit, instead of delivering them out of the ship or at its side.

Appeal from Superior Court, Gates County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Action by R. M. Riddick against Joe Dunn. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Civil action heard upon a case-agreed by W. R. Allen, judge at March term of Gates superior court. The plaintiff brought the suit to recover the amount of wharfage charges upon goods shipped on a vessel of the Albemarle Steam Navigation Company from Franklin, Va., to Gatesville, in this state. He was lessee individually of a wharf at the latter town, which was the usual and only place for the delivery of goods from the boats of the said company, plaintiff being its agent at Gatesville. It was admitted that the charge for wharfage was the customary one and also reasonable, and that such charges have always been made and paid by the owners of goods delivered from the company's steamers on the wharf. The defendant had received goods himself and paid the wharfage charges, but notified the defendant that he would not do so in the future and not to receive any more of his goods on the wharf. The plaintiff insisted on their payment, and the defendant has since received goods from the wharf and paid the charges thereon, though, at the time, he refused to pay the charges now claimed, or any others thereafter. The goods on which the charges now sued for were made, have been delivered to and received by him from the plaintiff's wharf. The published rates of the Navigation Company contained no reference to a charge for wharfage. Upon the case-agreed the judge decided with the plaintiff, and from the judgment the defendant appealed.

W. M. Bond and A. Pilston Godwin, for appellant. L. L. Smith, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the case). We do not see why the defendant is not liable for the sum demanded. The plaintiff was a wharfinger and dealt with his patrons according to a general custom or usage, which had been recognized and acquiesced in by all of the consignees, including the defendant, at the port of Gatesville, whose goods were carried by the ships of the Navigation Company, namely, that the charges for wharfage should be paid to the plaintiff by them. The bill of lading was not made a part of the case-agreed, and, as we are not permitted here to presume anything against the correctness of the court's ruling, it must be assumed that there is nothing therein inconsistent with the custom or usage as to the party liable for wharfage charges. Indeed, it is stated in the case that there is no reference to such charges in the company's tariff of rates which would seem to imply that the latter were made with reference to the local custom at Gatesville, and that the rates of transportation were lower than they would have been if the company had undertaken to pay the terminal charges for wharfage. We cannot infer that carriers will voluntarily and gratuitously pay wharfage charges, which, in some cases, may be as much as the freight on the goods. That is not their custom, we believe; and, as they are entitled to charge for the entire service rendered, including any expenditures for terminal facilities, provided they are reasonable, we must take it that the company did not intend that the freight charges should cover any amount to be paid to the plaintiff for wharfage, for there is no evidence that this is so, and the custom which is admitted to have existed at Gatesville would tend to show that it is not true, but that, on the contrary, the parties—consignor, consignee, and carrier—were all dealing with each other in view of the custom and expected to be governed thereby. If the carrier agreed to pay the wharfage, or all terminal charges, either in the bill of lading or otherwise, it was easy to have inserted the fact in the case-agreed, or to have proved it, if the parties could not have agreed in respect to it. In the absence of any more definite statement of the facts, we must hold that the parties contracted with reference to the custom and are bound by it, the same as if it had been expressly stated in their agreement. Miller v. Tetherington, 6 H. & N. (Exch.) 278. That case decides that, when a custom is well known to exist, the parties must be considered to have contracted with reference to it, so as to import its terms into their agreement, or to require that the latter should be interpreted by it. Brown v. Byrne, 3 El. & B. (77 E. C. L.) 703, is perhaps more to the point, it bearing a closer resemblance to our case in its facts and the precise question presented. See, also, Buckle v. Knoop, L. R. 2 Exch. 125, Wigglesworth v. Dallison, 2 Smith's L. Cases (Ed. 1888) 842, and especially the notes at page 853; and, as bearing somewhat on the question, Vaughan v. Railroad, 63 N. C. 11, Norris v. Fowler, 87 N. C. 9, and 9 Cyc. 582.

Wharfage is a mere charge made by the owner of the soil or shore for the use of a portion of it, which charge he has a right to make. The price, perhaps, may be subject to municipal regulation, but the right to charge is undoubted. O'Conley v. Natchez, 9 Miss. (1 Sm. & M.) 81, 40 Am. Dec. 87; Cannon v. New Orleans, 20 Wall. (U. S.) 577, 22 L. Ed. 417. Right to compensation for the use of a wharf may be claimed upon an express or implied contract according to the circumstances. If the price has not been agreed upon, the proprietor recovers what is just and reasonable for the use of his property and the benefit conferred as in other like cases. 1 Farnham on Waters, 570. A riparian owner had, at common law, a qualified interest in the water frontage belonging by nature to his land, and, consequently, the right to construct thereon wharves, piers, or landings as far as deep water, subject however to certain restrictions in their construction and use imposed by statute (Revisal 1905, § 1696), one of which is that navigation must not be obstructed. Bond v. Wool, 107 N. C. 139, 12 S. E. 281. This originated the right to compensation for wharfage or for the use of the wharf, pier, or landing. Lord Mansfield said: "Every body that pays has a benefit, for if they go to the wharf they have the benefit of it, and if they land their goods elsewhere within the manor they land upon the plaintiff's property." Colton v. Smith, 1 Cowper, 47. In the case of Fitzsimmons v. Milner, 32 S. C. (2 Rich. Law) 370, it was held that, though it was shown to be customary for the factor to pay the wharfage charges for goods shipped to his consignee, yet the latter is also liable as owner, if the former failed to pay them, because of his right of property and the benefit received from the care of the goods and the use of the wharf. It is also said in that case: "That it is the rule of law, as well as the custom, for the consignee to pay the wharfinger, may, we think, be gathered from the cases." Whether that be so or not, we conclude that, upon the facts agreed, the plaintiff has derived a benefit, as far as appears, from the use of the wharf, and upon a well-settled principle should pay its reasonable value, which is admitted in the case to be the amount claimed, though the precise nature of the use is not disclosed. This court has recognized the right of a wharfinger to charge the owner of goods for the use of his wharf. Wooster v. Blossom, 50 N. C. 244, 72 Am. Dec. 549. It does not appear distinctly whether the charge against the defendant was for dockage or berthage, strictly speaking, or for wharfage, using the former terms in the sense of a charge against a vessel for the privilege of mooring to a wharf or pier, which is one of the usual and customary port charges against the vessel, and the latter as denoting a charge against merchandise for the use of a wharf which is said to be one of its meanings. 30 Am. & Eng. Enc.

(2d Ed.) 497; People v. Roberts, 92 Cal. 659, 28 Pac. 689; Wharf Case, 3 Bland (Md.) 373; Rodgers v. Stophel, 82 Pa. 111, 72 Am. Dec. 775. We infer from all the facts and circumstances that the charge in this case was of the latter kind.

We have not discussed the question as to the liability of the carrier, upon general principles, for wharfage charges, because we think the parties must be considered as having dealt with each other upon the basis of the established custom, and the freight rates may have been, and no doubt were, calculated and fixed with reference thereto. The defendant may not be paying more than he would be required to pay, if the company had agreed to pay, or should be held liable for, all terminal charges, as it would, in all probability, increase its rates by the amount so expended for that purpose, and this, as we have said, it would have a right to do, if the rates for the whole service are reasonable, under all the circumstances, for they cannot exceed what is a fair return for the capital invested.

We have not overlooked the fact that the defendant never informed the Navigation Company of his intention not to be bound by the established custom at the port of Gatesville. The contract was between him and that company, as the carrier, and the latter had every reason to suppose that the defendant was willing to abide by the custom in the carriage of the particular goods for the care of which the charge was made by the plaintiff. This gave the carrier the right to unload the goods on the wharf, which was the usual place of deposit, instead of delivering them out of the ship or at its side.

The ruling of the court upon the facts was correct.

Judgment affirmed.

ALSTON et al. v. CONNELL.

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—RELIEF—ACCOUNTING—RATE OF INTEREST.

A purchaser of land on foreclosure executed to plaintiff an option to purchase the land at any time prior to a date named. Within an extension of time agreed on by the parties plaintiff tendered the amount required to complete the purchase, which was refused. Plaintiff sued to enforce the option, and on appeal it was held that he was entitled to a conveyance of the land, subject to an accounting for use and occupation, etc. Held, that the option and not the deed of trust constituted the correct basis for the accounting, and hence 6 per cent. interest being the legal rate, on the balance due from complainant, was properly allowed, and not 8 per cent. stipulated for in the deed of trust.

2. SAME—IMPROVEMENTS TO LAND—BASIS OF ALLOWANCE.

On an accounting between one entitled to a conveyance of land under an option and the owner for use and occupation, etc., the basis of an allowance for improvements to the land is not the cost thereof, but the amount by which the value of the land has been enhanced.

3. SAME.

A purchaser of land on foreclosure executed to plaintiff an option under which plaintiff was entitled to purchase the land at any time prior to a date named. Within an extension of time agreed on by the parties plaintiff tendered the price, which was refused. The option provided that the purchaser on foreclosure was to remain in possession and to expend a sum fixed for improvements, such sum being included in the contract price. Held, on an accounting between plaintiff and the purchaser, that any expenditure for improvements beyond the amount named in the contract and any made after the time when the purchaser wrongfully withheld possession and after notice that plaintiff intended to assert his right could not be compensated for.

Appeal from Superior Court, Warren County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by P. G. Alston and others against Thomas Connell. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. Polk, B. G. Green, W. A. Montgomery, and I. I. Hicks, for appellant. F. S. Spruill and O. W. Bickett, for appellees.

HOKE, J. On a former appeal in this cause it was held that the plaintiff P. G. Alston had a valid and binding option on the land, the subject-matter of litigation, and known as "Tusculum," at the contract price of $3,502, subject to an accounting between the parties, for use and occupation, etc., as indicated in the decree, affirmed on the said appeal. See 140 N. C. 485, 53 S. E. 292. This decision having been certified down in obedience thereto, the referee, A. C. Zollicoffer, Esq., proceeded to take and state the account, and upon the evidence and findings of fact declared the true account and the rights of the parties to be as follows:

"Upon the foregoing facts, and feeling himself bound by the contract between the parties as to the option, and the opinion of the Supreme Court rendered in this action since his appointment, as he understands and construes the said opinion, the referee doth hold and conclude that the account between the plaintiff and defendant should be stated as follows:

To amount option price for "Tusculum," due January 1, 1901.....	$3,502.00
To interest on same, 6 per cent., from January 1, 1901, to 11th February, 1907 .....	1,284.05
By rent since January 1, 1901 .....	$1,500.00
By interest on same, 6 per cent., to February 11, 1907 .....	235.00
By hickory timber cut and sold from land.....	69.00
By interest on same to February 11, 1907.....	24.95
By balance due February 11, 1907.....	2,957.10
	<hr/>
To balance due Feb. 11, 1907, brought down....	$4,786.05    $4,786.05

"That the defendant is entitled to recover of the plaintiffs the sum of $2,957.10, with interest on the same from the 11th day of February, 1907, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid, and upon the payment thereof the plaintiffs are entitled to specific performance of the contract to convey the "Tusculum" farm as prayed for in the complaint herein."

Defendant excepted and assigns for error (1) that the referee should have allowed interest at the rate of 8 per cent. on $2,441.62, the amount of the original indebtedness, this being the rate stipulated for in the original note and the deed of trust on the property, given to secure it. A reference to the former opinion is made for a more extended statement of the facts. The exception cannot be sustained for the reason that the original contract of indebtedness and the deed of trust given to secure it are not the correct basis for the present accounting between the parties. The evidence and findings of fact established that, under and by virtue of the power given in the deed of trust, a sale of the farm was held at which defendant, Thomas Connell, became the purchaser and received the title. Monroe v. Fuchtlar, 121 N. C. 104, 28 S. E. 63. And holding this title he executed to P. G. Alston the option declared on in this present action, and this option, and the material and relevant facts attending it, furnish the data, and the only data, for a correct and true accounting. The pleadings, testimony, issue, and verdict set out in the former appeal all show that both plaintiff and defendant desired and intended that this should be so, and the opinion states this position as follows: "This position, however—that of the right to redeem—is not open to the plaintiff in the present condition of the record, for the reason that the suit was originally instituted by P. G. Alston, and complaint filed seeking to enforce his rights under his written agreement of date December 5, 1898, and under which Thomas Connell obligates himself to convey the property. The heirs at law of B. C. Alston make themselves parties plaintiff and seek the same relief, and, while the pleadings set forth the entire fact and some evidence is offered tending to sustain a claim in behalf of these heirs, the issues framed and passed upon are not decisive of those rights, but are addressed to the question of this written agreement and the facts especially bearing thereon, and are only determinative of the interest arising thereunder. The rights of the parties therefore are considered as they may arise upon this written paper, and the issues determined in reference to the same." This being true, and the option at $3,502 making no express stipulation for a lower rate, the referee properly allowed the lawful rate, 6 per cent., from the time the obligation matured.

Defendant makes further assignment of error that the referee failed to allow the defendants the sum of $1,500 for permanent and valuable improvements put upon the land by Thomas Connell, while he was in possession of same, and after he had given P. G. Alston the option declared on and established by the verdict and judgment in the cause. Even if this claim for improvements was valid, the proper allowance would not be for the amount of their cost, but the amount by which the value of the land was enhanced. But the claim is not valid. It is set up as a claim for betterments, an equitable defense now generally provided for by statute, and arising when one in the actual occupation of real estate under color of title, believed by him to be good, and without notice of a superior title, makes permanent improvements on the land, by reason of which the value of same is enhanced. The doctrine is usually applicable in the case of claimants under adversary titles, and only in the rarest instances can it exist where the occupant is in possession under a contract which defines the rights of the parties and limits the length of the tenure. This doctrine of betterments, and the principle upon which it was originally made to rest, is very well stated by Ashe, J., in the case of Wharton v. Moore, 84 N. C. 482, 37 Am. Rep. 627, as follows: "This right to betterments is a doctrine that has gradually grown up in the practice of the courts of equity; and, while it has been adopted in many of the states, it is not recognized in others. But it may now be considered as an established principle of equity that, whenever a plaintiff seeks the aid of a court of equity to enforce his title against an innocent person, who has made improvements on land without notice of a superior title, believing himself to be the absolute owner, aid will be given him, only upon the terms that he shall make due compensation to such innocent person to the extent of the enhanced value of the premises by reason of the meliorations or improvements upon the principle that he who seeks equity must do equity." Here it will be noted that the claimant must be an innocent person; and in any correct statement of the principle will be found this or some equivalent requirement indicating that the occupant made the expenditures in good faith; that is, that he believed, and had reasonable ground to believe, at the time they were made, that he was the true owner. It would be difficult to suggest a case when an occupant could establish such a claim after he had received notice that the real owner intended to assert his rights, but certainly this should never be allowed, when such occupant, having entered under a contract which expressly defined his rights, wrongfully remained in possession in violation of his contract, and made the improvements after notice that the true owner intended to insist upon and assert his claim, and so it is here. By the contract between the parties, as extended, the defendant was to remain in possession till January 1, 1901. He was to expend for improvements during this time, by express stipulation, the sum of $250 and no more, and this was included in the contract price, which has been charged against the plaintiff, the holder of the option. Any expenditures for improvements beyond this amount were not authorized by the contract, and any made after that time were made when defendant wrongfully withheld the possession, and after notice that plaintiff intended to assert his rights, and the same cannot therefore be allowed as a credit against plaintiff's demand.

We were referred by counsel to the case of Gillis v. Martin, 17 N. C. 470, 25 Am. Dec. 729, as authority to sustain their position, but we do not so understand this decision. There the defendant on the evidence was declared a mortgagee by the decree of the court, and in taking the account was allowed for improvements put on the property while he was in possession. The court stated the general rule to be that a mortgagee in possession is not allowed for improvements over and above necessary repairs, and made the case then before it an exception on testimony which showed that the improvements were required for the enjoyment of the property; that they were made when the defendant believed and had good reason to believe he was the true owner, and at a time when the defendant had no notice or reason to believe that the claimant intended to assert any right or interest in the property. The decision, therefore, is not favorable to defendant. On the contrary this and other authorities fully support the ruling of the referee in disallowing the claim, and there is no error in the judgment confirming the report. Hallyburton v. Slagle, 132 N. C. 957, 44 S. E. 659; Southerland v. Merritt, 120 N. C. 318, 26 S. E. 814; Dunn v. Bagby, 88 N. C. 91; Cleland v. Clark, 123 Mich. 179, 81 N. W. 1086, reported also in 81 Am. St. Rep. 161, with a full and learned note by the editor.

There is no error, and the judgment below is affirmed.

BRISCOE v. PARKER.

1. WATERS—DIVERSION OF SURFACE WATERS.

It is a diversion of waters onto plaintiff's land, to its detriment, which is not permissible, where water is collected by defendant's ditches, and carried by them through his land and that of the next lower proprietor, and there ceases to be carried further to a natural water way, but is allowed to ooze through and water-sob plaintiff's land.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, §§ 131-134.]

2. SAME—REMEDY.

Plaintiff for the diversion onto his land of water by defendant's ditches may sue for damages; not being restricted to the remedy by proceedings under Revisal 1905, § 3983, for the cutting of a ditch to drain their lands.

3. APPEAL — PRESUMPTIONS — INSTRUCTIONS — OBEDIENCE BY JURY.

Where, after the court had excluded a paper offered by plaintiff, his counsel on permission of the court reopened the argument, and in the course of it stated the contents of the paper, and the court adhered to its ruling and told the jury not to consider the contents of the paper or the statements of counsel in regard thereto, the jury will be considered to have understood and obeyed the instruction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Gates County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Action by J. R. Briscoe against Hardy W. Parker. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This was an action by a lower proprietor against an upper for increasing the flow of water in such way as to obstruct and throw it on plaintiff's land and water-sob it.

There was evidence offered by plaintiff tending to show that defendant had collected water that fell on his own land and by means of ditches had conveyed the water into a ditch called "Haw Tree Branch" on his own land, which ditch ran across the land of one Mullen and which ditch was for the purpose of draining the land of the defendant and which he was under obligation to keep in good order; that the lower end of said ditch ran up to the land of the plaintiff, and if kept open and clear would have caused the water, which the defendant, by his ditches, cut to drain his own land, had emptied into said Haw Tree branch ditch, to flow through the land of the plaintiff and into a certain canal; that defendant had failed and refused to keep open said Haw Tree branch ditch at its end close to the land of this plaintiff and had allowed same to become clogged and dammed up, thereby causing the waters which his ditches had emptied into Haw Tree branch ditch to overflow the banks of said ditch and spread upon and submerge and drown the land of the plaintiff, thereby causing him injury and damage. There was evidence introduced by the defendant to the contrary. There was also evidence tending to show that Haw Tree branch was a natural water course, and that defendant's ditches emptied into it at a place not on his own land.

The court, among other things, charged the jury if defendant, the upper tenant, collects the surface water falling on his land in ditches and discharges the ditches on the land of the lower tenant, the plaintiff, otherwise than by natural water courses on his own land, and thereby increases the flow of water on the land of the lower tenant, he is liable therefor, and, if you so find by a greater weight of the evidence, answer the first issue, "Yes," although the surface water of defendant's land would flow to land of the lower tenant. The defendant assigns that part of the charge as error.

There was evidence on both sides tending to show that there were several other landowners besides the defendant, whose lands drained into Haw Tree branch, or Haw Tree branch ditch, as the plaintiff called it; and there was also evidence tending to show that the plaintiff had not attempted to cultivate or clear up the land which he claimed to be damaged nor to drain the same since he went into the possession thereof about 18 years ago, and that those under whom he claimed had not attempted to cultivate it, or to drain it since the latter part of the Civil War, and that the plaintiff had sold and allowed timber trees on the land along the course of Haw Tree branch, and that the tops of the trees had fallen across the branch and had not been removed, and evidence to the contrary. There was also evidence tending to show that Haw Tree branch was a natural water course; and there was evidence on the part of the plaintiff tending to show that there had been many years ago a ditch along Haw Tree branch and that it was a ditch, and evidence on the part of defendant tending to show that there had never been a ditch along its course, but that it had always been a natural water course.

Plaintiff introduced evidence to show the injury to the land caused by the flooding of the land. The defendant moved to set aside the verdict and dismiss the action, on the ground that the plaintiff had sought the wrong remedy, and that he ought to have applied the statutory remedy, and because of the manifest injustice done the defendant by reason of the fact (1) that the damages attempted to be proved were hypothetical and not actual, and (2) that, according to all the evidence, if any damage was incurred by plaintiff as alleged, several other parties besides the defendant contributed thereto, and therefore defendant ought not to bear all the burden, and for that reason the verdict should be set aside; and this contention was presented to the court as a matter of right, and not as a matter of discretion. The court overruled the motion, and the defendant excepted. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Appeal by defendant.

L. L. Smith, for appellant. H. S. Ward and W. M. Bond, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The principle settled by our decisions is that in the interest of health and good husbandry better drainage is to be encouraged. Hence, an upper proprietor can accelerate and even increase the flow of water from his land, but due regard for the rights of the lower proprietor forbids that the flow of water should be diverted to his detriment. Hocutt v. Railroad, 124 N. C. 214, 32 S. E. 681; Mizell v. McGowan, 125 N. C. 439, 34 S. E. 538; Id., 129 N. C. 93, 39 S. E. 729, 85 Am. St. Rep. 705; Lassiter v. Railroad, 126 N. C. 509, 36 S. E. 48; Rice v. Railroad, 130 N. C. 376, 41 S. E. 1031; Mullen v. Canal Co., 130 N. C. 502, 41 S. E. 1027, 61 L. R. A. 833. There was here evidence tending to show that the water collected by defendant's ditches and carried by them through his own land and that of the next lower proprietor there ceased to be carried farther to a natural water way, but were allowed to ooze through and water-sob the plaintiff's land to his detriment. There was conflicting evidence, but the jury so found the fact. If so, the water put upon the plaintiff's land was not in the due and orderly course of nature from the increase and acceleration of the flow from the better drainage of his farm by the upper proprietor, but was in fact a diversion of the water upon the plaintiff's land to its detriment. "The defendant had no right to collect surface water * * * into a ditch not adequate to receive it, and thus flood and injure the land of another." Staton v. Railroad, 109 N. C. 341, 13 S. E. 933; Porter v. Durham, 74 N. C. 767; Jenkins v. Railroad, 110 N. C. 444, 447, 15 S. E. 193. This is not the case of draining into a natural water way, increasing its flow, which the defendant had a right to do. Mizell v. McGowan, 120 N. C. 134, 26 S. E. 783.

For such injury the plaintiff could bring this action at his election. Mizell v. McGowan, 120 N. C. 137, 26 S. E. 783. He is not restricted to the remedy prescribed by Revisal 1905, § 3983 et seq. Indeed that proceeding is one which the defendant, the upper tenant, might well have resorted to.

The court excluded a paper, offered in evidence by the plaintiff. The plaintiff's counsel, notwithstanding, upon permission of the court, reopened the argument, and in the course of it stated the contents of the paper. The court adhered to its ruling, and told the jury not to consider the contents of the paper nor the statement of counsel in regard thereto. The jury must have understood so plain an instruction; and, furthermore, that the paper, having been excluded as evidence, and not testified to by any one, they could not consider it. If a jury is not possessed of this much intelligence, it is not a proper part of a trial court.

No error.

NICHOLSON v. DOVER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 11, 1907.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—MEMORANDUM—SUFFICIENCY.

Letters addressed to a third person stating and affirming a contract may be used against the writer as a memorandum of the contract, and are sufficient evidence of the contract to warrant the court in giving effect to it.

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—RIGHTS OF UNDISCLOSED PRINCIPAL.

Where an owner of land authorized another to sell the same to a third person named, and the agent contracted to sell the same to such third person, but such third person was merely acting as agent for another, his principal was entitled to enforce the contract to the same extent that he could enforce it, notwithstanding the owner of the land was without knowledge of the principal's interest.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Action by P. A. Nicholson against Joseph Dover. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Nicholson & Daniel, for appellant. Bragaw & Harding, for defendant.

BROWN, J. The defendant owned  $\frac{29}{30}$  of the land described in the complaint, and B. B. Nicholson owned  $\frac{1}{30}$ . Each owner seemed desirous of owning the entire tract or of selling his interest therein. Negotiations were conducted with Dover, who was a resident of Pennsylvania, by B. B. Nicholson, through W. B. Rodman, who was Dover's agent and attorney. The negotiations are embodied in 22 letters passing between Dover and Rodman and B. B. Nicholson, all of which are set out in the record, and which it is unnecessary to do more than refer to. These letters comprise the basis of the plaintiff's action. The defendant contends that there is no sufficient contract in writing or memorandum or note thereof within the requirements of the statute of frauds. Besides other letters which it is unnecessary to refer to, we think there are two which plainly authorized Rodman to enter into a contract to sell the defendant's interest in the land. On May 24, 1905, defendant wrote Rodman: "Now I want to sell, if possible, and I want you and Mrs. Nicholson to give me the very highest cent that he will pay me for the land in Chocowinity. Then I will give you and him a definite answer, and we can settle all right." In the letter of June 21, 1905, the authority to sell is confirmed. After further correspondence Dover gives Rodman in his letter of July 1, 1905, express authority to sell the land to B. B. Nicholson upon a basis of \$1,800 for the whole tract; that is to say, Dover was to have  $\frac{29}{30}$  of the \$1,800 for his interest. This proposition was accepted by B. B. Nicholson in his letter of July 30, 1905, to Rodman in behalf of his principal P. A. Nicholson, the plaintiff. We think the letters set out in the record are a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the statute. It has always been held that letters addressed to a third party, stating and affirming a contract, may be used against the writer as a memorandum of it. Brown on Statute of Frauds, § 354A, and cases cited. Such writings are sufficient evidence of the contract to warrant the court in giving effect to it. Mizell v. Burnett, 49 N. C. 254, 69 Am. Dec. 744. The principal contention of the learned counsel for defendant is that, although Rodman might have been vested with ample power to sell, the authority was to sell to B. B. Nicholson and not to this plaintiff.

The correspondence, as well as the testimony of B. B. Nicholson and P. A. Nicholson, proves that the negotiations for the purchase of Dover's interest in the lands was conducted by B. B. Nicholson for the plaintiff, and that the offer of Dover made through Rodman was accepted by B. B. Nicholson for plaintiff. This was well known to Rodman, and the fact that he failed to disclose it to Dover will not avoid the contract of sale, or relieve Dover from its performance. Assuming that, so far as Dover is concerned, the plaintiff is an undisclosed principal as to him, yet the plaintiff may enforce the contract made on his behalf by B. B. Nicholson, his agent. The right of a principal to maintain an action on a written contract made by his agent in his own name without disclosing the name of the principal is well settled. Oelrichs v. Ford, 21 Md. 489; Tow Boat Co. v. Tel. Co., 52 S. E. 766, 124 Ga. 478; Cowan v. Fairbrother, 118 N. C. 406, 24 S. E. 212, 32 L. R. A. 829, 54 Am. St. Rep. 733. If Dover had personally conducted this correspondence directly with B. B. Nicholson, who was acting for the plaintiff, an undisclosed principal, the latter could enforce the contract as against Dover. The fact that he conducted it through his agent will not alter the case. "It is a well-established rule of law that, when a contract, not under seal, is made with an agent in his own name for an undisclosed principal, either the agent or the principal may sue upon it, the defendant in the latter case being entitled to be placed in the same position at the time of the disclosure of the real principal as if the agent had been the real contracting party." Barham v. Bell, by Shepherd, C. J., 112 N. C. 133, 16 S. E. 903; Ewell's Evans on Agency, 379; Story on Agency, 420; Wharton on Agency & Agents, 403. The defendant authorized Rodman to sell to B. B. Nicholson upon certain terms. The agent, not exceeding the authority conferred upon him, contracted to sell to B. B. Nicholson according to the instructions given him. B. B. Nicholson was acting, so it turns out, as the agent of the plaintiff, whose interest was not disclosed to defendant. Under these conditions the acts of the agent, Rodman, are equally binding upon the principal, Dover, as if the principal had done the act himself. In other words, so long as Rodman was obeying his instructions in selling to B. B. Nicholson, it made no difference whether the contract was made directly by Dover, the principal, or through Rodman, the agent, the effect would be the same. The principal is liable where the agent acts within the scope of his apparent authority, provided a liability would attach to the principal if he was in the place of the agent. Navigation Co. v. Bank, 47 U. S. 344, 12 L. Ed. 465; Ford v. Williams, 62 U. S. 287, 16 L. Ed. 36. The law is stated very clearly by the Supreme Court of Georgia as follows: "When an agent makes a contract without disclosing the name of his principal, the principal may claim all his rights, with the single limitation that the other party shall not be injured thereby." Woodruff v. McGehee, 30 Ga. 158.

It follows that if Rodman, acting for the defendant, and within the scope of his powers, made a valid contract with B. B. Nicholson, and that the latter at the time was acting for the plaintiff, the latter may enforce the contract against the defendant to the same extent that B. B. Nicholson could enforce it, although the defendant had no knowledge at the time of plaintiff's interest. The defendant has in no way been injured. Whatever equity or claim the defendant could set up against the agent he could set up against the principal when he was disclosed. In this case the defendant has no grievance against either. He simply declines to carry out his valid contract made by an authorized agent because, as he writes Rodman on September 11, 1905, he had just received an offer of $2,000 cash for the land. The personality of the purchaser was not the ground of plaintiff's refusal, but the fact that he could get a higher price. Taking the evidence to be true, the plaintiff is entitled in the superior court to a decree for specific performance. It is so ordered.

COLLINS v. TAYLOR.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1907.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—DISTRESS—PROCEEDINGS TO DISTRAIN.

An affidavit to obtain a distress warrant on the ground that the rent is due is amendable by alleging that the rent was not due at the time the affidavit was made, but at that time the tenant was seeking to remove his goods from the premises, where the distress warrant has been converted into mesne process by the tenants filing the statutory counter affidavit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Macon County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Distress warrant by R. O. Collins, as agent of one Ellington, against Cook Taylor. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Haygood & Cutts, for plaintiff in error. Greer & Felton, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. Collins, as agent for Mrs. Ellington, sued out a distress warrant against Taylor, alleging in his affidavit that the amount claimed was due and unpaid. The defendant filed his statutory counter affidavit, denying that the sum distrained for or any part thereof was due; and the distress warrant and affidavit were returned to the superior court. When the case was called for trial, the plaintiff offered to amend by striking from the original affidavit the allegation that the rent was due and unpaid, and inserted in lieu thereof the following: "That said Cook Taylor has rented the premises described in the original affidavit for a period of twelve months beginning September 1st, 1904, at twenty-five ($25.00) per month, and at the time of suing out said distress warrant said Cook Taylor was seeking to remove his goods from the rented premises without paying or offering to pay the rent for the unexpired portion of said term." The court refused to allow the amendment, and the plaintiff excepted to this ruling. The plaintiff then offered evidence to the effect that the defendant had rented the premises from September 1, 1904, for the period of one year, at the monthly rental of $25, that the rent prior to January 1, 1905, had been paid, and that the rent for January was not due until the end of the month by the terms of the contract. The distress warrant was sued out on January 25, 1905. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony, the court, on motion of defendant, granted a nonsuit, and exception was taken to this judgment.

1. A landlord may distrain for rent as soon as the same is due, or before due, if the tenant is seeking to remove his goods from the premises. Civ. Code 1895, § 3124. The party distrained may in all cases file a counter affidavit, denying that the sum or some part thereof distrained for is not due, and have the issue made by his counter affidavit tried in the proper court. Civ. Code 1895, § 4819. No other pleading by the defendant is necessary to let in evidence to sustain any legitimate defense he may have to the landlord's demand. Smith v. Green, 128 Ga. 90, 57 S. E. 98; Johnson v. Patterson, 86 Ga. 725, 13 S. E. 17. The filing of the counter affidavit converts the distress warrant into mesne process, and thereafter the proceeding amounts to a suit for rent. Hardy v. Posa, 120 Ga. 385, 47 S. E. 947. The affidavit for a distress warrant serves the purpose of stating the plaintiff's cause of action. If it is therein alleged that the rent is due, the probata must sustain this allegation, to entitle the plaintiff to recover. Evidence that the tenant is seeking to remove his goods from the premises is not competent in such a case. Anders v. Blount, 67 Ga. 41; Holt v. Licette, 111 Ga. 810, 35 S. E. 708. In neither of these cases was the question made that the affidavit was amendable so as to make it conform to the evidence. Of course, if the affidavit was amendable so as to allege that the tenant was seeking to remove his goods from the premises, testimony supporting such allegation would be competent. The law of amendment in this respect is very liberal. All affidavits for the foreclosure of liens, or which are the foundation of legal proceedings, are amendable to the same extent as ordinary declarations. Civ. Code 1895, § 5122. This statute is remedial in its nature, and is therefore to be liberally construed and applied. Before its enactment, affidavits which were the foundation of summary process were not amendable. Brown v. McCluskey, 28 Ga. 577. The manifest purpose of the Code (section 5122) was to change this rule, so as to permit amendments to affidavits upon which summary process was issued. It has been held to authorize an amendment to an attachment affidavit which alleged the ground of attachment to be that the debtor is "about to remove without the limits of the state" by adding thereto the words "and county," so as to make it read, "without the limits of the state and county." Brumby v. Rickoff, 94 Ga. 429, 21 S. E. 232. The Mississippi Code of 1871, § 1483, authorized amendment of defective affidavits in attachment, and the Supreme Court of the United States was of the opinion that under such a provision there could be no objection, on principle, to an amendment adding a new ground of attachment. Fitzpatrick v. Flannagan, 106 U. S. 648, 1 Sup. Ct. 369, 27 L. Ed. 211. We cannot perceive any obstacle in the way of amending the affidavit to conform to the actual conditions existing at the time of suing out the distress warrant. Such an amendment, from the nature of things, cannot be prejudicial to the tenant. His objection to such an amendment is purely technical. It is an objection which does not raise the issue that the tenant is not liable, or that the suing out of the warrant was premature, but that the landlord is put to his election in the first instance to state on what ground he is entitled to distrain. Section 3124 affords the landlord a remedy by distress warrant, both when the rent is due and when it is not due under certain circumstances. It does not relate or refer to the rent contract which is the cause of action. An amendment of the character refused by the court states no new cause of action. The landlord is still pursuing his remedy by distress warrant, notwithstanding the proceeding has been converted into an action for rent by the tenant's counter affidavit. And he may amend by alleging facts which show that he may lawfully proceed against his tenant by distress warrant.

The plaintiff's case depended upon the allowance of the proffered amendment; and, when this was disallowed, he was unable to prove his case, and the nonsuit was inevitable. The judgment of nonsuit was the consequence of an erroneous ruling, and must be reversed on that account.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

SAPP et al. v. WILLIAMSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1907.)

1. JUDGMENT—CONSENT DECREE—ENTRY IN VACATION.

What purports to be a consent decree having been entered in vacation, and there being no order in term authorizing the decree to be so entered, and the same not having been entered at a time and place fixed under the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 4323 et seq., it is inoperative as a judgment of the court, for the reason that the judge was without authority to enter the same.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—IMPROPER PAYMENT OF CLAIMS.

If a paper purporting to be a consent decree, in a case in which the administrator of a deceased person is a party, is inoperative as a judgment, for the reason that the court was without jurisdiction to render the decree, but operative as an agreement to which the administrator has assented, the heirs of the estate will not be concluded by the paper, as an agreement, from calling the administrator to an accounting for any matter therein which charged the estate with claims with which it was not chargeable, or which provided for a distribution of the assets of the estate in any other manner than that authorized by law.

3. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS—ADEQUATE REMEDY AT LAW.

Whatever may be the rights of the plaintiffs in another proceeding, with proper allegations and proper parties, there was no equity in the present petition, and the court did not err in dismissing the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 8, Cancellation of Instruments, § 7.]

4. PLEADING—HEARING ON DEMURRER.

When there are several defendants to an equitable petition, and some of them file demurrers and others do not, the petition should not be dismissed as to the defendants who did not demur, even though there is no equity in the petition as to any of the defendants.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, § 557.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Dodge County; Jno. P. Ross, Judge pro hac.

Action by C. W. Sapp and others against A. G. Williamson and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Charles W. Sapp, George W. Sapp, Jeff D. Sapp, Wm. S. Sapp, Katie Ward, Lou Powell, and Annie Cobb brought their petition against the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank, J. C. Rawlins, administrator of Susan A. Sapp, W. B. Sapp, A. G. Williamson, J. C. Rogers, sheriff, T. B. Ragan, and Mollie H. Grace, alleging that the plaintiffs were the children of W. B. Sapp and his wife, Susan A. Sapp, and are the heirs at law of the latter, who died intestate in 1902; that at the September term, 1895, of the superior court of Dodge county, Ragan, as surviving partner of the firm of Ragan & Co., began proceedings to foreclose a mortgage on a described lot of land against W. B. Sapp, and obtained a judgment of foreclosure in 1898. The plaintiff was represented by J. H. Martin, Esq., and the defendant by Smith & Clements, as attorneys. On May 28, 1898, an execution issued on the foreclosure judgment was levied, and a claim was interposed by Susan A. Sapp, which seems never to have been disposed of. In this case the plaintiff was represented by J. H. Martin, Esq., and the claimant by E. Herman, Esq. In 1899 Ragan, as surviving partner, filed suit in the county court against W. B. Sapp as principal and D. W. Sapp as security. This case was appealed by consent to the superior court, dismissed for the want of prosecution, reinstated on the same day, and seems to have been never thereafter disposed of. J. H. Martin, Esq., represented the plaintiff, and E. B. Milner, Esq., the defendant. In 1904 Mollie H. Grace brought a petition in equity against W. B. Sapp and J. C. Rawlins, administrator, to cancel a deed from W. B. Sapp to Susan A. Sapp, bearing date September 30, 1889, to certain described lots of land; among them being the lot embraced in the mortgage above referred to, all of such lots adjoining each other, and being embraced in one tract. The deed purported to be upon a consideration of $1,000. The petition also sought to enjoin Rawlins, the administrator, from selling the land described in the deed under an order granted by the court of ordinary, and also sought to foreclose a mortgage on one of the lots given by W. B. Sapp to Mollie H. Grace. Certain of the heirs at law of Susan A. Sapp were made parties defendant to this proceeding. J. H. Martin, Esq., represented the plaintiff, and W. M. Morrison, Esq., and Messrs. Hall & Wimberly, represented the defendant. At the same time, and in the same court, Ragan, surviving partner, brought a petition in equity against the same parties for the same purposes as indicated in the petition of Mollie H. Grace; Ragan setting up the same mortgage which he had previously foreclosed. In this case the attorneys were the same as in the case of Mollie H. Grace. In 1904 the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank obtained a judgment of foreclosure on one of the lots described in the deed above referred to against Susan A. Sapp, and the mortgage execution was levied. In this case the plaintiffs were represented by J. P. Highsmith, Esq., and the defendant was in default. In 1905 Ragan, as surviving partner, brought a petition in equity against the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank, Rogers, sheriff, and Rawlins, administrator, for the purpose of enjoining the sale under the mortgage execution of the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank, so far as it related to one of the lots therein. In this case the plaintiff was represented by Messrs. W. L. & Warren Grice, the bank by Messrs. D. M. Roberts & Son and J. P. Highsmith, Esq. The sheriff and administrator do not seem to have been represented by counsel, or to have made any defense. There was no process annexed to the petition, nor does it appear to have been filed, but the same was answered by the bank. In 1905 Mollie H. Grace brought a petition in equity against the bank, Rogers, sheriff, and Rawlins, administrator, for the purpose of enjoining the sale of another lot embraced in the mortgage of the bank. In this case no process was annexed to the petition, nor does the same appear to have been filed; but an answer was filed by the bank. The plaintiff was represented by Messrs. W. L. & Warren Grice, the bank by Messrs. D. M. Roberts &

Son and J. P. Highsmith, Esq., and the sheriff and administrator by J. E. Wooten and W. M. Morrison, Esq. Geo. W. Sapp interposed a claim to a part of the land embraced in the mortgage execution of the bank, and Charles W. Sapp also interposed a claim to a portion of the land embraced in the mortgage. While the litigation was in the stage above referred to, what purports to be a consent decree was entered. This decree bears no date, but purports to be signed nunc pro tunc as of May 16, 1905, though, as a matter of fact, it was not signed at that time, nor at the May term, 1905, nor at any term, nor in open court at a place where the court was held, but was actually signed in another county after the adjournment of court, in vacation, at chambers. The decree, after stating some, if not all, of the cases above referred to, recites that the disqualification of the presiding judge, Hon. J. H. Martin, is waived by all parties, and by consent the cases are heard and determined at the May term, 1905, by the presiding judge, without the intervention of a jury. It is then decreed that the cases be consolidated; that the claims filed by Susan A. Sapp, Chas. W. Sapp, and Geo. W. Sapp be withdrawn; that certain described lands be sold under the foreclosure judgment of the bank and Ragan and "under the Grace paper" after due advertisement. It provides the manner in which the sale shall be conducted by lots and the disposition to be made of the proceeds, the Ragan mortgage to be first paid in full, and Ragan be paid $36.75 actual expenses incurred in the injunction matter and other matters relating thereto; that the mortgage of Mollie H. Grace be next paid in full, then the mortgage of the bank be next paid, then another debt to Ragan; and that Judge Roberts, attorney for the bank, be reimbursed for certain actual expenses in defending the injunction proceeding, and that the costs of court be next paid. After the payment of the sums above referred to, any balance remaining is to be turned over to the administrator of Susan A. Sapp for the purposes of administration. The decree then recites: "It is further understood by all the parties hereto that as this consent decree was agreed to on May 16, 1905, the same being a day during the regular May term, but for providential cause was not presented to the judge for his signature at the time contemplated, that this decree be now signed nunc pro tunc as of May 16, 1905, all parties consenting hereto." It then provided that the mortgage lien of Mollie H. Grace be displaced, and its lien attach to the proceeds in the same manner as if the mortgage had been duly foreclosed, and that the several petitions above referred to be dismissed, and that the decree supersedes all former orders in the different cases. The decree was signed by Messrs. W. L. & Warren Grice as attorneys for Ragan, G. W. Sapp, Chas. W. Sapp, and Mollie H. Grace, and by W. M. Morrison, Esq., as attorney for Rawlins, administrator, and by Messrs. D. M. Roberts & Son and J. P. Highsmith as attorneys for the bank, and by W. B. Sapp. Upon this decree Judge Martin entered the following: "So ordered and decreed. Let this be entered on the minutes of Dodge superior court." There appears on the decree an entry by the clerk that the same was entered on the minutes of the court, on specified pages, May term, 1905.

It is alleged, in the petition, that G. W. Sapp and C. W. Sapp never consented to the terms of the decree, and never authorized the attorneys purporting to sign the decree in their behalf either to sign the same or to withdraw their claims, and that they are in actual possession of the land claimed, and have been in possession more than seven years under a parol gift of their father and mother, and by reason of the gift have made valuable improvements, and therefore claim the ownership of the land. Having learned that their claims had been withdrawn, they prepared a second claim to the property and tendered it to the sheriff, when he proceeded to sell the same under the pretended decree; but the sheriff refused to accept the claim, upon the ground that the creditors and administrator of Susan A. Sapp objected thereto. They prepared a petition setting forth the facts herein set forth, for the purpose of enjoining the sale, but it was impossible for them to reach a qualified judge before the time for the sale, and therefore they simply filed their petition, and gave notice of their claim at the sale. The petition and claim were disregarded by the sheriff and the lands were sold to Williamson, to whom the sheriff executed a deed. It is alleged that the sale was illegal, for the reason that the levy and advertisement did not state the name of any one as the owner of the land levied on. All of the petitioners aver that while the decree purports to have been granted by consent, as a matter of fact, none of them ever consented thereto, nor authorized any attorney or any other person to consent to any such decree, nor did they waive the disqualification of the presiding judge, nor did they agree for the decree to be entered during vacation without the intervention of a jury, never having been consulted in reference to any of these matters. The plaintiffs Jeff D. Sapp, Wm. S. Sapp, Katie Ward, Lou Powell, and Annie Cobb show that so far as they are concerned, although they were parties to the litigation in which the decree was rendered, the decree does not even purport to have been consented to by them, or by any person in their behalf, and, in fact, was never consented to by them or by any authorized person for them. It is alleged that the mortgage in favor of Mollie H. Grace has never been foreclosed, and the sheriff had no authority to sell the land therein mortgaged; that it was illegal to sell under the Ragan mortgage any other property than that embraced in the mortgage execution. The manner in which the proceeds of the sale were directed to be made is attacked as being illegal and unauthorized. The payment of the expenses of Ragan is also attacked as being illegal and beyond the jurisdiction of the court. The different amounts that were ordered to be paid to different parties is alleged to be illegal for various reasons. It is alleged that Rawlins, as administrator of Susan A. Sapp, had no authority to consent for funds arising from the sale of the property of the estate to be applied to the debts of W. B. Sapp and other claims to which it was appropriated by the decree, and the administrator had no authority to bind these plaintiffs in regard to the matters embraced in the litigation. The amount of the indebtedness is set forth, as well as the value of the property. It is distinctly alleged that there has never been any necessity for the decree or for the sale of the land, for the reason that the plaintiffs, as heirs of Susan A. Sapp, have been at all times ready and willing to pay the just debts of her estate and divide the remainder among themselves, and they are still ready to do this, and they are also ready and willing to pay all the just debts of W. B. Sapp secured by liens to which the land may be legally subject. It is also alleged that the decree is illegal, because granted in vacation, at chambers, out of the county in which the litigation was pending, and by a disqualified judge. Plaintiffs have received no part of the proceeds of the sale, and the sheriff has not put Williamson, the purchaser, in possession; but Williamson has been cutting and hauling the timber from two of the lots, and is threatening to take possession of the land. The prayer is that the sheriff be enjoined from placing Williamson in possession, and that he be enjoined from taking possession; that all of the defendants be enjoined from interfering with or disposing of the land sold by the sheriff; and that the decree be declared null and void and be set aside; and for general relief and process. By amendment it is alleged that the decree was void for the further reason that there was no order granted or taken in term time providing for a hearing and disposition of the case in vacation, and there is no written consent of the parties in the premises.

Williamson, Mollie H. Grace, and Ragan filed a demurrer, in which they alleged that there was no equity in the petition; that it appears therefrom that the plaintiffs sue as heirs at law of Susan A. Sapp, and that her estate is represented by an administrator, and it is not alleged that the administrator has been discharged or that he has consented to the bringing of the suit, and there is no allegation of fraud or collusion between the administrator and the other defendants; that it does not appear that the plaintiffs are all of the heirs of Susan A. Sapp, nor what is the interest of each of them; that the allegation in reference to the irreparable damages are too general and vague; that the wrongs complained of are merely trespasses, and there is no allegation of insolvency; that, so far as the plaintiffs Chas. W. Sapp and Geo. W. Sapp are concerned, there is no allegation that the attorneys who signed the decree in their behalf did not represent them in the claim cases; and that the order of the ordinary authorizing the sale of the land cannot be collaterally attacked.

The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiffs excepted.

De Lacy & Bishop, for plaintiffs in error.
W. L. & Warren Grice, D. M. Roberts & Son, and W. M. Morrison, for defendants in error.

COBB, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. While the record in this case contains only the petition and the demurrer, it fairly bristles with allegations of fact and averments of dates, and this is calculated to beget confusion. But, after a careful consideration of the petition, we think that the case at last can be resolved by the application of a few well-settled principles. The judges of the superior court cannot exercise any power out of term time, unless the authority to do so is expressly granted by the law, or an order has been taken in term conferring authority to render a judgment in vacation. Civ. Code 1895, § 4325. The law expressly authorizes such judges to hear and determine, in vacation, without an order passed in term, motions for new trials, certioraris, and such other matters as are not referred to a jury, provided application is made by either party, or his counsel, and 10 days' notice in writing is given to the opposite party of the time and place of hearing. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 4323, 4324. What purports to be a consent decree in the present case was not, according to the allegations in the petition, entered in term time. It does not appear that an order was taken in term authorizing the decree to be entered in vacation. The allegation of the petition is that there was no such order. The matters involved were such as, under the law, would be referred to a jury, unless, by consent, the judge was authorized to pass upon the questions of fact involved. Even if a case of this character could be heard in vacation, under the sections above referred to, providing for 10 days' notice, there was nothing to indicate that a hearing was had under this provision of the law. On the contrary, it appears from the very paper itself that the decree was not so signed, it being stated therein that the terms of the decree were agreed upon in term and the decree entered nunc pro tunc. While an order, judgment, or decree may be entered nunc pro tunc under certain conditions, this must be done in term time, except in those cases where the judge is authorized to act in vacation. Of course, it is within the power of the parties to waive the disqualification of the judge, and, when such waiver is made, he has, in the particular case, all the authority he would have if no such disqualification existed; but mere waiver of the disqualification does not confer upon him any greater power than he already had under the law. Even if the presiding judge had not been disqualified in the present case, we think the decree would be inoperative for the reasons above referred to.

2. As the decree was inoperative as a judgment of the court, the question arises: How far is the paper binding upon the parties who have consented thereto? While what purports to be a consent decree may fail to operate as a judgment binding upon the parties on account of the want of jurisdiction in the court, or other valid reason, still, if the terms of the same were entered into upon a sufficient consideration, agreed to by the parties with a full knowledge of its contents, it would, in the absence of fraud, accident or mistake, be operative as an agreement binding upon all of the parties thereto. Kidd v. Huff, 105 Ga. 209, 31 S. E. 430 (1); Driver v. Wood, 114 Ga. 296, 40 S. E. 257. What purports to be the consent decree is signed by counsel in behalf of at least some of the plaintiffs. It is distinctly alleged that none of the plaintiffs ever consented to the decree, but it is not denied that the counsel who signed the decree were the counsel of record of those parties whom they purported to represent. The signature of the counsel would, therefore, be prima facie evidence that the parties had consented thereto. The control of counsel over a case in their hands is under the law very broad, and, except in those cases where the law distinctly declares that counsel cannot bind their clients by agreement entered into in reference to a case in which they are employed, the consent of counsel will bind the client so far as the opposite party is concerned; the counsel, of course, being responsible to his client for any loss resulting from the fact that he has disobeyed instructions, or the rights of his client have been prejudiced by his negligence. But, for the purposes of this case, we will deal with what purports to be a consent decree as inoperative upon the plaintiffs, both as a judgment and as an agreement; for in our opinion, even when it is so dealt with, there is no equity in the petition. All of the plaintiffs sue as the heirs at law of Susan A. Sapp in reference to some of the matters involved. Two of the plaintiffs set up title in themselves—each to a portion of the lands in controversy.

We will first deal with the petition so far as it relates to the alleged claims of the heirs at law of Susan A. Sapp. It must be kept in mind that the estate of Susan A. Sapp is represented by an administrator. The bank had a mortgage execution upon a portion of the lands involved in the controversy; such mortgage having been given by Susan A. Sapp. A sale under this mortgage execution had been enjoined at the instance of Ragan in one proceeding, and Mrs. Grace in another. With these injunctions removed, there was no legal obstacle in the way of the bank proceeding to sell the land embraced in its mortgage execution. The parties who had obtained these injunctions consented to the sale, and the plaintiffs had no concern in this matter. Ragan and Mrs. Grace could have dismissed their bills and the injunctions been thereby dissolved. They could have allowed their bills to remain pending, and it was no concern of the plaintiffs in this case that they had consented to the injunctions being, in effect, dissolved. Even if the bank had caused a sale to be had in violation of the injunctions, it would have been no concern of the plaintiffs, but the officers of the bank and its counsel would have rendered themselves amenable to the court for contempt, and, at the instance of Ragan and Mrs. Grace, proceedings might be had to punish them for contempt or to restore the status. But the plaintiffs had no concern whatever in reference to this matter. If the mortgage foreclosure judgment was a valid judgment against the administrator, title to the land would have passed at the sale. If it was not a valid judgment, no title would have passed. But it is said that under the terms of the consent decree the proceeds of the sale were to be divided in such way as to prejudice the heirs of Susan A. Sapp that claims were to be paid which were not charges against her estate at all, and that it provided for the payment of the debts of W. B. Sapp out of the proceeds. It is also, in effect charged that the lands not embraced in the mortgage were to be sold under the mortgage execution. There is no allegation that the administrator of Susan A. Sapp is insolvent, nor is it alleged that the securities on his bond are insolvent. If the sale under the mortgage execution of the bank was conducted in good faith and without collusion between the administrator and the bank, the sale was valid. And, even if there was collusion between the administrator and the bank, and Williamson was not a party to the collusive arrangement, but bought in good faith as the highest bidder at the sale, the sale would be valid. But, if the administrator had been faithless to his trust in any way, he must respond to the heirs of the estate for the amount which they have been damaged. If the administrator has agreed to pay claims out of the assets of the estate which he had no authority to pay, upon an accounting he will be held liable to the heirs for such amounts. The decree does not stand in the way of the heirs as a judgment, and if, as a contract, it is binding upon the administrator, the heirs may still go behind it, and show that he has entered into an agreement which was unauthorized by law, and therefore he must make good to the heirs the loss they have sustained thereby. As to all of the matters alleged as claims of the plaintiffs as heirs at law of Susan A. Sapp, they have an adequate remedy at law by suit against the administrator and the securities on his bond, and it is not necessary that the paper purporting to be a consent decree should be canceled.

3. The petition also sets up a claim of title on behalf of Geo. W. Sapp and Chas. W. Sapp, each to a different part of the lands in controversy. The decree purported to withdraw the claims which these parties had filed. There is no denial of the fact that the counsel signing the decree in their behalf represented them, and it was within the authority of counsel to withdraw their claims if they saw proper, being liable to their clients in the event it was contrary to instructions or negligence on their part. There is nothing in the decree which purports in terms to condemn the land of these two Sapps to any of the executions. It only purports to withdraw the claims; and, so far as they constituted an obstacle to the sale, such obstacle was thus removed. There is nothing in the decree which makes the land subject to the executions, if they were not already subject, and there is nothing which prevents the claimants from thereafter asserting title to the same. They claim title under a parol gift from their father and mother; such gift being followed by valuable improvements. If, at the time that their father was the owner, he gave them the land claimed, and in pursuance of this parol gift they entered in good faith and made valuable improvements, they would have a complete equity as against him and as against all persons who attempted to acquire any interest from him after they had entered into possession and made improvements, and while they were still in possession. This would also be true if their mother was the owner of the property and the gift emanated from her. It was not absolutely indispensable to the completion of their equity that their possession should continue for seven years. Garbutt v. Mayo, 57 S. E. 495. The allegations in reference to the parol gift and the improvements made on the faith of the same are meager, but possibly sufficient to withstand a general demurrer. But there is no prayer that the title acquired under this parol gift be recognized. The prayers of the petition are merely to restrain the sheriff from putting Williamson in possession of the land sold under the mortgage execution of the bank, and to restrain all of the defendants from interfering with any of the land mentioned in the petition, and to set aside the consent decree and the sale in pursuance thereof, and for general relief. The prayer for general relief would not authorize a decree setting up the title under the parol gift, for it is well settled that no relief can be granted under such prayer except that which is germane or connected with one of the specific prayers. Steed v. Savage, 115 Ga. 97, 41 S. E. 272. What might be the rights of these two Sapps in another proceeding, in which they set up their title under the parol gift and ask for an injunction to prevent the sheriff from dispossessing them, we will not now determine; but, under the prayers of the present petition, they are not entitled to a decree declaring them the owners of the property as against the mortgage execution of the bank. They are not bound by the decree as a judgment, and they are not bound by the decree as a contract, for the reason that the paper does not purport to divest them of any rights which they might have in the land. They may hereafter assert their title in a proper proceeding with the proper prayers. Whether, if there had been a prayer in the present case for this relief, the petition would have been multifarious, we will not now determine. In no view of the case do we think there was any equity in the petition.

4. As to the defendants who demurred, the petition was properly dismissed, but it should not have been dismissed as to the defendants who did not unite in the demurrer. Ballin v. Ferst, 55 Ga. 546 (4); Byron v. Gunn, 111 Ga. 806, 35 S. E. 649 (2).

Judgment affirmed, with direction. All the Justices concur.

WRIGHT v. STAFFORD & SONS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1907.)

1. WRIT OF ERROR—DISMISSAL—DEFECTS IN PROCEEDINGS.

A motion for a new trial was made, which by order of the court was continued from time to time until the 21st of May, 1906, at which time, in accordance with an order of the judge, the movant presented a brief of the evidence for approval. The presiding judge took the motion for final determination, and by consent of parties and an order passed it was set for June 2d, in a different county from that where the case was tried (as was recited in the bill of exceptions). On the hearing the judge approved the grounds of the motion and also the brief of evidence, and ordered it to be filed with the clerk of the superior court of the county where it was pending within 10 days. No objection or motion to dismiss appears to have been made in the superior court. He also overruled the motion. The brief was filed on June 9th. To the overruling of the motion the movant excepted. A motion to dismiss the writ of error was made on the ground that the brief of evidence was not approved until June 2d, and filed June 9th, and that there was no prior order granted giving authority for the hearing of the motion or the presenting or approving of the brief of evidence on the date mentioned. Held, that the motion to dismiss will be overruled.

2. EXECUTION—CLAIMS BY THIRD PERSONS—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

The deeds offered in the present case did not on their face appear to be connected with the land in dispute, or to throw any light on the controversy. The motion for a new trial asserted that the claimant insisted and sought by evidence to show that there was a parol partition. But the statement as to the evidence offered was so vague and general that it did not show, if there was a parol division, with any distinctness, what it was, or that it was sufficiently perfected to pass any title. Whether it could be made sufficient to make the deeds admissible is not decided.

3. SAME.

For a like reason, there was no error in excluding from evidence, when standing alone, a general statement by a witness that he was a witness to an agreement in which the defendant in fi. fa. and his father and other children of the latter made a partition or division "of all the lands, including the lands levied on."

4. SAME.

It was erroneous to reject evidence tending to show that the husband of the claimant, under whom she claimed, made an exchange with the defendant in fi. fa. before the judgment against him was rendered, whereby the claimant's husband gave to the defendant an interest in 50 acres of land and a pair of mules and wagon, worth $350, for the defendant's interest in the land in controversy, and that the defendant took possession of such property and afterwards sold it.

5. WRIT OF ERROR—REVERSAL.

The judgment is reversed and the case returned for a new trial, in order that all legitimate evidence may be offered and admitted, if relevant. This court does not now express any opinion as to the effect which the evidence may have, or whether the alleged donor acquired a title superior to the lien of the execution, or, if he did, whether a parol gift to his second wife, and her children (if made) would convey such a title or interest as to be superior to the claim of one of his heirs, or of a judgment creditor of such heir.

HART, Atty. Gen., v. ATLANTA TERMINAL CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 19, 1907.)

1. INJUNCTION—GROUNDS OF RELIEF.

Without reference to the legality or illegality of the claim-check system as originally practiced, it was alleged and evidence was introduced to show that it had been abandoned and there was no evidence of an intention to reinstate it. Under these conditions, there could be no abuse of discretion in refusing an injunction in regard to it.

2. CARRIERS — CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS — BAGGAGE — SPECIAL PRIVILEGES AS TO HANDLING.

In the case of Kates v. Atlanta Baggage Co., 34 S. E. 372, 46 L. R. A. 431, 107 Ga. 637, after announcing that, "relatively to passengers and their baggage, the duty of a railway company in its capacity as a common carrier begins with affording to them, and to all of them alike, proper and suitable facilities for entering depots to purchase tickets and take passage, and for checking baggage, and ends with affording to them like facilities for leaving such depots and obtaining their baggage on presenting the checks therefor," the court decided that, "if a railway company in good faith complies with the law as above laid down, it does not violate any public duty or deprive any citizen of any lawful right by granting to a single corporation or individual the exclusive right of entering its trains to solicit the transportation of passengers and baggage, or by renting to such corporation or individual a portion of its baggage room and conceding to it or him the privileges necessarily incident to the occupancy and use thereof, provided that so doing does not interfere with the exercise by any other person of any right which he may lawfully demand of the company as a common carrier." This decision was concurred in by the entire bench of six justices. Upon review, it cannot be reversed except by the concurrence of the entire bench; and in this case the decision must stand, as a sufficient number of justices do not concur in order to overrule it.

3. SAME.

The questions of law in the present case (the claim-check practice not being now involved, as stated in a previous note) are substantially controlled by the decision in the case above referred to.

4. INJUNCTION—GROUNDS OF RELIEF.

On the questions of fact as to the actual practice followed in regard to baggage, and other issues of fact, the evidence was conflicting, and there was no abuse of discretion on the part of the presiding judge in denying an injunction.

5. PARTIES—PARTIES PLAINTIFF—REAL PARTY IN INTEREST—AMENDMENT.

The Governor of the state passed an order "directing that the Attorney General file appropriate proceedings in the proper courts in the name of the state, to correct the wrongs to the people complained of." In the action brought the petition stated that "this suit is instituted by virtue of an executive order made by Hon. Joseph M. Terrell, Governor of Georgia, on the _____ day of May, 1906, in pursuance of his authority as chief executive of the state of Georgia, and in pursuance of the authority vested in the Honorable John O. Hart as the Attorney General of the state of Georgia." Held, that the suit was substantially one by the state, and upon special demurrer raising the point that it was brought in the name of the Attorney General, instead of in the name of the state, it could be amended.

6. MANDAMUS—EXCLUSION OF OTHER REMEDIES—INJUNCTION.

In a case such as that made in the petition, brought for the benefit of the public, an application for injunction would be an appropriate remedy, if the facts justified it; and the exclusive remedy was not by writ of mandamus.

7. WRIT OF ERROR—EVIDENCE.

The rulings complained of as to the evidence were not such as to affect the decision above made.

Freeman, J., dissenting in part.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by John C. Hart, Attorney General, against the Atlanta Terminal Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Jno. C. Hart, Atty. Gen., Arnold & Arnold, and Jno. L. Hopkins & Sons, for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster & Howell, Herbert Haas, Rosser & Brandon, and Arthur Heyman, for defendants in error.

FREEMAN, J. The rulings of the majority of the court are contained in the headnotes; and in the discussion which will follow anything that may be said which is in conflict with such rulings is to be understood as setting forth merely the individual views of the writer.

During the year 1906 the American Baggage & Transfer Company filed a bill against the Atlanta Baggage & Cab Company (hereinafter called the "Cab Company") and the Atlanta Terminal Company (hereinafter called the "Terminal Company"), wherein it was sought to enjoin the grant by the Terminal Company to the Cab Company of the use of a system of "claim checks," and for the purpose of having declared void a certain contract between the Terminal Company and the Cab Company, on the ground that such contract was in violation of Const. art. 4, § 2, par. 4. Upon a trial had in that case before the judge, a temporary injunction was granted, to which judgment there was exception to this court; and on May 24, 1906, the judgment of the court below was reversed, as will be seen from a report of that case in Atlanta Terminal Co. v. American Baggage & Transfer Co., 125 Ga. 677, 54 S. E. 711. Afterwards, upon application of the Transfer Company, the Governor authorized this suit to be brought by the Attorney General. The petition avers that the Terminal Company is a railroad corporation of this state, that the Cab Company is a corporation, and that the Terminal Company is the owner of the Terminal Station in the city of Atlanta, which is used for the arrival and departure of trains of the Southern Railway, the Atlanta & West Point Railroad, and the Central of Georgia Railroad Companies, who are made parties to the suit. The Terminal Company and the railway companies filed separate answers. The judge refused the injunction prayed for, and the plaintiff prosecuted a writ of error to this court. The pleadings are voluminous, and much evidence was offered by both sides. The contentions of the parties in the pleadings and the evidence, so far as is necessary for an undertaking of the questions discussed, will be stated in the opinion.

The privileges granted the Cab Company by the Terminal Company, complained of by the plaintiff in error, so far as are pertinent to this discussion, are: (1) The exclusive control of checking baggage from and to all points in the city of Atlanta from and into the baggage room of the Terminal Station. (2) The exclusive privilege of having an office in the depot building from which to conduct business. (3) The exclusive privilege of soliciting business on the depot property and in the depot building from passengers. (4) The exclusive privilege of boarding cars of the several railroad companies entering the passenger station, for the purpose of soliciting the delivery in the city of incoming baggage. (5) The exclusive privilege of receiving from the Terminal Company railroad checks and checking baggage at hotels and residences of passengers when tickets or evidences of the right to travel are exhibited to it. (6) The exclusive right to rent and occupy for the purpose of delivery and storage of baggage of incoming passengers for delivery in the city of Atlanta, and of outgoing passengers, prior to the checking of such baggage with railroad checks. Each of these privileges is granted exclusively to the Cab Company and denied to all others. Prior to the decision rendered by this court on May 24, 1906, in the case of Atlanta Terminal Company v. American Baggage Company, 125 Ga. 677, 54 S. E. 711, each of these privileges was granted and enjoyed by the Cab Company, except the last. After the rendition of that opinion, the Terminal Company cut off one corner of its baggage room by an iron railing, about three feet high, and furnished the same to the Cab Company in which to store outgoing baggage prior to the checking of the same by railroad checks. This space so cut off opened on the driveway from which trunks and other baggage are delivered into the baggage room, and also had openings into the remaining portion of the baggage room, which space the Cab Company was occupying at the time this suit was filed. The Terminal Company, after this arrangement was made, discontinued privileges (1) supra, and, refused to receive into that portion of the baggage room not rented to the Cab Company any trunk or other parcel whatever until the same was accompanied by a railroad ticket or other right to travel on one of the railroads using the station. In other words, the Terminal Company discontinued the claim-check system, which up to that time had been used exclusively by the Cab Company. The Terminal Company, also, after the rendition of said opinion, denied to the Cab Company privilege (5). With these changes, the business of receiving and discharging baggage when this suit was filed was the same as it was when the case in 125 Ga. 677, 54 S. E. 711, supra, was decided. It is insisted by the plaintiff in error that each of these exclusive privileges granted the Cab Company is illegal, and should be so declared.

1-4. The case of Kates v. Atlanta Baggage & Cab Company, 107 Ga. 636, 34 S. E. 372, 46 L. R. A. 431, decides adversely the contentions of the plaintiff in error as respects the right to grant to the Cab Company the exclusive privilege of having an office in the depot building for the transaction of its business, of boarding the cars of the several railroad companies prior to entering the station for the purpose of soliciting the delivery in the city of incoming baggage, of soliciting business on the depot property and in the depot building, of checking to point of destination, with railroad checks, the baggage of passengers at hotels and residences. The plaintiff in error asks that the Kates Case be reviewed and overruled. The judgment in the case was concurred in by a full bench of six justices. In order to overrule it, the judgment of reversal must be concurred in by a full bench of six justices. Upon a review of the Kates Case, a sufficient number of justices do not concur in order to overrule and reverse it. Therefore that decision must stand and be followed as to all questions decided by it. In view whereof, it is not deemed advisable, in this connection, to enter upon a discussion of the principles underlying the decision. The subject is treated in Beale & Wyman's Railroad Rate Regulation, §§ 800-816, where the authorities pro and con are collated. An inspection of the opinion in the Kates Case will reveal that article 4, § 2, par. 4 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5800), was considered by the court, and the decision rendered with reference thereto. It is insisted by plaintiff in error that the right of the Terminal Company to rent to the Cab Company space in the baggage room, to be exclusively occupied by it for the storage of trunks prior to offering them to the baggage master to be checked with railroad checks for transportation, was not decided in the Kates Case. The defendants insist to the contrary. In order to pass upon this contention, it becomes necessary to critically examine the Kates Case, in order to determine if the contention of defendants in error is correct; for, if they be correct in this contention, the Kates Case is controlling, as has been shown above.

The facts upon which the opinion in the Kates Case is based are stated in the opinion. The first sentence shows this: "The facts necessary for a clear comprehension of the merits of the petition, under which the defendants were sought to be enjoined, may be briefly stated as follows." It will not be seriously contended that the legal principles announced arose out of or would be applicable to a different state of facts than those stated by the court upon which the opinion is based, even though an examination of the record should reveal a material difference. On page 642 of 107 Ga., and page 374 of 34 S. E., Judge Little states the questions for determination by the court this way: "The evidence was in direct conflict on many points. As to the truth of the allegations about which the evidence is conflicting, it is, so far as we are concerned, settled by the determination of the judge, and the right of the petitioner to have the judgment refusing the injunction reversed must depend on the application of legal principles to such of the allegations as are not contested by the evidence, and these are, first, that the defendants permit the Cab Company to enter the passenger trains before reaching the city for the purpose of soliciting baggage, and refuse the same privileges to petitioner; second, that the servants of the Cab Company are allowed access to the passenger station for the purpose of soliciting patronage and for more conveniently attending to its business, and this privilege is refused to petitioner; third, that the privilege of using an office in the baggage room of the defendants for the transaction of its business is granted to the Cab Company, and refused to Kates; fourth, the privilege of checking the baggage of prospective passengers at hotels and residences in advance of delivery of baggage at the passenger station." These questions were decided against the contentions of Kates. Kates also claimed in his petition (top of page 638 of 107 Ga., and page 373 of 34 S. E.) that the Cab Company was "given the exclusive privilege of entering the depot building for the purpose of handling trunks and baggage, and of issuing what is known as 'claim checks'; that is to say, that company is allowed to deliver, at his home or elsewhere, to a prospective passenger, its check for his trunk, and on delivery of a trunk so checked at the baggage room it is received by the baggage master and held until the check is presented," and on same page (middle) the Cab Company "is allowed storage in the baggage room for the baggage of its customers hours in advance of the departure of outgoing trains, and transacts its business in the baggage room." These allegations were denied by the answer (page 639, near bottom of 107 Ga., and page 373 of 34 S. E.). "Defendants answered, admitting that a contract existed with the Cab Company, but averring that no exclusive privilege of entering the depot for the purpose of hauling trunks, baggage, etc., has been given to the Cab Company; that the same rights which are accorded to the Cab Company as to the receipt and delivery of baggage are extended to all companies and persons engaged in the business, including the petitioner; that the petitioner, as well as the Cab Company, is permitted by the board of control to give claim checks to its patrons, which the baggage master recognizes." It is true that on page 641 the judge further states: "As a part of his evidence, the petitioner introduced a contract . . . by which it was provided that [the Cab Company] should have the exclusive control of checking baggage from all parts of the city of Atlanta into and from the baggage room of the depot." But, notwithstanding this, the judge treated the existence of the "claim-check" system to have been in issue between the parties, as will appear from this extract from the opinion on page

645, near middle, of 107 Ga., and page 375 of 34 S. E.: "Receiving and discharging baggage is one of the duties of a public passenger carrier, and the obligations before enumerated apply in full force in the receipt and discharge of baggage at the Union Passenger Station in the city of Atlanta, and if it should be found to be true that the defendant railroad companies, either in the receipt or delivery of baggage by their baggage master or other agents, discriminated against any passenger or the agent of any passenger in the time or manner in which baggage was received or discharged either through a system of claim checks or otherwise, such discrimination would be a palpable violation of their public duties, for which the law affords ample remedy by injunction and full redress in the nature of damages."

It is urged by the counsel for the Cab Company in this case that the court in this extract was speaking of baggage in its technical sense, having in mind a trunk, the custody and possession of which, by reason of its owner's relation to the railroad, could at once be legally enforced upon it; that is, when presented with a railroad ticket, to be checked to point of destination. The court, however, could not have had this view of the matter, for the simple reason that Kates was not complaining that there was a refusal to check with railroad checks trunks when presented with the evidence of the right of transportation. His complaint in this respect was that the baggage master received into the baggage room trunks having on them claim checks of the Cab Company, and refused him the same privilege. Nor could the court have had in view the complaint of Kates as to checking baggage by the Cab Company with railroad checks at hotels and residences, because the opinion deals with this subject and upholds this special privilege thus given to the Cab Company as being legal. It hardly seems possible to escape the conclusion that the court had in mind the system of claim checks as practiced at the station, and of which Kates was complaining. It was not the system of claim checks in and of itself which Kates objected to. He had the perfect right to have a system of his own, just as the Cab Company had; but the trouble was, as claimed by Kates, that the baggage master recognized the system of the Cab Company and received the trunks into the baggage room, but refused to recognize those upon trunks handled by Kates. The court says that "If it should be found to be true [that is, as the writer interprets the meaning of the court, if the jury on the final trial of the case should find it to be true that the baggage master received trunks into the baggage room on the claim checks of the Cab Company and refused a like privilege to trunks handled by Kates, the parties being at issue on this question] that the defendant railroad companies, either in the receipt or delivery of baggage by their baggage master or other agents, discriminated against any passenger or the agent of any passenger in the time or manner in which baggage was received or discharged either through a system of claim checks or otherwise, such discrimination would be a palpable violation of their public duties," etc. It is clear that if the court did not decide the system of claim checks, practiced as claimed by Kates, to be a palpable violation of the public duties of the railroads, it certainly was not decided to be legal, and is still an open question, so far as the Kates Case is concerned. The only right of storage allowed the Cab Company in the baggage room was to place the trunks handled by it along with and among the other trunks in the baggage room; this right of storage being exercised under the claim-check privilege. It is certain, so far as storage privileges were concerned, that the Cab Company had no separate space set apart to it for that purpose. The conclusion follows that in point of fact the Cab Company had no right of storage in the baggage room except that accorded by the claim-check privileges, which, being a matter about which there was conflicting evidence, was not decided, and the opinion so expressly states. "The right of the petitioner to have the judgment refusing the injunction reversed must depend on the application of legal principles to such of the allegations as are not contested by the evidence." Page 642 of 107 Ga., and page 374 of 34 S. E. One of the contentions by Kates was that the Cab Company had the privilege of using an office in the baggage room for the transaction of its business, and this right was denied to him. There was no conflict in the evidence, nor denial in the pleadings, as to the truth of this contention by Kates. Whatever business may have been transacted in this office by the Cab Company it is certain that the storage of trunks was not a part of such business. The original record in the case indicates that the office was used in connection with incoming baggage. In paragraph 15 of its answer, the board of control says: "Therefore it is necessarily true that, in order to do this work effectively, some arrangement had to be made with some company granting to it the privilege of meeting incoming trains for the purpose of receipting for baggage to be delivered to the passenger's residence. In order to do this, the defendant had to furnish the company thus engaged with an office in which business could be conducted." Kates attacked the right of office privileges and the right of storage privileges separately; and it is a significant fact that the court treated these subjects under separate heads, sanctioning the office privilege as legal, and, if not condemning, certainly refusing to pass on the legality of the storage privilege, because its existence as an exclusive privilege was in issue. It would be fair to say that, in view of the foregoing, the office privilege was an incident to the exclusive privileges sanctioned by the court, and its use was to enable the Cab Company to enjoy these privileges, and to that extent it was legal.

It is insisted, however, that the right of the Cab Company to have an office in the baggage room from which to conduct its business was distinctly decided; that there is no difference, in principle, in the right to an office in the baggage room and the right of storage space; that, the right of rental being conceded, the right of use for all purposes follows. In this connection, it would be well to determine what principle the Kates Case decides. It will not be controverted that the exclusive privileges held by the court to be legal, which were granted the Cab Company and denied to Kates, are all based upon the same legal principles. They are all stated together, and one line of argument applies to all. The court on page 643 of 107 Ga., and page 375 of 34 S. E., says: "The merits of his [Kates'] complaint, if any exist, must be found in the fact of the refusal of the defendant to grant to him the opportunities so to serve the public, and thereby better his business. Whether the refusal so to do is proper or unlawful does not depend upon favor or inclination of the railroad company, but upon the plaintiff's right." In order for Kates, therefore, to show that he was entitled to an office in the depot building, he had to show that he had a legal right under the facts to compel the railroads to grant it to him. The court further says that, "if it should depend upon favor, then the plaintiff in error has no cause of complaint, because favor is essentially free and voluntary, and may not be demanded, and it is in this view we come to measure by the legal standard what are the rights of the petitioner under the allegations he makes, as against the rights of the defendants to control property to which they have title, and consequently the right of use, and the plaintiff in error [Kates], to succeed, must establish the proposition that the defendants as common carriers are in law bound to afford to him the same conveniences and facilities for carrying on his business which they afford to others engaged in the same calling." The court then proceeds to argue that Kates, seeking to ply his private business upon the railroads' property, has no right which he can enforce. The decision is predicated upon the proposition that the railroad companies have the right to exclude from their premises persons going thereon for the purpose of transacting private business, and that, as to this class, the property of such companies is private property, and they therefore have the right to grant privileges to one and deny them to others; citing the case of Flinker v. Railroad Co., 81 Ga. 461, 8 S. E. 529, 2 L. R. A. 843, 12 Am. St. Rep. 328. From the foregoing it seems to be clear: (a) That, as a matter of fact, the Cab Company had no separate space in the baggage room for storage purposes. It had an office in the baggage room, but baggage was not stored in the office. It had no storage privilege in the baggage room which was held to be legal by the court; the claim-check privilege being in dispute. (b) That the court decided, on legal principles (1) that, as to Kates seeking to ply his private business, he had no right to enjoin the railroad companies from granting the special privileges to the Cab Company until like privileges were granted to him; (2) that, except as to duties as passenger carriers which they owed the public, their property was private property. The court never decided, nor was the question in the case, that Kates could, in the suit, assert the rights of passengers, or the rights of prospective passengers. Under the decision of this court in the case of Atlanta Terminal Company v. American Transfer Co., 125 Ga. 677, 54 S. E. 711, the rights of passengers or of prospective passengers cannot be enforced by a person or corporation seeking only to carry on private business. The conclusion follows that this court is not concluded by the Kates Case in so far as the point is made in the case at bar as to whether the Terminal Company can legally contract with the Cab Company to grant exclusively to the Cab Company space in its baggage room for the storage of outgoing baggage of its patrons prior to checking the same with railroad checks, and refuse to receive into the baggage room the trunks of all other persons until presented with railroad tickets, or evidence of the right to be transported over one of the lines of railroad using the station. If the language in the fourth headnote in the Kates Case be susceptible of a broader construction, it should be construed and limited by the legal principles underlying the decision, and by the questions really made and decided. The rights of that portion of the public having business with the railroads could not be enforced or their wrongs redressed by Kates, and such rights were not involved in that case, and hence could not have been decided.

The defendants in error deny that the claim-check system was in force when this suit was filed, and the evidence in support of this contention is not contradicted. There was no evidence of any intention to renew this system. Therefore the judge committed no error in refusing to enjoin this practice. While this is true, the system will be considered along with the storage privilege, as the same legal principles are applicable to both. Inquiry will therefore be had as to these matters: (a) Whether the system of "claim checks" as practiced before the rendition of the opinion in the Atlanta Terminal Co. Case, 125 Ga. 677, 54 S. E. 711, was or was not in violation of law; and (b) whether the exclusive occupancy of a portion of the baggage room in the Terminal Station by the Cab Company, after the rendition of that opinion, as shown by the pleadings and evidence, is or is not in violation of law. For convenience, these two questions will be discussed together. The claim-check system is not of itself unlawful. Any person or corporation engaged in the business of hauling trunks or parcels to or from the passenger station can establish this system in conducting its business. The "claim check" is used simply as a convenient method of identifying the parcel. The operation of this system by the Cab Company is stated by the plaintiff and admitted by defendant to be as follows: The proposed passenger calls for the Cab Company to transfer his trunk from his home or hotel to the station. The Cab Company sends its wagon to the home or hotel, and there receives the trunk, placing one of its checks on trunk, bearing a given number, and giving to the proposed passenger a duplicate check carrying the same number. The trunk is then conveyed by the Cab Company's wagon to the baggage room of the Terminal Company. The baggage master receives the trunk into the baggage room, bearing the check of the Cab Company. The passenger follows the trunk at whatever time suits his convenience, purchases his railroad ticket, presents this to an employé of the Terminal Company at the baggage room, accompanied by the claim check issued by the Cab Company, and receives a railroad check for his trunk, nothing further being required of him in identifying his trunk or otherwise. The Terminal Company has granted the Cab Company the exclusive privilege of this use of claim checks. It refuses to receive into its baggage room at all any trunk offered by any other transfer company or person, whether accompanied by a claim check or not, unless it be accompanied by a railroad ticket or evidence of the right to be transported as a passenger over one of the lines of railroad using the Terminal Station. If the proposed passenger transports his trunk in person and it is presented to the baggage master, the privilege of depositing the trunk in the baggage room is denied him, unless he presents with the trunk a railroad ticket. If he should carry his trunk to the baggage room before he buys his ticket he would be compelled to leave his trunk unprotected in the driveway or make other disposition of it while he went to the ticket office, some distance away, in another part of the building, to purchase a ticket. The driveway for the delivery of trunks into the baggage room is on the north side of the building, and is the only way provided by which baggage is received or delivered. It is an open way and unprotected. If the trunk should be presented by any other transfer company, or person other than the owner, admission in the baggage room is refused, if the proposed passenger has not seen proper to buy his railroad ticket, and intrust it with such transfer company or person, or if such proposed passenger did not himself appear in person, identify his baggage, and present his railroad ticket. If, when such trunk had arrived at the baggage room, the proposed passenger had not arrived, the trunk would have to be cared for by the person in charge of it, exposed to the weather, until the owner should appear with his transportation and identify the trunk. Neither the railroad companies nor their agent, the Terminal Company, have provided any place whatever for the deposit of baggage or for its temporary storage. A rule has been promulgated and enforced that no trunks or other parcels intended to be transported on the railroad as baggage should be received into the baggage room under any circumstances, except those bearing the Cab Company's checks, unless the same was accompanied by railroad tickets, and when thus presented would be checked as baggage. Such, in brief, was the method of doing business as respects the receipt of trunks at the baggage room at the time the decision in the Atlanta Terminal Company Case, supra, was rendered. Shortly after the decision in that case, and before this suit was filed, a rule was made that no trunk or other parcel whatever would under any circumstances be received into the baggage room unless accompanied by railroad tickets; the right of the Cab Company to deliver the trunks of its patrons being thereby revoked. In lieu of this privilege thus denied the Cab Company, the Terminal Company allowed the Cab Company to occupy a part of the baggage room itself, which space opened on the driveway and also opened into the balance of the baggage room not rented. Into this space the Cab Company delivered the trunks of its patrons, where they remained until the proposed passenger appeared and bought his railroad ticket. He then took his railroad ticket and his claim check, and presented it in the depot building to the agent of the Cab Company, this office being not in the baggage room, but on the passage leading from the ticket office to the train shed. When thus presented, such agent of the Cab Company would take the ticket and claim check, and go a short distance to the space in the baggage room occupied by the Cab Company, where the trunk was identified by the claim check and tendered to the baggage master, who received it and gave a railroad check. This check was handed the passenger by the agent of the Cab Company, who could then proceed on his journey without any further trouble or inconvenience. These privileges of having an office in the depot building and of renting space in the baggage room or elsewhere from the Terminal Company were exclusively enjoyed by the Cab Company. All other persons, whether tendering baggage in person, or through the medium of other transfer companies or draymen, desiring to have baggage checked, were compelled to tender railroad tickets simultaneously with the baggage before their trunks were received in the baggage room, in the same way and manner as when the claim-check system was in force.

The plaintiff insisted that the claim-check system was discontinued because of the decision in the Atlanta Terminal Company Case, supra, and that the claim that exclusive space was rented to the Cab Company was only a subterfuge to avoid the ruling in that case, and thus continue the same discrimination against the public as practiced by the claim-check system; that the inconvenience to the general public in procuring railroad checks for baggage was greater since the change than before; that, when the change was made, the space which had been up to that time used for incoming baggage was used for outgoing baggage and vice versa, and the distance the passenger would have to walk to procure his baggage checked, was greater than it was before, while the patrons of the Cab Company had no further to walk than before, the Cab Company's office being on the way to the train shed. The defendant denied that any such motive prompted the change; and claimed that the Terminal Company, as agent of the railroads, owed no public duty to any person in respect to checking baggage until such person had obtained the right to travel by the purchase of a railroad ticket, and that, when such evidence of the relation of passenger and carrier had been established, everybody was treated alike; that the facilities for serving the public were ample; that space in the baggage room not necessary for this purpose was not impressed with any public use, and was private property, and that it had the right to rent it to the Cab Company if it chose to do so. For similar reasons, the Terminal Company insisted that the claim-check system was legal.

Mr. Justice Little in the Kates Case, 107 Ga. 645, 34 S. E. 375, says: "It is a sound legal principle that a railway company as a common carrier cannot grant to any person or persons, or to any part of the public, rights or privileges which it refuses to others, but must treat all alike. Receiving and discharging baggage is one of the duties of a public passenger carrier." It being the duty of a carrier as such to receive the baggage of those who desire to travel upon its lines, it is its duty, also, to provide suitable and convenient facilities for the reception thereof. Such facilities as it prepares must be furnished without discrimination to all alike who desire to avail themselves of the use of such facilities. This is a public duty. It is not granted as a favor, but may be demanded as a right. The right to have baggage transported by a common carrier is incidental to the right of the owner thereof to be transported. Incidental in the sense that no right to have baggage transported arises unless the owner thereof procures the right of transportation for himself. The price paid for a railroad ticket is the consideration for the right of transportation of both person and baggage, and is equally obligatory upon the carrier.

The price paid for the ticket pays for the transportation of the baggage in the same way that it pays for the transportation of the person. 3 A. & E. Enc. Law, 543; Hutch. Car. (ed. 1906) § 1241; 6 Cyc. 663. A railway company has the right to make and enforce reasonable rules for the conduct of its business. A rule requiring the purchase of a ticket before a parcel is checked for transportation as baggage is a reasonable rule, and a rule requiring that the ticket be exhibited to the proper agent before such checking is done is a reasonable one. It does not follow, however, that, until the relation of passenger and carrier is established by the purchase of a ticket, the railway company owes no public duty to the person desiring to become a passenger. The railway company owes to the person desiring to become a passenger the duty to afford him all necessary and convenient facilities for entering into contractual relations with it. It is the duty of such company, when such rules as above indicated are made, where the only way provided for entering trains by both passengers and baggage is through a depot provided for such purpose, to furnish suitable waiting rooms for the comfort and convenience of passengers after the purchase of tickets, and of prospective passengers before purchase of tickets, to provide suitable and convenient offices where tickets can be purchased, and to provide suitable baggage rooms for the reception of trunks and parcels to be checked for transportation. The person desiring to become a passenger has the right to demand the use of these facilities for the purpose of entering into contractual relations with the carrier for a reasonable time preceding the actual consummation of the contract of carriage. These, being public duties, must be performed by the carrier for every person desiring to use such facilities with fairness and impartiality, and without any discrimination whatever. As to these duties the property of the carrier is impressed with a public use, and no exclusive privileges can be granted by the carrier to any corporation or person in the enjoyment of them or any of them. It is private property only as between the carrier and those of the general public who have no occasion to use it for purposes of transportation. Donovan v. Penn. Co., 199 U. S. 279, 28 Sup. Ct. 91, 50 L. Ed. 192. It is well settled that no hackman can be prevented from driving to the carrier's depot when his hack contains a prospective passenger, because in respect to prospective passengers as well as in respect to those who have perfected the contract of carriage, such property is impressed with a public use. "A passenger upon arriving at the station, in whatever vehicle, is entitled to have such facilities for entering the company's depot as may be necessary." Donovan's Case, 199 U. S. 296, 28 Sup. Ct. 95 [50 L. Ed. 192]. He has the right to enter the depot. He has the right to sit in the waiting room prior to the purchase of a ticket. He has the right, in common with the general public, to the use of any and all facilities provided as preliminary to entering into the actual contract of carriage. The rights he may demand for himself he may demand for such parcels as under the law he has the right to have transported by the carrier as baggage. If a prospective passenger carries his trunk on his shoulder, or in his own private dray, intending presently to enter into contractual relations with the carrier, and presents the same to the baggage master, it is the duty of the baggage master to receive it into the baggage room as a parcel to be subsequently checked as baggage proper. Thus presenting a trunk is notice to the carrier that such person intends in a reasonable time to perfect a contract with the carrier whereby the trunk will be checked as baggage for transportation; or, if the prospective passenger sends his trunk by his servant or by a transfer company, the same duty would arise upon the part of the carrier, and the presentation of such parcel would be notice to the carrier that the owner would appear in a reasonable time and demand that the parcel be checked for transportation. It would be but the first step in using the facilities of the carrier to enter into contractual relations with it for the transportation of himself and baggage. The carrier would have the right to prescribe and enforce such rules as would be reasonable, taking into consideration the custom prevailing among the traveling public, as to how long before the departure of trains such parcels could be thus delivered, in order that congestion in the baggage rooms would be prevented, to provide for the identification of such parcels when railroad checks should be subsequently demanded, and for storage charges similar to those prevailing when incoming baggage is not called for in a reasonable time. This being one of the public duties of the carrier arising from the use of property impressed with a public use, it is a privilege which any person desiring to contract with the carrier has the right to enjoy. It follows that the claim-check system, the use of which was granted exclusively to the Cab Company and denied to everybody else, is a palpable violation of a public duty; the vice in the system as practiced being the reception into the baggage room of the trunks of its patrons prior to the appearance of the owners with railroad tickets, and denying this right to all other persons. The foregoing applies with equal force to the space occupied by the Cab Company in the baggage room of the Terminal Company. Instead of receiving the trunks hauled by the Cab Company into the baggage room along with other trunks, one corner of the baggage room is set apart to the Cab Company's exclusive use, and the trunks hauled by it received into this space. The effect is the same. A passenger carrier cannot thus prefer the Cab Company in the discharge of a duty it owes to all alike.

In the Terminal Company Case, supra, the majority of the court, if they did not decide that the claim-check system as practiced was illegal, at least broadly intimated that it was so. If the claim-check system as practiced be illegal, it is difficult to perceive how the right of storage, as practiced, would be legal. In the case at bar the suit is brought on behalf of passengers and prospective passengers; on behalf of that portion of the public who do not depend on the favor of the transportation companies, but who may demand as a matter of right equal and impartial treatment. The facilities and conveniences enjoyed by that portion of the public patronizing the Cab Company in receiving, storing, and checking baggage, and denied to others, is an unjust discrimination and a violation of the public duties of the railroad companies, whether practiced directly by them or through their chosen agent, the Terminal Company, whether by means of a claim-check system or renting exclusive space in the baggage room. The means by which the discrimination is brought about is not material. It is the discrimination itself that is obnoxious. A common carrier, holding himself out to the public as such, is bound to receive all goods and passengers offered that he is able and accustomed to carry, upon compliance with such reasonable regulations as he may adopt for his own safety and the benefit of the public. Civ. Code 1895, § 2298.

It is insisted in this case that the carrier has adopted a rule which the agent, the Terminal Company, is bound to obey, to the effect that no parcel shall be received into the baggage room unless the same be accompanied by a railroad ticket; that this rule is adopted for its own safety, as well as for the benefit of the public. It is conceded that a rule is reasonable which provides that no parcel shall be checked with a railroad check for transportation before the presentation of a railroad ticket, but it does not follow, because this regulation is reasonable and is for the protection of the carrier, that a regulation refusing admission into the baggage room of any parcel whatever until the transportation is provided would be a reasonable rule either for the protection of the carrier or for the public interest. From a consideration of the method of checking baggage for transportation at the Terminal Station by that portion of the public not patronizing the Cab Company, it is evident that such a rule is not in the interest of the public. Nor is such a rule necessary for the carrier's protection. The argument is stressed that the public would impose upon the railroad and have trunks and other parcels transported when the owner was not a passenger. This could not arise, because, after the package is received in the baggage room, it cannot be checked for transportation until the railroad ticket is presented. If not checked for transportation, then the Terminal Company can collect storage. No reason has been suggested which sustains such a rule being reasonable. See 6 Cyc. 670; Coffee v. L. & N. R. Co., 76 Miss. 569, 25 South. 157, 45 L. R. A. 112, 71 Am. St. Rep. 535.

5. The defendants make the point by demurrer that the suit is brought in the name of the Attorney General, and not in the name of the state; that the Attorney General has no authority to maintain the suit in his name. The suit is brought in the following language: "John C. Hart, as Attorney General of the state of Georgia, in its behalf and by virtue of the authority vested by law in said office, and by an executive order made May —, 1906, avers as follows." Paragraph 39 of the petition: "This suit is instituted by virtue of an executive order made by Honorable Joseph M. Terrell, Governor of Georgia, and on the — day of May, 1906, in pursuance of his authority as the chief executive of the state of Georgia, and in pursuance of the authority vested in Hon. John C. Hart, as the Attorney General of the state of Georgia." The executive order referred to is as follows: "After reading the foregoing petition, it is directed that the Attorney General file appropriate proceedings in the proper courts, in the name of the state, to correct the wrongs to the people complained of." It is urged that this is not the suit of the state, but the suit of the Attorney General; that the only suit that could be brought was in the name of the state by the Attorney General. Atkinson v. Cawley, 112 Ga. 485, 37 S. E. 715, is relied on as authority for this position. In that case the suit was brought by "W. Y. Atkinson, Governor of the state of Georgia, suing for the use of B. S. Calhoun." The court says that this was an effort to bring a suit on behalf of the state under authority of the Governor. If the petition had been in the name of the state of Georgia by and through W. Y. Atkinson, Governor, there would be no doubt that the state would be a party to the case. The Governor had no authority to sue in his own name as an individual, or in his official capacity as Governor for the use of a private citizen, for the simple reason that no cause of action existed in him as an individual or in his official capacity as Governor, and he has no authority to bring such a suit on behalf of an individual interested in the subject-matter of the suit. The court says: "The words, 'suing for the use of B. S. Calhoun,' which follow the words 'Governor,' etc., indicate that the suit is brought for the benefit of Calhoun. As the nominal plaintiff is not the state, but simply W. Y. Atkinson, who neither as an individual nor as a Governor has any authority to bring the action, B. S. Calhoun is to be treated as the real plaintiff in the case. In no view of the matter can the petition be construed as one brought by the state." We apprehend, however, that, if the suit had been brought by W. Y. Atkinson as Governor who sues for and on behalf of the state, the court would have held that the state was the real party, and that, on demurrer, the petition could have been amended. So we think in this case. The Attorney General in his official capacity had the undoubted authority to bring the suit. The declaration shows that he claims no personal interest in it. If he had sued in the name of the state by and through John C. Hart, Attorney General, the state undoubtedly would have been a party. The suit of John C. Hart as Attorney General of the state and in its behalf, and by an authority of an executive order, is substantially a suit by the state. In the case of Dent v. Merriam, 113 Ga. 83, 38 S. E. 334, the court says: "The strict rules of pleading would have required that this suit be brought by Amy Merriam by her next friend, Tamah Dent, instead of by Tamah Dent as next friend of Amy Merriam. This court, however, has frequently held in exactly similar cases that such an irregularity is immaterial, and will not affect the decision of the case. 'The more regular form of pleading is for the minor to sue by the next friend, but, if the next friend sue as next friend to the minor, it is the same in substance.' Lasseter v. Simpson, 78 Ga. 61, 3 S. E. 243; Van Pelt v. Railroad Co., 89 Ga. 706, 15 S. E. 622; Ellington v. Beaver Dam Co., 93 Ga. 55, 19 S. E. 21." In the case of Van Pelt v. Railroad Co., supra, the first headnote is as follows: "Though in suits conducted by a next friend the minor ought regularly to sue by him, yet, if the next friend sue in behalf of the minor, it is the same in substance. The defect is amendable by alleging that the minor sues by next friend." So we hold that the suit as brought is substantially the suit of the state, but that strictly good pleading would require that it should have been in the name of the state by and through John C. Hart as Attorney General. This defect is curable by amendment which the plaintiff can make in the court below.

6. The defendant insists by demurrer that, if any right of action exists under the pleadings and evidence in the case, mandamus and not injunction is the remedy. An injunction can only restrain. It cannot compel a party to perform an act. It may restrain until performance. Civ. Code 1895, § 4922. In the case of Goodrich v. Georgia Railroad Co., 115 Ga. 340, 41 S. E. 659, Mr. Justice Cobb for the court reviews the authorities interpreting the above section of the Code. These principles are deduced therefrom: (a) If the main purpose of the petition is to compel the performance of an act, then, under our Code, injunction cannot be used as a remedy to accomplish this purpose. Under our Code injunction can be used only to restrain. (b) While the court cannot issue a purely mandatory order, the court can grant an injunction, the essential nature of which is to restrain, although in yielding obedience to the restraint the defendant may be incidentally required to perform some act. The cases of Georgia Pacific Ry. Co. v. Douglasville, 75

Ga. 828, Russell v. Mohr-Well Lumber Co., 102 Ga. 563, 29 S. E. 271, Vaughn v. Yawn, 103 Ga. 577, 29 S. E. 759, and Paschal v. Tillman, 105 Ga. 494, 30 S. E. 870, are cited and distinguished, holding that in each of these cases the order complained of, if carried into effect, would have required the party against whom it was issued to perform some affirmative act which was the main and controlling purpose of the order. In the case at bar, as made by the petition, brought by the state for the benefit of the public, injunction is an appropriate remedy, and the exclusive remedy was not by writ of mandamus. See, in this connection, Trust Co. v. State, 109 Ga. 747, 35 S. E. 323, 48 L. R. A. 520.

For reasons stated in the foregoing discussion, the writer is of the opinion that the judge below should have enjoined the defendants from carrying out the contract with the Cab Company, renting to it exclusively space in the baggage room, on the ground that it is an illegal discrimination against the public, and is violative of article 4, § 2, par. 4, of the Constitution. The opinion of the majority being as expressed in the headnotes, the judgment of the court below will be affirmed.

Five Justices concur.

FREEMAN, J., dissents.

FREEDMAN, J., designated to preside in place of the CHIEF JUSTICE, whose absence is due to providential cause.

ATKINSON, J. (specially concurring). In my opinion the right of the defendant to rent space in its baggage room to another for the purpose of enabling the tenant to carry on therein the business of storing trunks and other parcels preparatory to checking them as baggage rests upon the same principle as the right of the defendant to grant to another the exclusive use of the "claim-check" system. Concerning that question, my views are fully expressed in the report of the case of Atlanta Terminal Company v. American Baggage Co., 125 Ga. 677, 54 S. E. 71. In the present case there is a slight conflict of evidence as to whether there was not a discrimination in favor of the Atlanta Baggage & Cab Company in the matter of checking trunks as baggage after passenger relations had been established by purchasers of tickets. For example, the evidence offered generally by the defendant tended to show that there was no such discrimination, while the testimony of Mrs. Robertson indicates that, after the purchase of a ticket by one not a patron of said Atlanta Baggage & Cab Company, the purchaser of the ticket was not then afforded an equal opportunity with patrons of the Atlanta Baggage & Cab Company for identifying and checking trunks. It may be that the example cited was illustrative of a general custom of discrimination after the passenger relation had been established. As to whether it was or not, and, if so, whether in fact the complaint was well founded, presented questions of fact for determination by the chancellor. Aside from these questions, I do not see from the evidence any other question of fact involved in the case. The other questions are purely of law, and are such as to enable me to agree with the majority in the conclusion that the court did not commit error by refusing to grant the injunction.

AMERICUS GROCERY CO. v. RONEY.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—BREACH.

If a merchant employed a traveling salesman for a year at a fixed salary, and during the continuance of the term sought to change the contract by substituting a percentage on sales in lieu of a definite salary, and if, upon refusal of the employé to make the change, the employer declined to proceed with the contract or continue the employment, except upon condition that such change should be accepted, and thereby the salesman was prevented from further performance of the contract, this amounted to a breach of the contract on the part of the employer, which would authorize a recovery by the employé.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 7.]

2. SAME—EVIDENCE.

The evidence was sufficient to authorize the verdict, and there was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Action by J. C. Roney against the Americus Grocery Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Shipp & Sheppard, for plaintiff in error. Allen Fort & Sons, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. Roney sued the Americus Grocery Company, claiming that he had been employed for a year at a fixed salary, but had been discharged during the year without lawful cause. He recovered a verdict. The defendant moved for a new trial. It was refused, and the defendant excepted.

If the plaintiff's evidence was true, he was employed for a year at a fixed salary. Before the time had expired, his employer desired to change the contract, so that he should work for a commission, instead of at a certain salary. He was unwilling to do this; and the employer would not allow him to work further under the contract made, unless he would accept a commission in lieu of a salary. He offered to continue work under the original contract, but the employer would not permit this. There was some conflict in the evidence, but two telegrams sent by the defendant to the plaintiff while he was traveling for it quite strongly support his contention. On December 30, 1900, he wrote to the defendant company a letter in which he said: "My contract expires with you on August 15, 1901. I will continue to work on salary until that time." On the next day the defendant telegraphed to him as follows: "None of our employees have any time contracts. The proposition made best can do. Answer whether satisfactory or not." To this he replied by telegram: "My letter of yesterday is my answer to your telegram." The defendant responded: "Our telegram final so far as we are concerned." If an employer has a contract with his employé for a definite time at a fixed salary, he has no legal right during the term to demand of the employé that the latter shall release him from the contract as made, and accept a commission upon goods sold in lieu of a salary agreed upon. If the employé complies with his contract, he has a right to insist that the employer shall do likewise. He is not compelled to accede to a proposed change in it. If the employer declines to proceed with the contract unless the change is made, in spite of the refusal of the employé to make it, this is a breach of a contract on the part of the employer. Such a case is made by the plaintiff's evidence; and, while there was some conflict, the issue was determined by the jury in his favor.

It was contended that, if the plaintiff had accepted employment on a commission, he would have made earnings, and that this would have diminished his damages, if it would not have prevented any from accruing, and that it is the duty of an employé, if he be discharged, to mitigate the damages by earning what he can during the term of the employment. Had he agreed to the change, he would have had no right of action at all, whether he was damaged or not. The law will not put him between two horns of a dilemma by saying to him: "If you agree to accept commissions in lieu of a salary, you have no right of action, because there will be a mutual alteration of the original contract. If you decline to agree to the proposed change, it can be urged against you that you might have earned as much as under your contract, or at least something. In the one event, you cannot recover at all. In the other your recovery must be diminished by what you might have made as a commission." This would be equivalent to saying to the plaintiff that he must give up his right of action entirely, in order to try to prevent damages accruing from the breach of the contract. The law does not impose such a condition upon a contracting party who insists upon his contract. He is not required to yield the whole right in order to diminish the damages in part.

The evidence authorized the charge to which exception was taken, and also the finding of the jury.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

WITHAM v. STEWART, Tax Collector.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 10, 1907.)

1. LICENSES—TAX ON BANK PRESIDENTS—LIABILITY.

Section 2, par. 2, of the act of the General Assembly, approved December 16, 1902 (Act 1902, p. 20), provides that a "specific tax" of $10 for each of the fiscal years 1903 and 1904 shall be levied upon the presidents of each of the express, telegraph, steamboat, railroad, street railroad, telephone, electric light, sleeping and palace-car companies, banks, building and loan associations, and gas companies doing business in this state." Held, that under the provisions of said act, where it appears that the same person is the president of two or more banks, a tax of $10 may be collected from such person for each bank of which he is president. It appearing in the present case that the plaintiff in error was the president of several banks doing business in this state, he was liable to be taxed in the amount specified in the above act for each bank of which he was the president.

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAWS.

The tax in question is not repugnant to paragraph 1, § 2, art. 7, of the Constitution of this state; nor is such tax obnoxious to the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution, as denying to any person "the equal protection of the laws." Singer Mfg. Co. v. Wright, 25 S. E. 249, 97 Ga. 114, 35 L. R. A. 497.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Licenses, §§ 8, 9; vol. 9, Constitutional Law, § 269.]

3. LICENSES—COLLECTION OF TAX.

It appearing that the president of the banks, from whom the taxes were sought to be collected, was a resident of Fulton county, it was proper for the tax collector of that county to collect the amount due by the said president as taxes under the provisions of the act above referred to; and the court did not err in refusing to enjoin the collection of the same.

SPENCE v. SOLOMONS CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1907.)

RECEIVERS—FUNDS IN RECEIVER'S HANDS—RIGHTS OF CREDITOR OF CLAIMANT—IMPOUNDING FUND.

Where money is held by a receiver in a court of equity, which by decree is payable to the plaintiff, it is erroneous for the chancellor, upon application of a general creditor of such plaintiff who has no lien by judgment or otherwise, nor any interest in the fund, either legal or equitable, to order the same held by the receiver until such creditor can institute and prosecute a suit for the recovery of a judgment.

Error from Superior Court, Mitchell County; L. J. Hopmayer, Judge pro hac.

Action by J. M. Spence against Perry's Pharmacy. Solomons Company and others intervened. From the judgment, J. M. Spence brings error. Reversed.

J. M. Spence instituted suit against Perry's Pharmacy, a corporation, for the purpose of foreclosing a mortgage in equity. A receiver was appointed. Solomons Company and numerous other persons intervened. Solomons Company intervened specially and sought affirmative relief against Spence, the plaintiff, and alleged the following: "(1) That to the October term, 1905, of this honorable court, there was filed a petition by J. M. Spence against Perry's Pharmacy, a corporation within the jurisdiction of said court, brought for the purpose of foreclosing in equity a certain mortgage executed by said Perry's Pharmacy to said J. M. Spence on or about the 17th day of October, 1904, to secure a note of like date for the sum of $4,200, due six months after the date thereof. That under said petition this court appointed T. B. Perry receiver of the assets of the defendant mortgagor, who, under the order of this court, sold the assets of said defendant which were covered by said mortgage, realizing therefrom the sum of $3,100, or other large sum. (2) That there is now in the hands of the receiver in said cause the said sum of money, less any disbursements for expenses which said receiver may have legally paid out under order of this court, which said sum is for disbursement as this court may order in the final decree to be entered herein. (3) That your petitioner is the holder of three certain promissory notes, aggregating the principal sum of $1,658.95, besides interest and protest fees, which said notes are as follows: One for the sum of $858.95, dated January 18, 1905, due on June 15, 1905, signed by Perry's Pharmacy and indorsed by B. Perry, T. B. Twitty, and J. M. Spence, and bearing interest from maturity at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. Said note was protested for nonpayment at the cost of $1.50, paid by your petitioner. A copy of said note is hereto attached as part hereof, marked 'Exhibit A,' to which reference is hereby made for the particulars thereof. Two of said notes are for the sum, respectively, of $500 each, dated January 23, 1905, signed by M. V. Robbins and D. V. Thompson, who also sign by their firm names, Thompson & Robbins Drug Company, and bearing interest from January 17, 1905, at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. Each of said notes was duly protested for nonpayment at a total cost of $3 paid by your petitioner. Copies of said two notes are hereto attached as part hereof, marked 'Exhibit B,' to which reference is made for the particulars thereof. (4) Your petitioner further shows that by reason of the liability to it by J. M. Spence, in virtue of his indorsement notes and his failure to pay same, it has an interest in the fund now in the custody, through its officer and receiver, to the extent of the amounts due upon said notes, to wit, the principal, interest, and protest fees. (5) Your petitioner further shows that under the laws of this state it is not permitted to garnish the receiver, and avers that, unless allowed to intervene in this cause on its own behalf for the purpose of the fund in court, should the said plaintiff recover in his action subjecting to the payment of its debt against the said J. M. Spence, to wit, the amount of the principal, interest, and protest fees of said three notes, by reason of his liability thereon as indorser, it apprehends that said amounts or some part thereof will be lost to it, for the reason that, so far as it is informed and believes, the said J. M. Spence has no tangible property out of which your petitioner could collect the amounts due to it by the said J. M. Spence, as aforesaid, by the ordinary process of suit, judgment, and execution. (6) That by virtue of his said indorsement on the notes above set forth the said J. M. Spence is indebted to your petitioner in the principal sum of $1,658.95, the further sum of $4.50, protest fees and interest on said principal sum from March 17, 1905, that being the average interest date, at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum." The intervention originally contained a prayer for judgment against Spence, but this prayer by amendment was stricken, and in lieu thereof the following was substituted: "Intervenors pray that in the event that it shall be decreed by the court that the mortgage sought to be foreclosed by J. M. Spence is a valid and binding instrument, and that the said J. M. Spence shall recover of the defendant, Perry's Pharmacy, thereon, that then and in this event that the receiver of this honorable court be decreed to hold up and retain in his custody out of any moneys in his hands to which the said mortgagee may be entitled, or the same may be otherwise impounded by this honorable court or a sufficiency of said funds to pay off in full the notes due to this intervenor as shown in their original intervention, as same may be ascertained and fixed in an action at law between this intervenor and the said J. M. Spence." Spence did not file an answer to the intervention, but demurred, among others, upon the ground that the intervention "does not show any right, either in law or in equity, why the relief prayed for should be granted." The court overruled the demurrer, and, after hearing evidence, passed the following order: "After hearing the evidence in said intervention and after argument of counsel, it being made to appear to the court from the sworn allegations contained in the petition and intervention of Solomons Company, filed in this court in the cause above stated, and from the evidence introduced, that the plaintiff and mortgagee, J. M. Spence, is indebted to Solomons Company in the sum of (principal) one thousand six hundred and fifty-eight dollars and ninety-five cents, besides protest fees and interest as indorser on three certain nego-

table promissory notes, and it appearing that said indorser is insolvent, and that, therefore, said Solomons Company will be unable to compel payment of said debt by said indorser, and it further appearing to the court that there is now in the hands of T. B. Perry, as receiver of this court in said cause, a sum of money decreed to be paid by said receiver to the said J. M. Spence, on the mortgage foreclosure as above stated, upon the prayers of the petition and intervention of said Solomons Company that a sufficient sum in the hands of said receiver be withheld by said court and impounded to await the judgment that may be hereafter rendered between the intervenors and said J. M. Spence in an action against said J. M. Spence by said intervenors, until the further order of the court; and it further appearing to the court, sitting as a court of equity, that said intervenors are without an adequate remedy in a court of law to reach said funds in the hands of the receiver of this court, by garnishment or otherwise, so as to subject same to any judgment that may hereafter obtain against the said J. M. Spence in said suit to be hereafter brought, it is ordered and decreed by the court that the receiver of this court in the above-stated case, T. B. Perry, shall retain from the said funds in his hands belonging to and decreed to be paid by him to said J. M. Spence the sum of nineteen hundred dollars, to await the further order of this court in the premises, provided that this judgment and decree shall have effect only if the said intervenors, Solomons Company, within thirty days from date, file with the clerk of the superior court of Mitchell county a bond with good and solvent security to be approved by the clerk in the sum of one thousand dollars, payable to J. M. Spence, and conditioned to pay said Spence any damages and costs he may sustain by reason of the foregoing money being held up, in the event of failure of said intervenor to recover against said J. M. Spence in the suit aforesaid to be hereinafter instituted and brought within 60 days from date." Spence excepted, assigning error on the judgment overruling the demurrer, and upon the impounding of the money.

M. E. Cox and A. G. Powell, for plaintiff in error. Jacob Gazan, Theo. Titus, D. F. Crosland, R. J. Bacon, Jr., and B. B. Lane, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. Solomons Company found the money of Spence in the hands of a receiver in the court of equity, and sought to impound it. To accomplish that object, averring that garnishment was not the remedy, the aid of equity and the application of equitable remedies were sought. The relief prayed is not against the defendant whom Spence was suing, but against Spence. It is independent and in no way germane to the relief which Spence was seeking against Perry's Pharmacy. It was unnecessary to call the proceeding an intervention. It is a proper case. Solomons Company could, of course, by equitable remedy, impound the money found in the hands of a receiver or in the hands of the defendant, or in the hands of any private individual. See, in this connection, Field v. Jones, 11 Ga. 418; Baker v. Gladden, 72 Ga. 400. But in the case at bar, and in any other case where resort is had to equitable remedies, it is incumbent upon the intervenor to allege such facts as under equitable principles would have authorized a court of equity to grant the relief. The relief sought is in its nature not less harsh than the writ of injunction or the appointment of a receiver. It is an attempt to limit the power of control by Spence of money which rightfully belonged to him and to which he was then entitled to possession. Does the plaintiff allege such facts as in equity would justify such a harsh remedy? In an ordinary garnishment case, it would be required to institute an attachment suit, or a common-law suit seeking a lien, and in either case they would be required to execute an approved statutory bond in double the amount of the debt claimed to be due before they could impound the fund. Solomons Company has not done even this. Yet it is asking the interposition of an equitable remedy. Equity sometimes requires more, but never less, than the law exacts for the grant of particular relief.

It sufficiently appears from the allegations of their intervention that at best the intervenor is no more than a general creditor of Spence without any lien, either by judgment or otherwise, and without interest, legal or equitable, in the fund sought to be impounded. Without lien or interest, either legal or equitable, we can see no theory, under the allegations of the intervention, by which, under equitable principles, it could impound the money. See, in this connection, Peyton v. Lamar, 42 Ga. 131, and citations; Scott v. Jones, 74 Ga. 702 (4); Gulmartin v. Railway Co., 101 Ga. 569, 29 S. E. 189, and citations; *McKenzie v. (Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 10, 1907.)

INJUNCTION—RAILROAD SPUR TRACKS—CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION.

Under the facts and pleadings in the record, the court did not err in refusing the injunction.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Glynn County; T. A. Parker, Judge.

Action by the Atlantic & Birmingham Railway Company against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From an order refusing an injunction, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The Atlantic & Birmingham Railway Company filed a petition for injunction against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, seeking to restrain the defendant from constructing and maintaining a spur track leading from the defendant's main line of track on A street in the city of Brunswick to the planing mill of Noble & Parker, which spur track would cross plaintiff's main line on A street. It appears from the petition that the defendant's track had been laid and was in operation along A street at the time the petitioner acquired the right to lay its track parallel to defendant's line on the east side of said street; and, in order to construct plaintiff's track along A street, it was necessary to remove defendant's line to the westward of its then existing location. At and prior to this time the defendant was maintaining a spur track extending from its main line eastward to the premises of the Standard Oil Company, and another spur track leading from its main line eastward to the mill of Noble & Parker. On October 21, 1905, plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract, the material portions of which are as follows: "The Birmingham Co. [plaintiff], desiring to extend its main line of track * * * along the east side of A street, * * * has made application unto the Atlantic Co. [defendant] to make such changes in the location of the tracks of the Atlantic Co. * * * by moving the same westward, as will enable the Birmingham Co. to lay its tracks along A street without encroaching upon private property, and the Birmingham Co. has requested the Atlantic Co. to waive its objections to the location of its [the Birmingham Company's] tracks, * * * offering as a consideration unto the Atlantic Co., for the change of its tracks it will have to make between L and C streets on A street, that it [the Birmingham Company] will bear all expenses occasioned by such change of tracks of the Atlantic Co. * * * and the Birmingham Co. further offering the Atlantic Co., as a consideration for the Atlantic Co. not pressing its objections to the extension, * * * to save and hold harmless, as hereinafter provided, the Atlantic Co. from any injury which may arise unto the Union Passenger Station property of the Atlantic Co. Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and of the covenants hereinafter contained on behalf of the Birmingham Co. running unto the Atlantic Co., the first and second parties have covenanted and agreed to and with each other as follows:" The first stipulation provides that the Birmingham Company shall "so drain F street in the vicinity of the Union Passenger Station property as that the storm and other water, which by the change of grade occasioned by the construction of the proposed tracks of the Birmingham Co., would otherwise flow upon said property, shall be carried off, * * * so as not to drain into or accumulate upon the said Union Passenger Station property." The second stipulation provides that the Birmingham Company shall bear the expense of removing the tracks of the Atlantic Company to the west side of A street. The third and fourth provisions of the contract are as follows: "It is also understood and agreed that the second party shall construct, at the expense of the first party, a safe and proper rigid crossing over and across the side track of the second party leading from its proposed main line on A street to the property of the Standard Oil Co., so that the second party shall have hereafter, as now, permanent sidetrack connection into the property of the Standard Oil Co., for the benefit of said second party. It is further agreed that the map, or blueprint, hereto attached, identified by the signature of the presidents of the respective parties to this contract, delineates the correct profile, location, and character of work to be done, and shall, where not otherwise herein specifically provided, govern in the doing of the things by the parties hereto agreed to be done and performed." The blueprint above referred to does not show the location of the Noble & Parker planing mill, nor the spur track leading thereto. In its answer the defendant alleged that it had maintained a spur track connecting its main line with the Noble & Parker planing mill for four years prior to the execution of the above contract with the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff in the construction of its own line removed defendant's said spur track without defendant's knowledge or consent, "and since then defendant has been unable to deliver to and receive freight from said planing mill, * * * and said spur track cannot be replaced without laying same across plaintiff's track, as defendant has the right to do and was undertaking to do when the restraining order was granted in this cause." At the hearing the court passed an order denying the injunction prayed for, and dissolving the temporary restraining order previously granted. The plaintiff excepted.

Croratt & Whitfield and Rosser & Brandon, for plaintiff in error. Bennet & Conyers, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts). The contention of the plaintiff is that the contract shows the unqualified intention of the parties to establish the new condition, and nothing else, upon a street, prescribed by the contract and by the blueprint attached to it, as a part of it, that they show that the Standard Oil crossing and side track were to be retained as a part of the new condition, and show and provide for no other crossing or side track. If another existed prior to the making of the contract and was intended to be retained under the new condition, then the contract would have so provided; there being no contention that such a provision for the Noble & Parker crossing and side track was omitted from the contract by fraud, accident, or mistake, or at all. And it is further contended that the intention of the parties to the contract, as appears by the recitals therein, was to provide for the relocation of the main line track of the defendant upon A street by removing it to a point westward of its then location, so as to permit the entry upon that street of another railroad, namely, that of the plaintiff, and the laying of its tracks and the operation of its trains along the eastern side of said street, and one thing more, to wit, the maintenance, under the changed conditions, of the connecting line then existing between the track of the defendant and the premises of the Standard Oil Company so far as the contract speaks the intention of the parties.

The weakness of the argument submitted to sustain the contentions of the plaintiff consists in the fact that the contract does not purport to deal generally with the subject of side or spur tracks leading into or connecting with the main line of the defendant company. It deals only with the side tracks or side track, the crossing of which over the line of plaintiff's road should be constructed at the expense of the latter. Had the contract provided that the defendants should have a spur track leading to its main line from the Standard Oil plant, generally and without reference to the question as to the party upon whom the cost would fall of constructing the crossing at the point where such spur track intersected the plaintiff's line, then the contract would have dealt with a class in the sense that would have rendered applicable the rule invoked by the plaintiffs, that "the express mention of one act, contention, stipulation, class or number, person or place implies the exclusion of another or others not mentioned. The maxim restrains what is implied by what is expressed; what is general, by what is particular and specific." Except as to the crossing of plaintiff's road by the spur track, when the expense of constructing and maintaining a rigid crossing was, by the terms of the contract, imposed upon the plaintiff, the right of the defendant company to have and maintain other spur tracks then in existence across A street, as they existed at the time the contract was signed, is not controlled nor affected by it. The court could well have decided, under the pleadings and facts in this record, that the undertaking, as set forth in this contract, upon the part of the defendant, was gratuitous, in which case it should not, by the application of the highly technical rule of construction, have imported into the contract terms which are not expressly written there, and which are not necessarily implied from what is found in the face of that instrument. And apparently, from the pleadings and the evidence, the defendant here, as a matter of favor, gratuitously consented to a change in the location of its road so that plaintiff's track might be laid along the street in which defendant's track was already located. And, unless constrained thereto by the terms of the contract bestowing this apparent gratuity, we will not read into the contract terms by which there will be imposed upon the party bestowing the favor the hardship of losing the right to maintain spur tracks to its main line which has been in existence and use for years.

Error from Superior Court, Echols County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by Joseph Wetherington against G. S. Baxter & Co. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Toomer & Reynolds, for plaintiff in error. R. G. Tison, Wilcox & Patterson, and Crawford & Wilcox, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. The action was trespass to recover damages for cutting timber on lot No. 462 in the thirteenth district of originally Appling, now Echols, county. The plaintiff relied upon a prescriptive title to prove his ownership of the land. The sole question presented by the record is whether, under the evidence, the plaintiff established a good prescriptive title. The abstract attached to the petition set out a grant from the state to H. Torrence, and mesne conveyances from the grantee to the plaintiff. The last conveyance was from G. M. English to the plaintiff, dated February 6, 1883, and recorded June 22, 1887. It was agreed that the land was originally granted to H. Torrence. The plaintiff tendered in evidence, and the court admitted as color of title only, the deeds referred to in the plaintiff's abstract, purporting to convey the premises in question from Torrence to the plaintiff. It was shown for the plaintiff that in 1883 G. M. English conveyed lot No. 462 for the consideration of $30. At the same time he sold other land; the consideration being $900. The latter transaction included two lots, Nos. 501 and 502, which adjoined lot No. 462. At the time of the sale English resided on lot No. 501, and cultivated a farm of 118 acres, about 3 or 4 acres of which were in the southwest corner of lot No. 462. This farm had been cultivated continuously for 15 years prior to 1883, and since that time has been in continuous cultivation by the plaintiff, who went into possession of the lot purchased from English. There were no houses on lot No. 462 at the time of the purchase from English, except some corncribs, which were either near or on the line of lot No. 462. All of the plaintiff's farm cultivated by him was situated on lots Nos. 501 and 502, except a small triangular portion situated in the southwest corner of lot No. 462. The plaintiff when he bought lot No. 462 believed he was getting a genuine title. He placed his deed on record, returned it for taxes, and has used from the entire lot 462 needful timber for plantation purposes. About 10 years before the institution of the suit, the plaintiff leased the turpentine privileges, and the lessees boxed and worked the timber on the entire tract for three successive years; no objection being raised by any one as to his right to have the timber worked for turpentine. Since 1883 the plaintiff has continuously cultivated the three or four acres of land which were situated in the southwest corner of lot 462. He purchased lot 462 on the same day he purchased lots 501 and 502, but took a separate deed to 462. There is a public schoolhouse on lot 462, about 100 or 200 yards from the lot line, which was built by the plaintiff with the help of his neighbors.

This school is under the control of a board of trustees.

The possession of an occupant of land under a deed extends to the boundaries defined in his deed, if the possession of a part of the land is of such a character as to put the world on notice that he is adversely claiming the part of which he is in actual possession. It is not the policy of the law to permit the true owner of the land to be dispossessed by equivocal possession. But, if the occupant's possession be of such a character as to announce to the world and to the true owner his assertion of ownership, and that possession is under a duly recorded deed, it will be construed to extend to all the contiguous property embraced therein, and after seven years will give a title by prescription. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3686, 3687, 3689. The plaintiff's cultivation, for 18 years after his purchase, of a triangular portion of lot 462 in the southwest corner, when aided by his leasing the timber on the entire tract during the eighth, ninth, and tenth years after his purchase, and the boxing and working of the timber for turpentine, were such positive acts that no one could misunderstand his assertion of ownership of the entire lot No. 462. At all events, the character of the plaintiff's possession as developed by proof was sufficient to authorize the jury to find that it was so open, notorious, and adverse as to put the true owner on notice of the intention of the occupant to claim the entire lot. In Ferguson v. Bagley, 95 Ga. 516, 20 S. E. 241, it was said that "the rule of the Code, * * * that actual possession of a part of a tract of land by one having paper title to the whole extends by construction over the whole tract, is satisfied where a bona fide purchaser for value, after taking a conveyance, incloses even as small a portion as 1 acre of a lot containing 400 acres, adds to it half an acre in the following year, and in that year cultivates the whole inclosure, then, in subsequent years, builds upon the tract and otherwise improves it, maintaining his possession openly and notoriously under a claim of right until the full term of seven years has expired from the date of completing his first inclosure." The character of the plaintiff's possession in the case now before this court differs essentially from that involved in the cases of Royall v. Lisle, 15 Ga. 545, 60 Am. Dec. 712, and Carrol v. Gillion, 33 Ga. 539. In the Royall Case the possession was of an acre and a quarter of land on the adjoining lot, used sometimes as a cow pen and sometimes for cultivation. The prescriber also cut logs for a house from this land. The court held that this possession was so clandestine that the true owner was not put on notice that the possessor was intending an assertion of the title to the entire lot. In the Carrol Case the possession relied on for prescription consisted of a narrow strip of land 15 feet in width, extending half across a lot which he had cultivated for a number of years as a part of a plantation lying mainly on an adjoining lot. There were no buildings on the land; neither was there any assertion of possession beyond the narrow strip which was cultivated along with his other lands. This kind of possession was of such an equivocal nature that the true owner might naturally infer that there was no intention to cross his line and cultivate his land. In the case in hand, not only was the actual possession of the triangular portion of three or four acres for 18 years, but soon after the plaintiff purchased he, through a lessee, boxed the timber over the whole lot for turpentine purposes. For more than seven years after this occurrence the plaintiff's possession was not disturbed. Surely the cutting and boxing of the trees for turpentine over the entire tract would be notice that the plaintiff's possession of the small area in actual cultivation was not under the belief that it was not included in lot No. 462, but, on the contrary, that such possession was an assertion of claim of ownership to the whole of lot 462. The jury found that the plaintiff had a good prescriptive title, based upon seven years' possession under color. The trial court refused to disturb the verdict, and we think the evidence is sufficient to sustain the jury's finding.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Bill by A. D. Brockhan against Henry Hirsch and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The plaintiff, Brockhan, filed a bill in Fulton superior court against Hirsch and Nelms, sheriff, seeking to set aside the sale of certain lands made by said sheriff under executions in favor of said Hirsch; the lands being purchased by the last-named defendant. The material allegations of plaintiff's petition are as follows: Petitioner executed to M. & J. Hirsch a mortgage on certain described lands, consisting of a tract containing 91.6 acres in the Fourteenth district of Fulton county, and also an undivided half interest in a lot in the city of Atlanta, fronting 92 feet on Ivy street. Said mortgage was afterwards transferred to defendant Hirsch, and foreclosed by him on all of said lands September 25, 1899, for $7,225.40, principal and interest. On November, 1899, a certain execution in favor of one Koch was levied on the said lands in the Fourteenth district of Fulton county, which had been previously mortgaged to Hirsch, and also on a lot fronting on Ivy street, not included in the Hirsch mortgage. The last-mentioned execution in favor of Koch was thereafter transferred to Hirsch, and certain tax executions, amounting to about $1,780, against the said Ivy street lot, which had been levied upon by the said Koch, were also transferred to defendant Hirsch. In December, 1900, the Ivy street lot was sold by Hirsch under the Koch fi. fa., and purchased by said Hirsch, for $3,800, a part of which sum was applied to the payment of said tax executions against said land, and not credited on the said fi. fa., which petitioner alleged was a wrongful application of that part of the funds arising from the sale of the lands. In March, 1901, the other lot fronting 92 feet on Ivy street was sold under the Koch fi. fa., and bought by Hirsch for the sum of $7,200. It is charged in the petition that, at the time the last-mentioned lot on Ivy street was being sold by the sheriff, "there was a large crowd of about 100 persons assembled in front of the courthouse and around 4 other auctioneers who were conducting auction sales there, and making a great noise and uproar," and "petitioner further shows that after said sheriff had read the advertisement for the sale of your petitioner's said property, and before bidding began the attorney for said Hirsch spoke up and said in a loud, commanding voice: 'Give notice that whoever buys this property must pay for it before 2 o'clock, or it will be resold.' * * * And said sheriff gave said notice." And petitioner charges that this notice was given for the purpose of preventing bidding and to depress the sale, and that it did prevent bidding and depress the sale, and that "on account of said noise and uproar, and the unwarrantable interference of said Hirsch's attorney, the said Hirsch was enabled to buy petitioner's land * * * for the low price of $7,200, which was less than half its value." Substantially the same complaint is made in regard to noise and confusion which prevailed at the time the 91.6 acres in the Fourteenth district was exposed for sale; and petitioner contends that said noise and confusion depressed the bidding and caused the land to bring less than its true value. She further complains that the Koch fi. fa. was levied upon the 91.6 acres in the Fourteenth district, and also upon the two lots fronting on Ivy street, and that, although only one of the Ivy street lots was sold under said fi. fa., the sheriff made an entry thereon, reciting that "the property described in the attached levy" was sold, and petitioner alleges that this entry and record, the same being recorded in the book of deeds in the clerk's office, "was a great wrong to her, * * * because it prevented bidders from attending the sales and prevented bidding" when the other lots on Ivy street and the land in the Fourteenth district were offered for sale. The defendants denied that any fraud had been practiced upon the petitioner in the manner of conducting said sales, and alleged that she was present during the sale of her property, and made no request of the sheriff to put a stop to the noise and disorder, or to suspend the sale until quiet was restored, that she consented to the application of part of the proceeds of the first sale to the payment of the tax fi. fas., and was not damaged by the erroneous entry of the sheriff on the execution above referred to. At the conclusion of the testimony, the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff excepted.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above). On the controlling issues of the case, there was no material conflict in the evidence, and that submitted would have authorized no other verdict than the one which the trial judge directed in favor of the defendant.

Complaint is made of the appropriation of part of the proceeds of the first sale to the payment of tax fi. fas., which had been issued against the plaintiff, and which had been transferred to Hirsch upon his payment of the amount due upon them. It may be true that, as a strict matter of law, the holder of the tax fi. fas. might not have a right to claim any part of the funds produced by this sale, and that the land would not have been freed from the lien of those tax fi. fas., but, conceding this, the plaintiff in error can derive no advantage from it in this case, for it is affirmatively shown by uncontroverted testimony that this application of the proceeds of the sale referred to was made with the plaintiff's consent. Mr. Hopkins, who made the agreement with the defendant's counsel for this application of such parts of the proceeds as might be necessary to pay the tax fi. fas., testified to the fact of the agreement, and that in this matter he was representing Miss Brockhan, and the truth of this testimony is nowhere denied. On the contrary, it was corroborated by a distinct admission in one paragraph of plaintiff's petition as originally filed. This paragraph was stricken by amendment, but was introduced in evidence by defendant, and is in the following language: "Your petitioner, through her attorney at law, in a spirit of liberality toward said Henry Hirsch, seeing he was determined to so apply said money, allowed $1,780.55 of said purchase money to be applied to the payment of said tax executions."

Touching the second ground of alleged fraud relating to the erroneous entry by the sheriff, that the entire property described in the levy had been sold, when, in fact, only one piece had been sold, it might be said that there is nothing in the evidence to suggest that this was done with fraudulent intent, and the entire evidence upon this subject strongly negatives the existence of such an intent. And, besides this, there is no testimony coming from any witness to show that the slightest harm resulted to Miss Brockhan from the making of this entry, as it does not appear that any prospective purchaser or any one else saw or was influenced by this erroneous entry.

The third ground upon which the charge of fraud is predicated relates to the announcement, at the sale of the property fronting 92 feet on Ivy street, that a sale would be made at 2 o'clock if the bids were not paid. This ground is without merit, because there was nothing in the announcement or conduct of the sheriff which was illegal, as he had a right under the law to give notice of a resale in case of a failure of the bidders to pay the amount of the bid by a reasonable hour on the day of the sale. Civ. Code 1895, § 5466; Suttles v. Sewell, 109 Ga. 707, 35 S. E. 224. It is not insisted that the time fixed was in any way unreasonable; and we cannot see that the fact of this announcement having been made at the suggestion of counsel for Hirsch could have had the effect of making any act illegal if otherwise unexceptionable, unless it was made to appear that some harm resulted to the party whose property was being offered for sale, and no testimony was introduced to show that harm did result or could have resulted.

The next ground of fraud is the alleged inadequacy of the price for which the property therein referred to was sold, and the noise and confusion existing in front of the courthouse at the time of the sale. Here, again, there is a total lack of evidence which would have authorized the jury upon this issue to have made a finding contrary to that directed by the court. That there was considerable noise and confusion, and probably more than should have been tolerated by the sheriff, appears to be shown by the testimony in the record. But whether or not this had an injurious effect upon the sale is purely speculative. Besides, the complainant in this case was present at the sale, and made no objection to proceeding with the same at that time. Had she made a request of the sheriff to restore order and quiet, or had she made objection to the sale proceeding under the surroundings as they existed at that time, and then in case the sheriff had failed either to take steps to put a stop to the disorder and confusion prevailing, or to suspend the sale until the noise and confusion had ceased, she might have had good grounds for objecting to the consummation of the sale; and, if her request and objection had been disregarded, there might have been valid grounds for setting aside the sale; at least a question would have been raised, under the pleadings setting up those facts, for determination by a jury, as to whether or not she had been harmed. But, in order to take advantage of those grounds, she should have acted promptly. Having failed to act in limine, and waited until this late day, she could not prevail in this action upon this ground without introducing evidence showing that she was harmed by the sale having taken place under the circumstances narrated in her petition.

No material error appearing to have been committed by the trial judge in the conduct of the case, the judgment directing a verdict is affirmed. All the Justices concur.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. BROUGHTON.

1. DAMAGES—PERSONAL INJURIES—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where in a suit based upon an alleged tort, resulting in personal injuries to the plaintiff, damages are claimed for lost time, expenses for medical and surgical treatment, permanent diminution in earning capacity caused by the physical injuries received, and mental and physical pain and suffering caused by such injuries, it is erroneous to charge the jury the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 3907, relative to suits for torts wherein the entire injury alleged is to the peace, happiness, or feelings of the plaintiff.

2. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

When there is no evidence upon which a recovery for a particular element of alleged damages could lawfully be based, the judge should not submit to the jury the question of the plaintiff's right to recover for such element of damages.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Telfair County: J. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by M. P. Broughton against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

De Lacy & Bishop, for plaintiff in error. Eschol Graham and H. D. D. Twiggs, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. Missouri P. Broughton sued the Southern Railway Company for damages for alleged personal injuries claimed to have been sustained by falling, at night, in the dark, over the tongue of a truck on the platform of defendant's depot, where she had gone to purchase a ticket. She recovered a verdict for $3,000, and the case is in this court for review, on exceptions to the overruling of defendant's motion for a new trial.

1. The damages claimed by plaintiff were for lost time, mental and physical pain, expenses for medical attention, and punitive damages. In instructing the jury the court read from Civ. Code 1895, § 3907, as follows: "In some torts the entire injury is to the peace, happiness or feelings of the plaintiff; in such cases no measure of damages can be prescribed, except the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors. The worldly circumstances of the parties, the amount of bad faith in the transaction, and all the attendant facts should be weighed." Error was assigned in the motion for a new trial on this charge. Clearly the exception was well taken, as the exact point has been several times ruled by this court in accordance with this assignment of error. In Atlantic & Birmingham Railway Company v. Bowen, 125 Ga. 460, 54 S. E. 105, it was held: "In an action against a railroad company, where the plaintiff sues for the value of lost time, physical pain and suffering, physician's bill, permanent physical impairment, and the consequently diminished capacity to labor, alleged to be the result of personal injuries sustained in consequence of the negligence of the defendant company and its employes, it is error to give in charge to the jury the following provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 3907: 'In some torts the entire injury is to the peace, happiness, or feelings of the plaintiff; in such cases no measure of damages can be prescribed, except the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors.'" A similar ruling was made in Central of Georgia Railway Co. v. Almand, 116 Ga. 780, 43 S. E. 67, where this court said that the provisions of the Code section read by the court to the jury in the case now in hand have reference only to actions where the entire injury alleged is to the peace, happiness, and feelings of the plaintiff, as the law prescribes a more definite measure for determining the amount recoverable on account of lost time and expenses. A number of decisions of this court were there cited in support of the ruling that, in cases similar to the one at bar, evidence of the worldly circumstances of the parties was inadmissible, and it was therefore erroneous to instruct the jury that they should be considered by them. Moreover, as was said in Bowen's Case, supra, punitive damages were not recoverable in the case at hand, for the reason that there were no circumstances of aggravation either in the act or the intention. In the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial in the present case, the trial judge said: "In view of the fact that plaintiff's counsel expressly stated to the jury during the trial of the case and in their arguments that they did not ask for vindictive or punitive damages, and the court, after giving this abstract proposition of law, properly and specifically instructed the jury in what particulars they should find only the actual damages sustained, and confined the application of the rule to damages resulting from pain and suffering and the like, and that while it may have been erroneous to have made this charge, yet, in the light of the entire charge and statements of plaintiff's counsel to the jury, I am of opinion that it could have done the defendant no harm." We have very carefully studied the entire charge of his honor as it appears in the record, and we cannot agree with him that he "properly and specifically instructed the jury in what particulars they should find only the actual damages sustained, and confine the application of the rule to damages resulting from pain and suffering and the like." We find nothing in the charge which can be construed into an instruction that the rule given by the court to the jury, to the effect that the measurement of damages was the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors, is limited to the fixing of the amount of damages for pain and suffering. The fact that plaintiff's counsel stated, in their arguments to the jury, that they did not ask for vindictive or punitive damages, instead of rendering the charge under discussion harmless, was an additional reason why the court should not have given it. The jury might well have reasoned that although the plaintiff was not asking for vindictive or punitive damages, yet as the judge, who knew this as well as they did, had given them in charge the rule applicable to a case in which the measure of damages is solely the enlightened consciences of impartial jurors, it must be applicable to the case which they were trying and to the damages which were claimed by the plaintiff therein. Surely this court cannot assume that the jury, in the absence of instructions to that effect, understood that the rule for measuring damages by their enlightened consciences applied solely to such damages as they might find for the pain and suffering caused the plaintiff by the alleged injuries. The charge might have been especially harmful in the present case, in view of the fact that the plaintiff sought to recover, as damages, medical and surgical expenses incurred by her in consequence of her alleged injuries, and yet, as we will show in the next division of the opinion, failed to prove, even approximately, the amount of such expenses. In the present case the erroneous charge was not cured and its probable, or at least possible, harmful effect obviated by other specific instructions, whereby the jury were given proper and accurate rules for the different kind of damages for which the action was brought, as was true in Keating's Case, 99 Ga. 308, 25 S. E. 669, and Goodson's Case, 118 Ga. 833, 45 S. E. 630.

2. Another exception was to the instructions of the court as to plaintiff's right to recover reasonable expenses for medical attention, if the jury should find in her favor; the assignment of error being that there was no evidence to authorize a charge on this subject. We think this assignment well taken. It was utterly impossible for the jury, from the testimony, to even form an approximately accurate estimate of the amount of expense which the plaintiff had incurred for medical and surgical attention and treatment rendered necessary in consequence of the injuries which she had received in falling over the truck on the platform of defendant's depot. This was a matter which, from its nature, was capable of accurate proof, and yet the plaintiff only gave to the jury a rough estimate, or approximation, of the amount which she had expended for all the medical and surgical treatment which she had received after she was injured in the way alleged in her petition, admitting at the same time that a part of this amount was for treatment of ailments not caused by her fall over the truck, and not even attempting to separate the amount she paid for the treatment of such ailments from the amount which she paid for medical and surgical treatment caused by the injuries which she alleged were the result of defendant's negligence. According to her own testimony, she had been treated, at different times and places, by several physicians and surgeons. Upon the subject of the amount of expense which she thus incurred, she testified: "I have not kept an accurate account of my physicians' and surgeons' bills for my treatment. It has been between $600 and $700. I can swear positively $600. * * * I do not know that I could correctly state the amount I paid to each physician. I only based my estimate on a bank account that I used solely for medical attention. It is exhausted." She further testified, in reference to treatment at a sanitarium in Savannah, where Dr. White, assisted by other surgeons, performed surgical operations upon her, the principal one being for an injury to her shoulder, caused, as she claimed, by her fall over the truck, as follows: "They treated me for some other things as well. I was treated for some other minor troubles. The main trouble dated back to the birth of my baby. For two years it had not given me any trouble to amount to anything, but Dr. White said he thought best to attend to it. There was some operation besides that upon my arm. * * * They did not make any itemized statement [of their bill for services]. I do not suppose that they would treat this other ailment for nothing. In stating what I paid for physicians' bills I meant for all purposes. In my family I have had very little treatment except for my treatment since that time. I do not know what I did with the bills; sometimes I taken a receipt and sometimes I did not. * * * As to why I cannot remember how much I paid my physicians for treatment of my shoulder and how much for other treatment, if I had taken the time to figure the matter up, I might do it. I do not care to. I am tired of doctors' bills. I do not remember exactly now. I would not like for the railroad to pay for the treatment of my female troubles that they are not responsible for. As to whether I expect the jury to say what they are responsible for without the facts,

I will leave that to them to decide. If they think the railroad is not responsible for any part of my physicians' bills, they can so state." Dr. White, a surgeon of the city of Savannah, testified, in behalf of the plaintiff, that on January 18, 1902, he operated on her for four different ailments, which he separately named and described, one of them being an injury to her shoulder, and subsequently performed another operation on the shoulder; that three of the four ailments, or physical "troubles," for which he operated upon her the first time, were independent of the shoulder injury, and, in his opinion, existed before she received such injury. While he testified that "the troubles" other than the injury to the shoulder were minor ones, as compared to that injury, he did not undertake to inform the jury what his charges were for the treatment of the shoulder injury, as distinguished from his charges for the treatment of the plaintiff's other physical ailments. Indeed, neither he nor the plaintiff even stated what the whole amount of his bill was. No other evidence in the record tends to throw any light on the amount expended by the plaintiff for medical and surgical attention and treatment rendered necessary by the injuries alleged to have been received by the plaintiff in consequence of defendant's negligence. There was no evidence at all as to the reasonableness of the amounts which the plaintiff paid the different physicians who treated her. Indeed, this was not to be expected when she failed to state what these respective amounts were. Undoubtedly a plaintiff who is entitled to recover damages for a physical injury may recover, as a part thereof, reasonable physicians' bills incurred in consequence of the injury; but, in order to recover for such expenses, there must be proof of a definite nature as to the amount so expended, and also some evidence as to the reasonableness of such amount. As was said in Mayor of Savannah v. Waldner, 49 Ga. 316, 324: "A plaintiff cannot claim for what is capable of almost exact proof, without furnishing the jury some testimony to arrive at the measure or amount of the claim. Proof of what are the physician's bills, and other expenses growing out of damages received, is always required to entitle a recovery thereof." In Allen v. Harris, 113 Ga. 107, 38 S. E. 322 (4), it was held: "Proof of what was paid for professional services is not, without more, sufficient proof of their value." As, under the evidence, there could be no lawful recovery by the plaintiff for what the judge termed "medical bills and medical expenses," it was erroneous for him to instruct the jury that if they believed "from the evidence in this case that the defendant is liable to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff was injured and it became necessary for her to incur medical bills and medical expenses, * * * the defendant would be liable to her for reasonable expenses in securing medical attention," etc. When there is no evidence upon which a recovery for a particular element of alleged damages could lawfully be based, the judge should not submit to the jury the question of the plaintiff's right to recover for such element of damages.

There were other assignments of error in the motion for a new trial with which we do not deem it necessary to deal specifically. Some of the matters complained of were such as will not likely arise upon another trial; and, while some of the instructions excepted to were not strictly accurate, none of them were so erroneous as to require the grant of a new trial, except those which we have discussed in this opinion.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

WATSON et al. v. EQUITABLE MORTGAGE CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 10, 1907.)

ERROR, WRIT OF—WHEN LIES—ADMINISTRATIVE ORDER—REFUSAL OF INJUNCTION.

Where, upon an appropriate application, a receiver was appointed in an equity suit and directed to do certain things, and no exception was taken to the order of appointment, but afterwards the defendants amended their answer and prayed the court to enjoin the receiver from doing the things which he had been appointed to do, a bill of exceptions will not lie to the refusal of the court to interfere with the receiver while the main case is pending in the court.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Monroe County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by R. H. Watson and others against the Equitable Mortgage Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Dismissed.

J. W. Preston and M. G. Bayne, for plaintiffs in error. John L. Tye, Cabaniss & Willingham, Tye & Bryan, and Chas. A. Read, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. Peter McMickle executed a deed conveying certain property to "Rufus H. Watson, Jr., for the use, benefit and advantage, in trust for Mary M. Watson, for life, * * * for her sole and separate use and on her decease to her child or children as she may leave in life." In the deed there was a power given the trustee to sell the property for reinvestment upon the written consent of the said Mary M. Watson. The trustee made application to the judge of the superior court, in behalf of Mary M. Watson and her children, for leave to mortgage the property so conveyed. The judge granted an order authorizing the trustee to execute a mortgage in accordance with the application. A mortgage was executed by the trustee, purporting to create a lien upon the estates for life and remainder. There was a default in the payment, and the mortgage was foreclosed and the property sold at sheriff's sale. The purchaser at sheriff's sale afterwards conveyed the property in fee to Mary M. Watson. After thus obtaining a deed to the entire property, Mary M. Watson executed a deed to secure a debt to the Equitable Mortgage Company, conveying said entire property as security for a specified debt. Default in payment followed, and the Equitable Mortgage Company instituted a suit for the purpose of recovering judgment and subjecting the property to its payment. While this suit was pending, Rufus H. Watson, Jr., as trustee, instituted suit against the Equitable Mortgage Company, attacking the mortgage executed by the trustee, and likewise the title alleged to have resulted from the sheriff's sale, and likewise the title held by the Equitable Mortgage Company as security for the debt. In this suit it was prayed that the Equitable Mortgage Company be enjoined, that the security deed be canceled, and that the title to the property be decreed to be in R. H. Watson, Jr., as trustee for Mary M. Watson for life, with remainder to her children. The Equitable Mortgage Company filed defenses to this suit; and, upon the final trial, the children of Mary M. Watson who were in life appeared in court by counsel, and presented an application to the judge to allow them to so amend their declaration as to proceed in their own names, instead of in the name of the trustee. The record here does not disclose that the judge passed any order allowing the amendment. The trial proceeded however, and resulted in a verdict for the defendant, upon which judgment was entered. There was no motion for a new trial or exception taken. After that trial the Equitable Mortgage Company proceeded with the prosecution of the suit against Mary M. Watson and recovered judgment. When the property was about to be sold, claims were interposed by R. H. Watson, Jr., as trustee, for Mary M. Watson and her children, and also by the children of Mary M. Watson, which caused a postponement of the sheriff's sale. The Equitable Mortgage Company instituted another suit against R. H. Watson, Jr., as trustee, and the children of Mary M. Watson, reciting the entire history of the litigation up to and including the rendition of the judgment subjecting the property to the payment of the debt and the filing of the claims at the time the property was about to be offered for sale by the sheriff. It was further alleged in that suit that the claimants were insolvent, that the taxes were accumulating, and that the property was insufficient to pay the debt; that for several reasons the claimants were estopped from asserting any claim under the trust deed, and especially that they have been concluded by the former judgment in the suit wherein they had caused themselves to be made parties by amendment, and wherein they had asserted the same title and had endeavored to defeat the title of the Equitable Mortgage Company. Among others, there were prayers for injunction against the further assertion of title; likewise a prayer for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the property, collect the rents, and sell the property for the payment of taxes and principal and interest due to the Equitable Mortgage Company. No exception was filed to such order. The receiver advertised the property for sale; and the defendants in the last-named suit then filed an amendment in the nature of a cross-bill to their previous answer, and again asserted their title under the trust deed, and prayed that the receiver be discharged, and that all orders and decrees heretofore made by the court under agreement or otherwise be set aside as void, and that the court enjoin the receiver from selling the property and from taking possession thereof until the rights of the parties could be settled under the cross-bill. There was an interlocutory hearing upon the application for injunction. The case was tried upon the allegations of the pleadings, without the introduction of evidence. After considering the case thus submitted, the judge refused to enjoin the receiver as prayed. The defendants in the main suit, who, by their answer in the nature of a cross-bill, had applied for an injunction against the receiver, excepted and assigned error upon the order of the court refusing to enjoin the receiver.

An examination of the bill of exceptions shows that the plaintiffs in error complain of only one ruling of the judge, to wit, his refusal to grant an injunction. An examination of the record discloses that the injunction sought was against a receiver of the court for the purpose of preventing him from doing certain things which he had been directed to do by previous orders of the court. While the remedy sought is called an injunction in the pleadings, it is not in fact such an injunction as is contemplated in Civ. Code 1895, § 5528, to the grant or refusal of which a writ of error would lie from the ruling of the court before the final trial of the case. The order applied for was a mere administrative order, directed by the judge to the receiver, to the grant or refusal of which exceptions pendente lite, and a further assignment of error in the bill of exceptions after the conclusion of the case would be proper and necessary, if the complaining party desired to review the ruling of the court. There were no exceptions pendente lite, and the case does not appear to have been finally disposed of. Under such conditions, this court cannot take jurisdiction of the matter. See, in this connection, Lambert Holsting Engine Co. v. Dexter, 127 Ga. 581, 56 S. E. 778, and citations.

MELVIN v. MELVIN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1907.)

1. DIVORCE—TEMPORARY ALIMONY.

The judge was authorized, under the pleadings and evidence, to award temporary alimony and counsel fees to the wife, and the allowance was not excessive.

2. SAME—INJUNCTION.

The writ of injunction to restrain a husband from incumbering or disposing of his property pending a divorce and alimony suit should not be granted, where the husband is neither attempting nor threatening to sell or encumber his property, and no other equitable ground for the issuance of the writ is shown to exist.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Divorce, §§ 600-603.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Calhoun County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by M. M. Melvin against E. M. Melvin. From a judgment awarding temporary alimony, defendant brings error. Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

W. C. Worrill and S. S. Bennet, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Pottle and C. L. Glessner, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. The wife filed a petition against the husband, praying a divorce, an allowance of alimony and attorney's fees, and an injunction against the husband incumbering or selling his property pending the suit. On the interlocutory hearing the court awarded the wife counsel fees and temporary alimony, and enjoined the defendant from incumbering or selling his property until final decree. The defendant excepts on the grounds that the wife is not entitled to alimony under the case made, that the allowance was excessive, and that no cause for an injunction pendente lite was shown.

1. The ground for divorce was cruel treatment. The truth of the allegations was denied by the defendant. It appeared that both husband and wife had been previously married. By the husband's former marriage he had two minor sons, and by the wife's former marriage she had a minor daughter. The wife also had a separate estate, which previously to the marriage had yielded an annual income of about $400. The court allowed as alimony a present sum of $75, and a monthly allowance of $15 until final decree, and counsel fees to the extent of $50. There was proof that the husband was a good business man, worth about $10,000, and received from the management of his property an annual net income of about $1,000. Civ. Code 1895, § 2458, declares: "In arriving at the proper provision, the judge shall consider the peculiar necessities of the wife, growing out of the pending litigation; he may also consider any evidence of a separate estate owned by the wife; and if such estate is ample, as compared with the husband's, temporary alimony may be refused." The court may also consider the fact that the wife has a minor daughter by a former marriage, dependent upon her for a support. The husband is under no legal duty to support his step-daughter; and the court, in estimating the wife's income from her separate estate should take this circumstance into consideration. The allowance was authorized by the evidence, and was not excessive.

2. The petition did not allege that the husband was disposing of his property, or incumbering it, or even threatening to do so. Nor did the petition allege any special reason why the husband should be enjoined from disposing of or incumbering his property. No proof was submitted that the husband was attempting or even contemplating the transfer of his property to defeat the wife's claim for alimony. A wife may, in a proper case, apply for an injunction to prevent the husband from alienating or incumbering his property to defeat her claim for alimony, but she cannot resort to this extraordinary remedy solely because she may be entitled to have her husband pay her alimony. Before the writ of injunction can properly issue, it must appear from the special circumstances of the case that the issuance of the writ is essential to the protection of her right to alimony. The court therefore erred in granting a temporary injunction.

Judgment affirmed in part, and reversed in part. All the Justices concur.

WALKER v. O'NEILL MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1907.)

1. JUDGMENT—LIEN.

Where a chose in action is owned by several individuals jointly, and suit instituted by one of them alone, making no reference in the pleadings to the joint ownership, or to the other individuals, and the plaintiff obtains judgment in his individual name, without reference to the others, the judgment does not create a lien against the defendant in favor of those who were not named therein.

(a) A sale of the execution issued upon such judgment by the plaintiff named therein to the defendant satisfies the claim of the plaintiff.

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—ENFORCEMENT OF LIEN—PAYMENT OF FEES.

Where an attorney at law, asserting the statutory lien for attorney's fees, seeks to collect the same from the defendant in fi. fa. after settlement with the plaintiff, and, testifying in his own behalf, fails to state clearly and unequivocally the terms of the contract of employment, or the amount due him, either by express or implied contract, but testifies affirmatively that after the settlement between the parties the plaintiff sent him a check which recited that it was "in full for fees," and that he indorsed and collected the check without raising any question with the plaintiff that it was not in full satisfaction of the fees, such acceptance and use of the check, without explanation, authorized the court to hold as a matter of law that no attorney's fees were due.

3. TRIAL—DIRECTING VERDICT.

The uncontradicted evidence in this case, when considered in that view most favorable to the contentions of the plaintiff, demanded a verdict for the defendant, and the court did not commit error by so directing.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 332, 333.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Action by Henry Walker against the O'Neill Manufacturing Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

C. N. Featherston and Henry Walker, for plaintiff in error. Denny & Harris, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. An attorney at law had in his hands for collection separate claims against a debtor in favor of four separate creditors. The debtor was insolvent, and at a sale of his assets by a receiver the attorney at law purchased for his own use an open account due to the debtor by another person. The attorney then notified his four clients of his purchase, and offered to let them have the account so purchased if each would pay sums proportionate to their respective claims sufficient in amount to reimburse him. They agreed, and paid him the money. After such payment, the attorney at law, for convenience, sued the account so purchased in the name of one of his clients only; the record not disclosing that any other person had any interest therein. Judgment was obtained. Thereupon garnishment proceedings were instituted against the employer of the defendant, and judgment was obtained against the garnishee. In the garnishment there was no suggestion of any other party plaintiff than the sole creditor, the Ahrens & Ott Manufacturing Company, in whose name suit had been originally instituted. After the rendition of the judgment in the garnishment proceeding, the attorney caused execution to issue thereon and retained it in his possession. Afterwards the attorney in his individual name sought to purchase the execution from the plaintiff. The purchase price was agreed upon, and the attorney entered upon the execution a blank assignment thereof to himself, and forwarded the same to the plaintiff for the purpose of having the assignment executed by the plaintiff, and, at the same time, authorized a draft to be drawn by the plaintiff on him for the purchase price. The assignment was executed according to directions, with the exception that the date was omitted. On account of that omission the attorney was unwilling to accept it. Upon this point we may quote from the testimony of the attorney as follows: "Seeing the date to be filled by them had not been filled in, after holding it for quite a while, the fi. fa. was returned to them to supply the date. It remained quite a while in their hands, and was finally returned to me undated. * * * For several days before, and at the time of that payment of July 17th, I had the fi. fa.; had it on the 8th or 10th of July. I had the fi. fa. levied, and this illegality was interposed to the levy." There was nothing said by the attorney at law indicating that the purchase contemplated a credit transaction. On the contrary, testimony was introduced to the effect that it was a cash transaction, which fact does not appear to be in any way contested by the attorney. Pending the negotiations above recited, the defendant in fi. fa. also entered into negotiations with the plaintiff in fi. fa. for the purchase of the execution, and succeeded, in consideration of the true amount of the principal and interest and cost due to the plaintiff, without respect to any of the three other alleged creditors, whose names were not disclosed by the judgment, in obtaining from the plaintiff a written assignment in these words: "Louisville, Ky., July 17, 1900. Received of O'Neill Mfg. Company of Rome, Ga., $257.99 in full and complete settlement of all our interests in a certain judgment of the superior court of Floyd County, Georgia, which was rendered on the 12th day of April, 1899, in favor of the Ahrens & Ott Mfg. Company v. O'Neill Mfg. Company as garnishees." The consideration expressed in this assignment, $257.99, is the same payment to which reference was made in the testimony of the attorney above quoted as having been made on "July 17th." It thus appears from the testimony of the attorney, who was the plaintiff in error in the present case, that at the time of the purchase of the execution by the defendant the execution was actually in his hands, delivered to him by the plaintiff. There was undisputed testimony to the effect that the attorney did not pay the purchase price which he agreed to pay for the execution, but, having possession of it under the circumstances already enumerated, he caused the same to be levied on the defendant's property. After the levy, the defendant filed an affidavit of illegality, upon the ground, among others, that the fi. fa. had been paid and fully satisfied by the defendant by reason of the payment of the sum of $257.99 hereinbefore recited. The foregoing statement deals with that view of the case which is most favorable to the contentions of the plaintiff in error. The court directed a verdict in favor of the defendant in fi. fa.

1. To sustain the judgment refusing to grant a new trial, the evidence, when considered in its most favorable light for the plaintiff in error, must have been of such character as to demand a verdict against him. Considering the evidence in this light, we are unable to see that the plaintiff in error acquired any interest in the fi. fa. by purchase. His negotiations were not prosecuted to the completion of a purchase. The contemplated sale to him was a cash transaction. He received and inspected, but did not accept, the article tendered, and did not pay the purchase price. Under such conditions the title did not pass. See, in this connection, Starnes v. Roberts, 58 S. E. 348. Other than these unconsummated and ineffectual negotiations, there was nothing to interfere with the right of the plaintiff, the Ahrens & Ott Manufacturing Company, to sell the fi. fa. to the defendants therein named. The plaintiffs did sell all of their interests and make a valid assignment therein in writing. When they sold their interests, they sold the entire execution, because there was no other party plaintiff, and consequently no one else could be consulted. Whatever may have been the interests of other persons in the subject-matter of the suit which resulted in the first judgment, those interests could not, under the condition of the record, be traced into the present judgment so as to acquire a lien upon the defendant's property. The plaintiff, the Ahrens & Ott Manufacturing Company, did not in either suit pretend to proceed for the use of any person except themselves. If other parties had an interest in the original execution, they would have been proper parties to the first suit, and could have obtained an interest in the judgment, but, as against the defendants, there is no theory by which they could remain out of the case until judgment and then claim by force of the judgment a lien upon the defendant's property. See, in this connection, Whitman v. Bolling, 47 Ga. 125; Smith v. Pate, 51 Ga. 246; City Bank of Macon v. Crossland, 65 Ga. 734 (4).

2, 3. But it is insisted that the plaintiffs, by a sale of the execution, could not defeat the lien of the attorney for his fees, and that he had a right to have the execution proceed for the purpose of enabling him to collect his fees. It is contended that his lien exists under the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 2814, par. 2, which provides that attorneys at law shall have a lien "upon suits, judgments, and decrees for money, superior to all liens but tax liens, and no person shall be at liberty to satisfy said suit, judgment or decree until the lien or claim of the attorney for his fees is fully satisfied; and attorneys at law shall have the same right and power over said suits, judgments, and decrees, to enforce their liens, as their clients had or may have for the amount due thereon to them." In order to support the claim of lien, the burden of proof was upon the attorney to show the existence of a valid judgment and execution. It is conceded by the defendants that, to the extent of the amount which they paid to Ahrens & Ott Manufacturing Company as purchase money for the execution, there was a valid judgment and execution. It is not necessary, therefore, to inquire whether upon that point the burden of proof was supported. The burden was also upon the party asserting the lien to show the amount of attorney's fees due at the time of the trial, for which it was claimed that he had a lien. The attorney testified in his own behalf, and was in a position to testify clearly and unequivocally as to whether any particular amount had been agreed upon between himself and his client as a fee—if so, what amount, and, if none had been agreed upon, then to express his opinion as to the reasonable value of the services rendered by him to the plaintiff in recovering the judgment. As a matter of fact, he did not testify that the amount of his fee had or had not been fixed by agreement between himself and his client, and he did not express his opinion as to the value of his services to the plaintiff, separate and distinct from all of the services which he rendered to all of his clients, three of whom he contended had interests in the judgment, but none of whom were parties thereto. It has already been seen that the execution could not have been enforced against the defendant for the benefit of the clients of the attorney, other than the plaintiff in execution, for the recovery of the principal and interest alleged to be due them. If the execution could not be enforced for their benefit for the collection of the principal and interest alleged to be due them, for the same reason, it could not be enforced for the benefit of the attorney for such attorney's fees as they may have been liable to pay him. As to those claims he had no judgment, and it follows that he had no lien against the defendants.

With respect to the indebtedness of the plaintiffs in fi. fa. to the attorney for counsel fees, and the amount thereof, if any such debt existed, it is readily seen that the testimony of the attorney thus far considered is not clear and unequivocal. But there was further evidence upon the subject. The attorney testified that, after the payment of the $257.99 had been made by the defendant to the plaintiff as purchase for the fi. fa., "I received a little check for $13, reciting that it was in full for fees. The check was mislaid. When found some time afterwards I indorsed it and collected it." No explanation is made by the attorney as to why he indorsed and collected the check, if he did not receive it in full payment of counsel fees due by the plaintiff. If he did receive it as such that was the end of his contention for counsel fees. If he did not receive it as such, the burden was upon him to explain. In the absence of explanation, it will be deemed that whatever may have been the amount agreed upon, or whatever the value of the services, the check satisfied his claim. See, in this connection, Jenkins v. National Building Ass'n, 111 Ga. 732, 36 S. E. 945; Walker v. Wadley, 124 Ga. 286, 52 S. E. 904. Under this view of the attorney's evidence, there was not, upon the subject of attorney's fees, any issue to be submitted to the jury. Upon the case as a whole, there was no error in directing a verdict.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

(2 Ga. App. 228)

DORSEY v. STATE. (No. 458.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 28, 1907.)

1. HOMICIDE — INSTRUCTIONS—INVOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER.

The law of involuntary manslaughter, as applicable to the evidence, was fully and properly presented to the jury by the charge of the court.

2. SAME.

A request to charge the jury that it is their duty, where threats, if proved, are susceptible of two constructions, to give the defendant the benefit of the innocent construction, was properly refused. The absence of the word "equally" renders the request one not proper to be granted.

3. CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—INVADING PROVINCE OF JURY.

To instruct the jury that threats (in any case) "are of very little importance as evidence in guiding the jury" would be a violation of Civ. Code 1895, § 4334. The jury, and not the judge, must weigh the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 1731.]

4. SAME—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

Extracts from a charge, upon which error is assigned, must be considered and construed in connection with the charge taken as a whole. It is impossible for a trial judge to repeat, in every connection, all of the principles involved in the case; nor is he required to indulge in such repetition. Where the statements upon different legal propositions are carefully distinguished and cautiously contrasted with each other, and so clearly that they can neither mislead nor confuse, the ordinary intelligence of the jury can safely be relied upon to render frequent repetition of the same principle of law unnecessary and useless.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 1590.]

5, 6. SAME.

The judgment of the trial court, refusing a new trial, is not, for any reason assigned, erroneous.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Hall County;

J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

J. T. Dorsey was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and he brings error. Affirmed.

See 55 S. E. 479.

Thompson & Bell and H. H. Dean, for plaintiff in error. W. A. Charters, Sol. Gen., and F. M. Johnson, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. Dorsey was indicted for murder, and convicted of voluntary manslaughter. His motion for a new trial was refused, and he excepts to that judgment.

The evidence showed that he and the deceased and several others had been drinking together at intervals during the afternoon and evening. As frequently occurs on such occasions, there were several trivial quarrels, in which the deceased participated. The defendant finally started to a house where he did not wish the other to accompany him, and requested the deceased not to do so. This request, and some words over a drink of whisky, were followed by the deceased finally getting in front of the defendant, calling him vile names, and making a motion as if to strike him. There was no evidence that the deceased had any weapon, though the defendant claimed in his statement that he had either a knife or knucks. The defendant had in his hand a billiard cue, which had been cut off so as to be used as a walking stick, and with this he struck the deceased twice, once in the mouth and once on the side of the head, knocking him down each time. He then proceeded on his journey. The deceased went back to his home, procured medical attention, and died in two days. There was a former trial of this case, which is reported in 126 Ga. 633, 55 S. E. 479. In addition to the evidence there reported, there was testimony on the present trial that the deceased threatened to kill the defendant if the defendant did not kill him, and there was also evidence on the part of the state, not adduced on the former trial, that the weapon used was a deadly weapon. The case was remanded by the Supreme Court for a new trial upon the sole ground that the judge failed to instruct the jury as to the law of involuntary manslaughter; the Supreme Court holding that "if the jury should find that the weapon was one which would not ordinarily produce death, and was therefore not a deadly weapon, and the circumstances demonstrated to the satisfaction of the jury that there was no intention to kill, then, even though the blow was not justified, the accused would be guilty only of the offense of involuntary manslaughter, the grade of which he would be convicted to be determined by whether the blow was inflicted as a result of an unlawful act, or whether, under the circumstances, he was justified in striking a blow, but in administering it did not use due care and circumspection." This error of the trial court was corrected on the last trial, and both grades of involuntary manslaughter were given in charge to the jury; the jury, as on the previous trial, returning a verdict finding the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter. The case is now brought to this court for review upon several assignments of error in addition to the general grounds.

The first of these grounds is that the court erred in refusing a written request to charge that, while provocation by words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures would not be sufficient to reduce the homicide below the grade of murder, when the killing is done, not on account of any fear in the mind of the slayer, but solely for the purpose of resenting the provocation, nevertheless threats, accompanied by menaces, may in some instances be sufficient to arouse the fears of a reasonable man that his life is in danger, or that a felony is about to be perpetrated upon him; and, if the defendant acted under the fears of a reasonable man that the deceased intended by violence or surprise to commit a felony upon him, the defendant would be justified. This request was in the language of the decision of the Supreme Court in Cumming v. State, 99 Ga. 662, 27 S. E. 177, except, in the written request presented, the word "resisting" was used, instead of "resented." It devolved upon the defendant to present a correct request, and even though the error may be only typographical, yet, as it does not correctly state the law, it was not incumbent upon the court to present it to the jury. The plaintiff in error insists, however, that the principle embraced in the request should have been given in charge to the jury. We think the jury should have been and were instructed on the proposition for which the plaintiff in error contends.

The trial judge, upon this subject, instructed the jury as follows: "You know I charged you a while ago, gentlemen of the jury, that in order to reduce a homicide from murder to voluntary manslaughter—that is, where a human being is killed under a great heat of passion—that no words, contemptuous gestures, or things of that sort, opprobrious epithets, should not be sufficient provocation to reduce the killing from murder to voluntary manslaughter. Under the head of reasonable fears in case of justifiable homicide—under this head of justifiable homicide—where the defendant is without fault in bringing on the difficulty, acting under reasonable fears, the law provides (it being purely a question of fact as to whether the attendant circumstances justified a reasonable fear upon the part of the accused that such injury was about to be committed upon his person) that that question is one exclusively for the jury. There are so many conditions under which grounds for reasonable fear could arise that the Legislature has not undertaken to say that any given state of facts or circumstances shall or shall not be sufficient to constitute grounds of reasonable fear, but has left the matter open for determination by the jury, in each instance, without further limitation than that the circumstances must be sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man that some one or more of the offenses named in the Penal Code were about to be committed, or that his life was in imminent danger; thus leaving it to the jury, after all, to pass upon the sufficiency of the circumstances for that purpose. And the jury would have the right to consider the conduct of the defendant and the conduct of the deceased—the words that were used, if there were any used. The jury would consider it all, what words were passed by one to the other; and it is for the jury to say whether or not the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man. If the circumstances are sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man, the killing will be attributed to them, in the absence of proof to the contrary, and also that the accused acted under those fears and not in a spirit of revenge. The sufficiency of the fears is a question for the jury always. The defendant will be justifiable if there be a reasonable doubt as to whether he acted under such fears, or had reason to feel that it was necessary to kill in order to save his own life or to prevent a felony from being committed upon his person."

We think these instructions as fully put before the jury the principle that words, though not amounting to actual assault, may in some instances be sufficient to arouse the fears of a reasonable man, as did the request, and was more apt for the purpose than the charge requested, in that it called the attention of the jury to the circumstances creating the "some instances" referred to by the Supreme Court. A court of review frequently uses, and can properly use, language which would be highly improper or confusing to the jury, if given in charge by a trial judge. To have charged the jury that "in some instances" threats accompanied by menaces might be sufficient to arouse the fears of a reasonable man, without instructing the jury as to the nature of those instances, would have been erroneous, because the jury would have had no information as to how they were to determine from the evidence whether such an instance was presented in the case at bar. The trial judge gave them a correct rule when he said that the jury could consider the conduct of the parties, the words that were passed from one to the other, etc., consider it all, and say whether or not the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man; and the charge we have quoted above, calling special attention to his previous charge on section 65 of the Penal Code of 1895 (when instructing them as to the law of voluntary manslaughter), and applying by contrast the use of opprobrious words to the doctrine of reasonable fears (should the jury believe the defendant acted under such fears), rendered it impossible that the jury could either have been confused or misled, or the defendant's rights prejudiced.

2. The plaintiff in error assigns error upon the refusal of a request to charge as follows: "I charge you, further, that if there is any proof of threat by the defendant introduced before you, and such threats are susceptible to two constructions, it is the duty of the jury to give the defendant the benefit of the innocent construction, if they can, rather than the guilty construction." This not being a correct statement of the law, the court was not required to present it to the jury. The rule is that, if threats are equally susceptible of two constructions, it is the duty of the jury, if they can, to prefer the innocent construction.

3. To have given the charge, the refusal of which is excepted to in the third ground of the motion, would have been a manifest violation of the provisions of Civ. Code 1895,

§ 4334. The charge requested was in these words: "I charge you that mere idle threats, without any intention of carrying the same into execution, and without any effort to do so, are of very little importance as evidence in guiding the jury in the deliberation of the case."

4. Exception is taken to the following charge of the court: "I charge you, gentlemen of the jury, if two men suddenly fall out and fight, and there is a mutual intent to fight upon the part of the men, and there is great heat of passion, and they do fight, although there might not be but one blow stricken, and that blow is the fatal blow, if there is mutual intent to fight, and they do fight, and one is killed as the result of it—I charge you that such killing would be voluntary manslaughter, unless justified." The complaint made of the charge is that it took from the jury the consideration of the law of involuntary manslaughter, and also the consideration of the question as to whether such fight was with or without a weapon, or with or without intent to kill, or with a weapon likely to produce death when used in the manner in which it was used, or without regard to whether there was any intention to kill on the part of the defendant, and because it required the jury to find the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter. It is insisted, further, that the charge was error, because contrary to the decision of the Supreme Court in the following language: "If the jury should find that the weapon was one which would not ordinarily produce death, and therefore was not a deadly weapon, and the circumstances demonstrated to the satisfaction of the jury that there was no intention to kill, then, even though the blow was not justified, the accused would be guilty only of the offense of involuntary manslaughter, the grade of which he would be convicted to be determined by whether the blow was inflicted as a result of an unlawful act, or whether, under the circumstances, he was justified in striking the blow, but in administering it did not use due care and circumspection." It is further insisted that it was erroneous to instruct the jury that such killing would be voluntary manslaughter, unless justified.

The extracts from the charge to which exception is taken, if considered alone, or if it had been delivered as a part of the instruction with reference to involuntary manslaughter, or if there had been an absence of other and correct instructions upon the subject of involuntary manslaughter, would have been error. But it must be borne in mind that the language quoted in this exception is only a disconnected fragment from the charge of the court upon the subject of voluntary manslaughter, in which the court more than once called their attention to the fact that it was only to be considered as applicable to that particular grade of homicide. The judge first instructed the jury as to the law of murder, then the application of the law of voluntary manslaughter was discussed, then involuntary manslaughter, and finally justifiable homicide; and, as the judge would pass from one to the other, he very carefully and cautiously called the attention of the jury thereto, and instructed them, so that they could not be confused or misled. Considered with what preceded and followed the extract upon which error is assigned, there is no ground for complaint; for it is impossible for the trial judge to repeat in every connection all of the principles and limitations involved in the entire case, nor is he required to do so. Some reliance must be had on the ordinary intelligence of the jury to render repetition unnecessary and useless.

In other portions of the charge, after clearly and specifically referring to the charge here complained of and distinguishing the application of the two principles, according as the jury might find the truth, the court fully instructed the jury that they were to consider the nature and character of the weapon and the intention with which it was used, charging them as follows: "I charge you that if you believe, from the evidence, that the weapon used, if one was used, if it was not a deadly weapon, or if it was a deadly weapon, it was not used in a deadly manner, then I charge you he would be justified. It would be for you to justify the use of it by words; that is to say, if the deceased used words, opprobrious words and epithets, to the defendant, it would be for the jury to say whether or not the defendant was justified in the use of the weapon. Now, if the jury should believe, as I have already charged you, that the defendant was justified in the use of the weapon, but that it was not used with due caution and circumspection, why then he would be guilty of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of a lawful act. But if you should believe, from the evidence, that the weapon was a deadly weapon, in the manner in which it was used, then I charge you that words would not justify the use of it, and it would be for the jury to say whether it was a deadly weapon, or not, in the manner in which it was used; and if the killing was done then in that way by the defendant, with no intent to kill, if he had no intent to kill, and there was no malice at the time of the killing, why then I charge you that it would be involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act."

This charge not only gave all contended for by the plaintiff in error, but was really more favorable than the defendant had any right to expect; for it would have permitted the jury to acquit the defendant and justify him in the killing for the use of mere words. The error in the charge was prejudicial to the state, and not to the defendant. The phrase to which exception is taken, that "such killing would be voluntary manslaughter, unless justified," instead of excluding involuntary manslaughter from the consideration of the jury, as assigned, is fully explained and referred to in the very full charge upon the subject of involuntary manslaughter delivered by the court.

5. The complaint made in the fifth ground of the motion is that the court, in the charge upon which error is assigned, excluded from the jury the law of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act, under the evidence in the case. Boiled down, it is nothing but a complaint that the law of involuntary manslaughter was not charged in immediate connection with the charge assigned as error. As stated above, the judge instructed the jury on each grade of homicide clearly, fairly, fully, and in accordance with the law, and so carefully called the attention of the jury to the distinctions to be drawn that this assignment of error is in our judgment absolutely without merit. Summing up all the different points made by the plaintiff in error, an inspection of the charge as a whole discloses the fact that each and all of them are answered by the presentation to the jury of every principle insisted upon by him, except that the judge very properly did not charge upon the weight to be given to threats; and, in the absence of a proper request upon that subject, the omission to present it to the jury is not reversible error, under the facts of this case.

6. The plaintiff in error further insists that he is entitled to a new trial on account of the following language of the court, used in charging the jury: "As honest, upright men, you take this case. You have the interests of society on one hand, and you have the interest of defendant on the other; and as honest, good men, men who love liberty, men who love society, men who love law and order, decide this case according to the evidence and the law as given you in charge by the court." After a review of the very impartial charge in this case, with which the jury could not have failed to be impressed, we are constrained to consider criticism of this portion of the charge as hypercritical. It is not necessary for a judge to refer to the importance of the case in his charge to the jury; but the propriety of doing so is purely a matter of discretion, and he cannot be held to have erred unless in such remarks there is contained a misstatement of the law, or such an utterance as is calculated to prejudice the minds of the jury against the accused. The statement by the judge that the jury had the interests of society on one hand, and the interest of the defendant on the other, does not, without a forced construction, not to be drawn from the absolutely fair and impartial charge preceding it, necessarily imply that the interests of society were antagonistic to the interests of the defendant. It is not unlike the statement, very frequently made by trial judges, of the names of the parties to the case. It is not very dissimilar to the opening remarks of the charge of the court in Cobb v. State, 27 Ga. 681, to which no exception was taken. In Akridge v. Noble, 114 Ga. 950, 41 S. E. 78, it was expressly held that it is not erroneous for the judge to call the attention of the jury to the fact that they have taken an oath to try the case according to the evidence and the law as given them in the charge by the court, and that they cannot set up any ideas of their own in reference to the law of the case, in opposition to the charge of the court. In Beck v. State, 76 Ga. 472, complaint was made that the court erred in charging the jury to take the case without any desire to convict an innocent man or to acquit a guilty one, but with the sole purpose of vindicating the law and finding the truth of the case; and the Supreme Court held that there was no error in this part of the charge—that "it is the duty of the jury to vindicate the law."

It will be noticed that the closing instruction of the court was that the jury should "decide the case according to the evidence, and the law as given you in charge by the court." The first and second assignments of error are that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, without evidence to support it, and against the weight of the evidence. In our view the plaintiff in error has no reason for complaint, upon these grounds, which we are authorized to consider. The evidence fully sustains the verdict, though the jury, under the charge of the court, would have been justified in finding a verdict for involuntary manslaughter of either grade, or in acquitting the accused. This court cannot consider the question of evidence, unless for want of evidence a verdict is contrary to law.

Judgment affirmed.

(2 Ga. App. 237)

STARNES et al. v. ATLANTA POLICE RELIEF ASS'N. (No. 277.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 26, 1907.)

1. BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATIONS—MEMBERSHIP—FORFEITURE—NONPAYMENT OF DUES.

Where the constitution of a relief association provides that "no member shall be entitled to benefits who has not paid dues and assessments in advance," and that "any member whose dues remain unpaid for two months shall be dropped from the roll and lose all claim to membership," neither of these results will ipso facto amount to a forfeiture of the benefits. There must be some judicatory or affirmative action by the association, declaring the member suspended or expelled.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 6, Beneficial Associations, § 15.]

2. SAME.

Where the secretary of the association has simply marked the defaulting member as "suspended," this does not amount to affirmative action of the association.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 6, Beneficial Associations, § 15.]

3. SAME.

Where the association has entered upon its minutes an order declaring a member dropped as "being two months in arrears with his dues to the association," such order will be ineffective and inoperative, unless at that time the dues of the member have remained unpaid for two months.

4. SAME.

Where the son for some months paid to the proper officer of the association his father's membership dues, which were accepted by such officer, the actual bona fide tender thereafter by the son of his father's dues as such member to said officer, who declined positively to receive them, prevented a forfeiture of the membership for nonpayment of dues; and where such tender has been made, and so declined, the tender need not be repeated to prevent a forfeiture.

5. SAME—BENEFICIARIES—"FAMILY"—DEFINED.

The word "family," used in the constitution of a benefit association to designate the class to which the beneficiaries must belong, includes any relative who lives with the member and who is dependent upon him, or with whom the member lives and by whom he is supported and cared for, at the time of his death. The majority of this court gives to the word "family" a broader definition than the one just indicated.

6. SAME—CONSTITUTION AND BY-LAWS—CONSTRUCTION.

Courts should construe the constitution and by-laws of a relief association liberally, to effect its benevolent purpose, and not so as to defeat such purpose.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by W. A. Starnes and others against the Atlanta Police Relief Association. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

J. W. Moore and Gordon & Branch, for plaintiffs in error. J. L. Mayson and W. P. Hill, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. This was a suit by the plaintiffs in error, as the only heirs and members of the family of W. A. Starnes, against the Atlanta Police Relief Association. At the conclusion of the evidence the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and to this judgment the plaintiffs except.

The following is a substantial statement of the evidence:

W. A. Starnes was a policeman of the city of Atlanta, and in 1898 became a member of the Atlanta Police Relief Association. On October 16, 1904, he died. It was admitted that from the date of his becoming a member until July 5, 1904, he continued to be a member in good standing in the association. It was also admitted that the plaintiffs were his only children at the date of his death, and that his wife had died in the month of June, 1904, and that the relief association had paid to him in the early part of October, 1904, the benefit to which he was entitled by reason of his wife's death. There was a conflict in the evidence as to the payment of the dues for the months of July and August, 1904. It was admitted by the secretary of the association, whose duty it was under the by-laws of the association to receive such dues, that he received the dues from the plaintiff W. A. Starnes, Jr., for the month of July, 1904, but that he soon thereafter returned them to Starnes, who voluntarily took them back. The latter part of this statement was denied by Starnes. It was conceded that the son had been paying his father's dues for some months before his death, and the son testified that in August, when the monthly dues were to be paid, he tendered to the secretary the dues for that month; that, after taking the $1 for that month, the secretary at that time gave back to him $2, being the dues for July and August, telling him that they preferred to drop his father from membership, because of his immoral conduct; that the secretary handed the money to him before he made this statement, and he at once tendered it back, denying his right to receive it, or the secretary's right to return it, but that the secretary refused to take it back. The witnesses for the association testified that Dr. Starnes, the son, agreed to take back the dues, and asked that his father be dropped for nonpayment of dues, and not for immoral conduct. This was denied by Dr. Starnes. No dues were paid or tendered for September or October, 1904, because, as Dr. Starnes testified, the secretary had notified him that he would not receive any, if tendered. The minutes of the association showed that W. A. Starnes had been dropped from the roll of membership August 11, 1904, because "two months in arrears with his dues to the association." Article 4 of the association was introduced in evidence. The part thereof pertinent to the subject of dues is as follows:

"Section 1. Each member shall pay to the secretary $1 dues each month in advance.

"Sec. 2. All dues, and assessments shall be paid to the secretary by the 5th day of each month. No member shall be entitled to benefits who has not paid dues and assessments in advance.

"Sec. 3. Any member whose dues remain unpaid for two months shall be dropped from the roll and lose all claim to membership."

The evidence was undisputed that W. A. Starnes and wife, during his membership in the association, had lived with their daughter, Mrs. Crist, for six years prior to his death; that he went to Alabama to do some work, and after an absence of several months returned to Atlanta and went to live with his son, Dr. Starnes, where he was supported and cared for by said son about one month, when he died at his son's house. Article 5, section 1, of the constitution, was as follows: "On the death of any member the sum of $1,000 shall be paid to his family, each member to be assessed $2.50." It was admitted that the only members of the family of W. A. Starnes at the date of his death were the plaintiffs, his three children, all of whom were of age, married, and living separate from their father, and not dependent on him; but, as stated, at the date of his death he was living with his son, W. A. Starnes, Jr., one of the plaintiffs, and at that time, as claimed, was dependent upon said son.

It was insisted by the defendant, in support of the motion to direct a verdict, that under this evidence no legal verdict for the plaintiffs could have been found: (1) Because W. A. Starnes was not a member of the association at the time of his death, as the evidence showed that he had been dropped by formal action of the association August 11, 1904, being two months in arrears with his dues to the association; (2) because at the time of his death he had not paid all dues and assessments in advance, and was therefore not entitled to benefits; (3) because, from the undisputed evidence, the plaintiffs did not constitute the "family" of the member, within the meaning of that term in the constitution.

Under Civ. Code 1895, § 5331, the court may direct a verdict where there is no conflict in the evidence, and that introduced, with all reasonable deductions and inferences therefrom, demands the verdict as directed. There was decided conflict in the evidence on the question of the payment of dues. To support the direction of a verdict we must assume that the testimony of Dr. Starnes was true, but was legally immaterial. It was admitted that Dr. Starnes paid the dues to the secretary June 5th, thus continuing the membership of his father until July 5th. On August 6th the secretary marked Starnes "suspended," and on August 11th thereafter the association dropped him from membership as "being two months in arrears with his dues to the association." But this action of the association was unauthorized by the constitution. The language is: "Any member whose dues remain unpaid for two months shall be dropped from the roll and lose all claim to membership." His dues were admittedly paid up to July 5, 1904. The association could not drop him from membership for nonpayment until the dues had remained unpaid for two months, which would not have been the case until September 5, 1904. A member cannot be dropped immediately upon failure to pay dues. A definite time of default is fixed. The dues must become due and "remain unpaid for two months" before such action can be taken. This is the plain, unequivocal construction to be placed on these words. If the construction was doubtful, we would give to it the construction which would prevent a forfeiture. In Warwick v. Knights of Damon, 107 Ga. 115, 32 S. E. 951, the Supreme Court expresses only the universal and controlling rule in holding that "forfeitures are not favored in the law, and, in order to work a forfeiture of the rights of membership in a mutual association, it must clearly appear that such was the meaning of the contract, and the facts upon which a forfeiture is claimed must be proved by the most satisfactory evidence." The court, in applying this doctrine to an association closely analogous to the one now under consideration, declares: "When the rights of members or their beneficiaries are involved, by-laws declaring a forfeiture are to be construed strictly if their validity is called in question, and liberally if it is sought to bring such claimants within their provisions, so as to prevent a forfeiture in either case."

But, apart from the order of the association expelling Starnes, dated August 11, 1904, it is insisted that plaintiffs cannot recover under section 2 of article 4 of the constitution, which in express words provides that "no member shall be entitled to benefits who has not paid dues and assessments in advance." We think, under the facts of this case as shown by the plaintiffs, there was never a legal "suspension" of Starnes because he had not paid "dues and assessments in advance." The plaintiff's evidence showed a payment of the dues for July and August, although returned after payment in the manner described, and gave as a reason for not tendering the dues for September and October the positive declaration of the secretary that he would not accept them, if tendered. If this testimony was true, all dues had been paid in law at the date of Starnes' death, October 16, 1904, and he was at that time a member in good standing. "Even where the rules of the association indicate that such nonpayment of a monthly assessment by a member is a ground of suspension, a forfeiture of his benefits under the certificate will not result from such nonpayment, unless there has been some judicatory or affirmative action by the association declaring the member suspended." Warwick v. Knights of Damon, 107 Ga. 115, 32 S. E. 951. It cannot be reasonably claimed that the act of the secretary, August 6, 1904, in marking Starnes "suspended," is sufficient "judicatory or affirmative action by the association." No action declaring a suspension for nonpayment of dues or assessments was ever taken by the association. The only action of the association expelling the member because "his dues and assessments had remained unpaid for two months" was that of August 11, 1904, which the evidence shows was entirely ineffective, because in violation of the constitution and unwarranted by the facts. We conclude that the fact of membership at the time of death should have been left to be determined by the jury, and could not have been decided by the court as a matter of law.

2. The main question, however, upon which it is said the learned judge below based his judgment directing a verdict for the defendant, was the opinion entertained by him that the deceased, whatever might have been his status in reference to membership in the association, had no "family at the date of his death to take the benefit." The evidence showed that his wife had died a few months before, and all of his three children, the plaintiffs in the suit, had married and had families of their own, and were living in separate households from their father, and were not dependent upon him for support. Article 5, section 1, of the constitution of the association provides: "On the death of any member the sum of $1,000 shall be paid to his family, each member to be assessed $2.50." What is the meaning of the word "family," as here used? The word is most elastic and flexible, either broad or narrow, according to the subject-matter to which it applies. In its limited sense the word "family" signifies the father, mother, and children. In its ordinary acceptation it means all the relatives who descended from a common progenitor. In its very restricted sense it means husband and wife; father, mother, and children; father and children; mother and children; or children forming the same household. Some general rules of construction have been laid down for our guidance when the word is used in contracts of insurance by mutual insurance companies, benefit societies, and like associations. "Where, under the contract, certain classes of persons only may take the fund, a broad and liberal meaning should be given to the words in which the classes are specified." Niblack, Benefit Societies (2d Ed.) § 175. "Where the word 'family' has been used to designate the class to which the beneficiaries must belong, the courts have not generally given it a strict construction, and relationship, either consanguinal or marital, has not always been insisted upon in order to bring one under this class." 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 963; Carmichael v. N. W. Mut. Ben. Ass'n, 51 Mich. 494, 16 N. W. 871.

When we come to consider the cases where the courts have construed the meaning of the term "family," we find, notwithstanding these general rules, great divergence of construction. Some courts, adopting the liberal construction, have held that the word "family" includes relatives by blood or marriage, even when not living in the same household with the member or dependent on him at the time of his death. In Tepper v. Royal Arcanum, 61 N. J. Eq. 638, 47 Atl. 460, 88 Am. St. Rep. 449, the court holds that stepchildren living apart from the member and independent of him at the time of his death, who had been brought up in his household, could lawfully be designated as members of his "family," even after they had married and left his household. The court in that case construes the word "family," as used in the constitution and by-laws of benefit societies, as including members of the household who, in the usual course of family development, have separated themselves from membership in the family. In Faxon v. Grand Lodge, 87 Ill. App. 262, it was held that the stepmother of a member, who was not living with nor dependent upon the member at the time of his death, was a member of his family, under the meaning of that term as used in the constitution and by-laws of the lodge; she being the only surviving member of his family. For substantially similar rulings, see Lane v. Lane, 90 Tenn. 639, 42 S. W. 1058; Norwegians' Old People's Home Society v. Wilson, 176 Ill. 94, 52 N. E. 41; Hosmer v. Welch, 107 Mich. 470, 65 N. W. 280, 67 N. W. 504; Wilson v. Cochran, 31 Tex. 677, 98 Am. Dec. 553; Hofman v. Grand Lodge, 73 Mo. App. 47; Ferbrache v. Grand Lodge, 81 Mo. App. 268; Klotz v. Klotz (Ky.) 22 S. W. 551. Other courts, following the view of Lord Kenyon in King v. Inhabitants of Darlington, 4 Term Rep. 800, have given to the word "family" a restricted meaning. "In common parlance," said Lord Kenyon, "the family consists of those who live under the same roof with the pater familias; those who form (if I may use the expression) his fireside. But, when they branch out and become the heads of new establishments, they cease to be a part of the father's family." Similar constructions of the word "family," when used in the charter or by-laws of benefit societies, will be found in the following cases: Elsey v. Odd Fellows' Association, 142 Mass. 224, 7 N. E. 844; Tyler v. Odd Fellows' Association, 145 Mass. 134, 13 N. E. 360; Roco v. Green, 50 Tex. 483; Brower v. Supreme Lodge, 87 Mo. App. 614; Zimmerman v. Franke, 34 Kan. 650, 9 Pac. 747.

From a most careful study of conflicting authorities, I deduce the following as the sound rule of construction: Where the word "family" is used to designate the class who shall receive the benefit, any relation who is living with and dependent upon the member, or with whom the member is living and upon whom he is dependent, at the date of his death, is within the designated class and entitled to the benefit. This combines the family relation with the fact of dependence, both of which, I think, should exist in such cases. The construction of this word in the constitution of the association, insisted upon by the able attorney for the association, as meaning wife and dependent minor children, or wife, or dependent minor children, is entirely too narrow, and defeats the benevolent purpose of the association. There might be cases where the member's family consisted of adult children dependent upon him, or where the member himself was dependent upon adult children, who took care of him and paid his dues. Surely in such cases it would be unreasonable to hold that the benefit failed because there was no one to take it. In our opinion, the constitution and by-laws in these associations should be construed by the courts so as to effect their benevolent object, and not to defeat that object. There was some evidence in this case from which the jury could have inferred that the son had paid the dues of his father to the association for some months, and that at the date of his father's death he was living with and was being supported by the son. We think he was entitled to have these questions of fact determined by the jury, and that a direction of a verdict against him was erroneous.

Judgment reversed.

RUSSELL and POWELL, JJ. (specially concurring). With the result reached, and with most of what is said by the Chief Judge in the opinion filed by him, we fully concur. However, we think that the word "family" should be given an even broader meaning than he has given it. Upon the theory, well recognized by the courts in dealing with insurance and similar beneficial contracts, that a death benefit bought and paid for by a person in life should not fall upon his death for lack of a beneficiary competent to take, no hesitancy has been shown, in the construction of such contracts, in giving great elasticity to the meaning of words, where necessary to do so in order to find a beneficiary. Such a rule of construction is desirable from the standpoints both of the insurer and of the insured. One of the chief objections hitherto made against fraternal insurance is that it does not offer freedom in the designation of beneficiaries, and that the member is liable to pay for insurance which can never be collected, by reason of some strict and technical construction of the limitations imposed as to who shall be a beneficiary. The result of a course of judicial construction which liberally construes such contracts, so as to make it more certain that the benefits bought will reach some person or persons whom the member would really wish such benefits to reach, is, therefore, to give popularity to this form of insurance. In such contracts the word "family" has been most liberally extended, wherever necessary to effectuate the beneficial purpose. It is a word which must vary in meaning according to the conditions surrounding the member at the date of his death. From a review of the decisions we deduce the following order of precedence which should ordinarily be observed in determining who are entitled to take under the words "family of the member," or similar designations: (1) Wife and unmarried children, minor or adult; or, if no unmarried children, (2) wife alone; or, if no wife, (3) unmarried children alone; or, if no wife and no unmarried children, (4) persons related by consanguinity or affinity, living with the member in the same household; or, if none of these, (5) any person related by consanguinity or affinity upon whom the member is dependent; or (6) any person related by consanguinity or affinity, dependent on and supported by the member; or, if none of these, (7) married children, irrespective of dependency; or, if none of these, (8) father, mother, brothers and sisters, irrespective of active household connection and irrespective of the question of dependence; and in some instances an even further extension may be made, if necessary, in order to find a beneficiary. The existence of the benefit connotes a contemplated beneficiary, and the law will find one, if possible.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Valdosta; O. M. Smith, Judge.

Action by the Sinclair Lumber Company against the Durant Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Jas. M. Johnson and A. J. Little, for plaintiff in error. G. A. Whitaker, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The Durant Lumber Company bought a car load of lumber from one Wells, who was operating a mill business. The Sinclair & Simms Lumber Company cut the lumber, and shipped it. The Sinclair & Simms Lumber Company, which, for convenience, we will herein call the "Sinclair Company," brought suit in its own name against the Durant Lumber Company, which herein we will likewise call the "Durant Company." For original answer the defendant filed a general denial of the paragraph of the petition alleging indebtedness upon the account. To meet a contention of the plaintiff that Wells was acting as agent of the Sinclair Company in making the contract, the defendant filed an amendment to the answer, in which he set up that, if Wells was agent of the plaintiff, the defendant had no knowledge of the fact, that Wells was indebted to the defendant, and that, as to the remainder of the money beyond Wells' indebtedness to the defendant, it had been paid into court under a garnishment proceeding instituted against Wells by one of his creditors. It appears from the evidence that shortly after Wells made the contract of sale he sold out his business to the Sinclair Company. The contention of the plaintiff is that, before the lumber was cut, Wells notified the Durant Company of this fact, and that Wells, as the agent of the plaintiff, made a new contract, whereby the plaintiff was to cut it instead of him. The defendant denied that it had any intimation that Wells had sold out, or that the Sinclair Company was to cut the lumber, until after it had been shipped. Upon this point the plaintiff's case rests solely upon the following testimony of Wells: "I did tell him [Durant] of the sale a day or two after it was made, and before this lumber was cut that is sued for. I told Mr. Durant that I had sold out, and that the Sinclair & Simms Lumber Company would have to fill the balance of their orders if they were filled; that I had nothing more to do with them. That was before this lumber was cut. Don't remember what Mr. Durant said about that; only he said he wanted his orders filled. I was managing the business of the Sinclair & Simms Lumber Co. Q. You say that just a few days after you sold out to the Sinclair & Simms Lumber Company you put Mr. Durant on notice? A. Yes, sir; I came up here in a day or so after I had sold out, and told him that I had sold out. I told him in that conversation that I would be with the Sinclair & Simms Lumber Company. Q. Was there anything said between you and Mr. Durant about the Sinclair & Simms Lumber Company continuing to cut for him? A. Well, he said he wanted his old orders filled, that he had placed his orders, and he wanted them filled. I told him that I did not have anything to do with them, that was with the Sinclair & Simms Lumber Company. Q. What did he say in that connection? A. He said that he wanted them filled." There was evidence of an indebtedness existing from Wells to the Durant Company at the time that the order was taken and at the time it was filled. On this point the court charged the jury: "The defendant in this case could not take this car of lumber (even if Wells was the agent, and he dealt with him in ignorance of his being the agent and the other parties the principals), and place any part of it to the payment of the account due by W. E. Wells to him which existed prior to this time, or any other account, except payment of money on this particular car; and they don't claim in this case to have paid any money on this particular car, except as paid in court, and there is no evidence to justify a verdict in favor of the defendant on the question of payment, and it resolves itself down to this one question in the case, and there is but one question you are to decide, and that is whether or not the shipment of this car of lumber by plaintiffs in this case to defendants was authorized by defendants." The verdict was in the plaintiff's favor. To the overruling of the motion for a new trial the defendants filed a bill of exceptions, which was signed December 13, 1906, and filed in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court on December 22, 1906. After January 1, 1907, the case, having originated in a city court, was transferred by the Supreme Court to this court. The defendant in error has filed a motion to dismiss the writ of error, on the grounds that on December 13, 1906, the Court of Appeals had exclusive jurisdiction of cases arising in city courts, and the writ of error signed that day was made returnable to the Supreme Court; also that on that date the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction to entertain writs of error from city courts; that the Supreme Court, being without jurisdiction, had no power to transfer the case.

1. We will first dispose of the motion to dismiss the writ of error. It is ill founded. By the constitutional amendment of 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 24) the Supreme Court retained jurisdiction of writs of error from city courts until January 1, 1907. Express power was also conferred on that court to transfer such cases of the class mentioned as were pending therein on January 1, 1907, to the Court of Appeals. Even now, by virtue of another provision of the same constitutional amendment, the Supreme Court may entertain jurisdiction of writs of error in cases not reviewable by that court, to the extent of transferring them to the Court of Appeals, "and the Court of Appeals shall try the cases so transferred." A writ of error which is made returnable to the Supreme Court, when it should be made returnable to the Court of Appeals, is not void. The framers of the constitutional amendment wisely made provision for such cases; for, although frequently there is doubt as to which court has the jurisdiction, the writ of error may in all cases be filed in the Supreme Court, and, if that court finds that the case is within the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals, it will be transferred. This motion to dismiss arises from a misconception of our ruling in Gainesville Midland Ry. v. Jackson, 1 Ga. App. 632, 57 S. E. 1007. While, as held in that case, the Court of Appeals came into existence October 12, 1906, yet this in no wise interferes with the powers reserved to the Supreme Court, under the constitutional amendment creating this court.

2. The judgment must be reversed. Certainly the Sinclair Company could not sue in its own name upon the original contract between Wells and the Durant Company; for he was not the agent of the Sinclair Company when that contract was made. It might have maintained a suit in the name of Wells for its use, but the defendant would have been entitled to the protection of all the defenses it might have had against Wells. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Hart Lumber Co., 58 S. E. 316.

3. Nor was there sufficient evidence of a subsequent new contract, whereby the defendant bought from the Sinclair Company, through Wells as its agent. The evidence upon which the plaintiff must rely to establish that contention is set out above. It shows that Wells notified the defendant that he had sold his sawmill to the plaintiff, and that, if the lumber was cut, the plaintiff would have to cut it. Nowhere does Wells say that the Durant Company agreed to surrender its contract with him and to make a new purchase from the Sinclair Company; but he says that Mr. Durant replied that "he wanted his old order filled, that he had placed his orders, and wanted them filled." The words quoted are apt for the expressing of the idea that Durant insisted on Wells' complying with his contract, even though it were necessary for him to get some one else to cut the lumber, and inept to express the idea that a direct purchase by the Durant Company from the Sinclair Company was contemplated.

4. But, even conceding that the plaintiff's evidence was such as to show that Wells contracted with the defendant as the agent of Sinclair Company, yet, since the defendant denied any knowledge of the agency until after the shipment was made, the court's instructions quoted above were erroneous. While an undisclosed principal may sue upon a contract made with his agent, yet the opposite party to the contract will be entitled to set off any claim he may have against the agent, and not merely such claims as arise out of the particular contract in question. Ruan v. Gunn, 77 Ga. 53; Rosser v. Darden, 82 Ga. 219, 7 S. E. 919, 14 Am. St. Rep. 152.

Judgment reversed.

GOLDSMITH v. STATE. (No. 257.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 10, 1907.)

CRIMINAL LAW—ACCUSATION—AMENDMENT.

A solicitor of a city court may amend an accusation in that court at any time before the defendant therein has pleaded to the merits, provided the affidavit of the prosecutor will legally support the accusation as amended, unless such amendment is forbidden by the act creating such city court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 433½.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Richmond County; W. F. Eve, Judge.

John Goldsmith was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

Isaac S. Peebles, Jr., and Wallace B. Pierce, for plaintiff in error. Jas. C. C. Black, Jr., Sol., and John M. Graham, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The only assignment of error to be passed upon in this case is the complaint that the court erred in allowing the accusation against the plaintiff in error to be amended, and in refusing to quash it. The amendment was permitted before the defendant pleaded, and it consisted in changing the ownership of a pistol alleged to have been stolen and of the house in which it was said to have been contained. The question is thus squarely presented whether the solicitor of the city court of Richmond county has the right to amend an accusation originating in that court and based upon an affidavit of a prosecutor; and, if so, under what circumstances can such amendment be allowed. The thirty-second section of the act creating the city court of Richmond county provides: "Defendants in criminal cases, where the prosecution originates in said city court, or where such defendants are bound over to said city court by any justice of the peace or notary public, shall be tried on written accusations, setting forth plainly the offense charged, founded on affidavit containing the name of the accuser, and signed by the solicitor of said court. The proceedings, after accusation, shall conform to the rules governing in the superior court, except there shall be no jury trial, unless demanded, as hereinbefore provided, by the accused. In all cases tried upon accusations, the offense shall be therein charged with the same particularity, both as to the matter of form and substance, as is required by the laws and rules of criminal pleading to be observed in bills of indictment in the superior courts." Acts 1880-1881, p. 580. The plaintiff in error insists upon the latter portion of the section that the proceedings after accusation shall conform to the rules governing the superior courts, and the offense shall be charged with the same particularity as is required to be observed in bills of indictment in the superior court.

We confess that the determination of the question is not without some difficulty, in view of the language of the act which we have quoted, if considered alone and without reference to the difference between the word "accusation" (as used with special reference to a city court, and not considered in a generic sense) and an indictment. There is, however, a marked difference between accusation and an indictment, which would furnish reasons for allowing an accusation to be amended, while an indictment cannot be except by the grand jury itself before the defendant pleads. The indictment is found upon the oaths of a grand jury, whereas an accusation in a city or county court is based upon the affidavit of the prosecutor; and, if the affidavit of the prosecutor is not amended, the analogy between the two is complete, although an indictment cannot be amended. An accusation is the equivalent of the common-law "information"; and we apprehend, therefore, that, when the act says that the proceedings after the accusation shall conform to the rules governing in the superior court, the Legislature intended to refer to the accusation as it stands when the defendant is finally put upon trial, and not to preclude the right of amending the accusation, either to make it conform to the affidavit on which it is based or to amplify the charge contained in the affidavit, so as to comply with the requirement of the act as to the particularity with which the charge should be set forth. We are satisfied that this is the proper construction to be given the section of the act creating the city court of Richmond county, above quoted. It clearly appears from the following decisions: In Gordon v. State, 102 Ga. 679, 29 S. E. 446, Mr. Justice Cobb said: "The term [accusation], as used in our law in reference to trials in courts having jurisdiction of misdemeanor cases, is but the equivalent of an information at common law." And Justice Fish, speaking for the court, in Wright v. Davis, 120 Ga. 676, 48 S. E. 173, says: "Under the common law, from which most of our ideas of 'due process of law' are derived, an information lies for all misdemeanors, and an information by the attorney or solicitor general * * * is the mere allegation of the prosecuting officer by whom it is preferred." If it be true that an accusation takes the place of a common-law information, an accusation in a city court, in the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, is subject to amendment. In Rex v. Wilkes, 4 Burrows, 2527, Lord Mansfield says: "There is a great difference between amending indictments and amending informations. Indictments are found upon the oaths of a jury, and ought only to be amended by themselves; but informations are as declarations in the king's suit. An officer of the crown has the right of framing them originally, and may, with leave, amend, in like manner as any plaintiff may do. If the amendment can give occasion to a new defense, the defendant has leave to change his plea." There can be no question that the solicitor could have withdrawn the accusation and have preferred a new one. The motion to quash was based upon the fact that he had merely amended the original accusation. If the accusation was not amendable the motion to quash the accusation should have been sustained; and, as this would have been a final disposition of the cause, the overruling of the motion properly presents the allowance of the amendment to this court for review.

The question has not been directly raised in any case which has come under our observation, but, from what has been said above, we are convinced that the allowance of the amendment in this case was not error, because it was made before the defendant pleaded to the merits. The amendment did not conflict with the affidavit, and the act creating the court did not forbid it. In the case of Barlow v. State, 77 Ga. 448, the court did not settle the question now before us, but rather decided what we have already held, that the solicitor could have withdrawn the accusation and have presented another, and held that the defendant would not be heard to complain, because, instead thereof, the accusation was amended, because he himself consented to be tried on the accusation as amended, rather than require another accusation. In the case of Conly v. State, 83 Ga. 498, 10 S. E. 123, the defendant was tried in the city court of Atlanta upon an accusation which failed to allege venue; and an amendment was allowed alleging venue after the evidence had closed. The judgment finding him guilty was reversed because the court did not sustain a motion in arrest of judgment, and the court held that it was too late to amend after the party has been put upon his trial. This was the real question in the case that was to be decided; and the court held that the accusation takes the place of an indictment. But, while this was the only issue in that case, the court, in deciding the case, we think decided this. What might have been considered obiter in that case is based upon the principles announced in the authorities to which we have referred, and is sound law. "The solicitor of the city court, before trial of a criminal case, and before the selection of a jury, can at any time amend the accusation as he may deem proper." This rule does not admit in its fullness the statement made by Justice Blandford, that "the accusation takes the place of an indictment." The rule is based upon a recognition that here is a substantial difference between the two, and that if the affidavit upon which the accusation sought to be amended is based is for any reason insufficient, or incompatible with the accusation as amended, the amendment cannot be allowed, but the state will be forced to procure a new affidavit and a new accusation thereon. In this case, as the defendant was charged in the affidavit with "misdemeanor—larceny from the house," without more, the affidavit was as applicable to the accusation as amended as to the original.

Judgment affirmed.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREETS—OBSTRUCTIONS—LIABILITY.

A city may by reasonable ordinance limit the amount of space in the street which may be occupied by material assembled for the erection of a building on an abutting lot. A violation of such an ordinance is, as against a member of the public using the street for ordinary travel and injured by reason of such violation, per se wrongful and negligent; and the court may so instruct the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, §§ 1688-1689.]

2. SAME—NEGLIGENCE OF PEDESTRIAN.

Pedestrians have the right to use the entire highway, and are not confined to the sidewalks alone. If a pedestrian leaves the sidewalk and enters upon the portion of the highway devoted primarily to vehicles, the surroundings may require of him the exercise of a greater amount of care and caution for his own protection than if he had remained upon the sidewalk; but the question of his negligence under the circumstances is one for the jury.

3. SAME—EVIDENCE.

There being evidence justifying a finding that the defendant was negligent, that the plaintiff was injured as the proximate result thereof, and that the plaintiff was not guilty of such contributory negligence as to defeat a recovery, the verdict in the latter's favor is sustained.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Kate Homer against the William Bensel Construction Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson, for plaintiff in error. Jas. L. Key, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Mrs. Homer recovered a verdict against the William Bensel Construction Company for personal injuries; and the latter, its motion for a new trial having been overruled, brings error.

The defendant was engaged in erecting a building on the north side of Trinity avenue, in the city of Atlanta, and, under building permits and a city ordinance allowing the laying of building material on the street and sidewalk to the extent of one-half the width thereof, had piled lumber and other building material in the street. Mrs. Homer lived on the north side of Trinity avenue, just above the place where the building was being erected, and, returning home after nightfall, she stumbled over a piece of scantling projecting from underneath a pile of lumber, fell, and sustained injuries. According to her testimony, which is to be taken as true (although contradicted), since the jury decided in her favor, the pile of lumber covered more than one-half of the width of the street, and the sidewalk was totally obstructed. The piece of scantling over which she stumbled projected about five feet further out into the street than did the outer margin of the pile of lumber. A city ordinance required the placing of lighted lanterns so as to mark the corners of such obstructions; and, while three lanterns were placed on the lumber, they were not so placed as to indicate that there was any obstruction beyond the margin of the lumber, and, owing to the darkness, the plaintiff did not see the scantling. She knew that the building was going on, and that lumber was piled in the street, but did not know of this scantling, as it had been placed there since she had last passed the place where it was. Coming up Trinity avenue towards her home, when she reached the obstruction on the sidewalk, she attempted to go around it in the street, though she could have avoided it by using the sidewalk on the south side of the avenue. The ordinance of the city provides (omitting immaterial parts): "Any person or persons actually building, or about to build or repair any building, may collect and lay all such materials as may be necessary for such building or repairs in the street, lane, or alley next adjoining to or in front of such building or repairs, and such person or persons so building or repairing shall have the privilege of using one half of the sidewalk and one half of the width of the street adjoining or in front of said building or repairs; during all such time as such materials shall so lie in any street, lane, or alley, the owner or proprietor of such materials shall cause a lamp or lantern, with good and sufficient light therein, to be securely hung up, placed or fixed on a post, or otherwise, at each of the two corners of such enclosure projecting into the said street, lane, or alley, and in such manner as clearly and plainly to show the place and extent occupied by such material."

It is urged by the plaintiff in error that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, because the plaintiff by ordinary care could have avoided the injury, and because the negligence, if any, of the defendant, was not the proximate cause of the injuries. Exception is also taken to the following instructions of the court to the jury: "This defendant had the right, under the permit issued to it by the city, to use one-half of the width of the street in laying its material, piling, and keeping it during the progress of the building, but it did not have the right to go any further than half the width of the street; and, if it used any more than half the width of the street for the purpose, such use, beyond a half of it, was in violation of the city ordinance, and unlawful, and it would be as against any person who sustained injury on account of such violation. If such person did sustain injury, negligence as against that person. But if they did not exceed half the width of the street, gentlemen, if they were within their legal rights as defined under this ordinance, then, so far as their acts being a question of negligence as a matter of law, there would be no negligence, if they did not violate the ordinance." Also: "This clause of the ordinance means just what it says, expressed in plain English words, and I cannot make it any clearer by enlarging upon it. If there was a failure on the part of the defendant to comply with that clause of the section with reference to the lights, that would be a violation of the ordinance, and, as against any person injured on account of it, would be negligence as a matter of law, and you would so consider it. If there was no violation of its terms, to which I called your attention, then as a matter of law, gentlemen, there would be no negligence with reference to the lights, but would become a question for you, under the instructions which I shall now give you on the general subject of negligence." Also: "So far as going along the street is concerned, as a matter of law a pedestrian—that is, one walking—has the legal right to walk on any part of the street, as well as the sidewalk. Now, whether a pedestrian, or person walking, is in violation of ordinary care in going upon any part of the street at any time, or at a given time and place, under a given state of circumstances and facts, is a question for the jury to determine. Whether ordinary care required one not to have done it, or whether one could have done it in the exercise of ordinary care, it becomes a question of fact for the jury to say what ordinary care required under the circumstances." Other exceptions were taken; but, as they do not involve any new or interesting questions, we shall not elaborate them, but merely state that they present no error.

1. An unlawful obstruction to the free and safe passage along a public street is a nuisance; and ordinarily a person specially injured thereby has a cause of action. Brooks v. Atlanta, 1 Ga. App. 678, 57 S. E. 1081, and citations. The city may by a reasonable ordinance limit the amount of space in the street which may be occupied by material assembled for the erection of a building on an abutting lot. No complaint is made that the ordinance in question is unreasonable or invalid. As against a member of the public injured as the proximate result thereof, a violation of such an ordinance is per se wrongful and negligent; and the court may so instruct the jury. This is no invasion of the province of the jury to determine questions of negligence from the facts proved; for, if the ordinance and the violation be shown, the negligence follows as a matter of law. Central Ry. Co. v. Bond, 111 Ga. 14 (7), 17, 36 S. E. 299, and citations. Likewise, where the city ordinance requires the placing of lanterns to indicate the presence and the boundaries of obstructions permitted in the streets, noncompliance with the requirement is negligent. Wilson v. White, 71 Ga. 506, 51 Am. Rep. 269.

2. We think the instruction of the court upon the subject of the right of a pedestrian to use the street, instead of confining himself to the highway, correctly states the law. The entire highway is for the use of pedestrians; and, if a person on foot leaves the sidewalk and goes upon the portion of the street devoted primarily to the use of vehicles, he is not necessarily negligent. The circumstances may require of him a greater amount of care and caution for his own protection than if he remained upon the sidewalk; but this is all an open question for the jury. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Atlanta, B. & A. Ry. Co., 125 Ga. 529, 54 S. E. 736; Brunswick R. Co. v. Gibson, 97 Ga. 498, 25 S. E. 484.

3. We cannot hold that the plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as to defeat her recovery. We presume that this question was fairly submitted to the jury, as there is no complaint to the contrary. We cannot say as a matter of law that common prudence demands that a pedestrian who, walking along the sidewalk on one side of the street, meets with an obstruction, shall, in order to reach a point further along on the same side of the street, cross to the opposite sidewalk, proceed till the obstruction be passed, and then recross, rather than to attempt to go around the obstruction by using that portion of the street which under the law should not be obstructed and which the location of the danger signals does not indicate to be obstructed. Nor can we say that the violation of the ordinance in question was not the proximate cause of the injury. It is true that if the lumber had been piled within the lawful limits, and the projecting scantling had also been situated within those bounds, and the plaintiff had attempted to pass as close to the lumber as she did, in all probability she would have been injured just as she was. If this had been the case, and lanterns properly placed had indicated the presence of the scantling or other obstruction within the boundaries so marked out, and the plaintiff had transgressed within these bounds, she could not have recovered. She then would have been injured, but the defendant would have been free from wrong, and therefore not responsible; but such is not the case. The defendant wrongfully placed an obstruction where it did not have the right to place it. The plaintiff, using the highway in the exercise of ordinary care, and without notice of the presence of the obstruction, fell over it and was injured. These are the facts found to be true by the jury; and the recovery is therefore sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

HILL, C. J. The defendant was convicted for a violation of Pen. Code 1895, § 670, the general section on the subject of cheating and swindling. The specific acts alleged as constituting the offense are set out in the accusation as follows: Said defendant "did on the 14th day of November, 1905, in county of Fayette, by using deceitful means or artful practices other than those mentioned in volume 3, Code of Georgia of 1895, cheat and defraud Charlie Bussey to the extent of ten dollars, * * * said deceitful means and artful practice consisting in the said Franklin representing to said Charles Bussey that he had sworn out an accusation against said Bussey in the city court of Fayetteville for disturbing divine worship, said representation being false and fraudulent," etc. The evidence showed that the defendant was the pastor of a church in the country; that the prosecutor, Bussey, had by disorderly conduct disturbed the congregation assembled in the church while engaged in divine worship. The defendant proposed to prosecute him for this offense; and, while he did not actually swear out the accusation, he intended to do so, and did not carry out such intention because of the payment of $10. We think, under these facts, the conviction was without evidence, and was contrary to law. The prosecutor was not defrauded or cheated by representations made by the defendant. Neither was such representation deceitful or artful. The defendant did accuse the prosecutor of disturbing his congregation lawfully assembled for divine worship, and agreed not to press the prosecution or accusation if he was paid $10. The $10 was paid, and, according to promise, no prosecution was instituted. While the conduct of the defendant or pastor does not show a very high standard of morality, yet it falls short of a penal offense.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Douglas; C. T. Roan, Judge.

Action by O. B. Porter against A. C. Terrell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Rogers & Heath and J. W. Quincey, for plaintiff in error. F. Willis Dart, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff sought a general judgment against the defendant and a special judgment against certain real estate belonging to her, against which he alleged he was entitled to enforce his lien as a contractor and materialman. The petition alleged a balance to be due for material furnished and work done by him under a contract with the defendant as to certain water connections, sewerage connections, and plumbing in a certain house and on real estate alleged to have been owned by defendant, in the city of Douglas. The petition averred that the material was furnished and work performed under a contract made with the defendant, Mrs. Alice C. Terrell herself, and that she paid him on said contract the sum of $68.63, leaving the balance sued for, which she refused to pay. It was further alleged that plaintiff was entitled to a lien "upon said real estate and the house and improvements put therein for the balance of said sum of $44.94," and that he had recorded his claim of lien as required by law and brought his action within the time prescribed. His prayers were for a general judgment against the defendant and a special judgment against the real estate described. The defendant filed an answer, in which she denied generally the allegations as thus pleaded, and specially denied that she was indebted to the plaintiff in any manner or form, and further alleged that the plaintiff was not entitled to and had no valid lien on the premises described in his petition, and was not entitled to a judgment against her, either general or special.

The testimony for the plaintiff showed that W. W. Terrell, the husband of the defendant, alone had employed him and contracted with him to do the work, and furnish the material set out in the bill of particulars attached to his petition, that the plaintiff had done the work and furnished materials, and that it was all worth $113.57, and that this had been paid by the said W. W. Terrell, except $44.94, which he refused to pay, claiming that what he had paid was as much as the material and work were worth. After the plaintiff had completed his work and furnished the material therefor, and when he went to record his lien for the balance claimed by him, he discovered that the real estate in question did not belong to W. W. Terrell, but was the property of his wife, Mrs. Alice C. Terrell, and the plaintiff thereupon made out and recorded his lien against the wife. There was not the slightest suggestion even that the plaintiff had any contract, agreement, or understanding, directly or indirectly, with Mrs. Terrell in regard to the material or work in question; and the only reference made to her at all was the fact that she was present a part of the time while the work was being done and made some suggestions as to putting in an extra wash basin, coupled, however, with the injunction to see her husband about the matter first, which the plaintiff did.

Such contract as the plaintiff had was solely with W. W. Terrell, the account was charged to him, and he made all of the payments thereon, as heretofore stated.

The plaintiff also offered in evidence a certified copy of the lien recorded at his instance, which was in the following language: "Georgia, Coffee County. The undersigned, C. B. Porter, a mechanic, claims a lien upon certain waterworks and sewerage erected and put in one dwelling house and premises owned and occupied by Mrs. Alice C. Terrell, situated on the corner of Sycamore and Madison streets, in the city of Douglas. Said lien is claimed for material and plumbing work done by the undersigned in said structure and on the premises. The amount for which the undersigned claims this lien is forty-four dollars and 94 cents. And, now within three months since the same was done, the undersigned records this lien therefor in the office of the clerk of the superior court of the county where said property is situated as aforesaid, pursuant to the provisions of section 2804 (2) of the Civil Code. This December 14, 1906. C. B. Porter." "Recorded December 14, 1906. Sessions Fales, Clerk Superior Court." "Clerk's office, Coffee Superior Court. I, J. R. Overman, clerk of the superior court of Coffee county, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing, is a true copy of the original lien now of record in my office, on Mortgage Record, No. 14, page 501. This March 18, 1907. J. R. Overman, Clerk superior court, Coffee county Georgia." This certified copy was objected to upon the ground that the proper foundation had not been laid, and generally upon the ground that the evidence in the case showed a contract with W. W. Terrell, instead of with the defendant, and did not show any right of the plaintiff to connect the defendant with the contract. The court sustained the objections, and ruled that the copy lien could not be admitted as evidence. The plaintiff then closed, and, upon motion of the defendant's counsel, the court awarded a nonsuit, passing the following judgment: "Upon motion of defendant, a nonsuit is hereby granted in this case, upon the ground that the plaintiff fails to show such facts as entitle him to recover in said case." The plaintiff in error excepts to the ruling of the court excluding the certified copy of lien and to the judgment of nonsuit. The evidence may have been sufficient to establish the loss of the original claim of lien, but it is immaterial whether this is so or not. If this paper was properly identified before us, we could not reverse the judgment of the trial judge, although he may have excluded the paper for the wrong reason. It would have been properly excluded because it failed to set forth a claim of lien on anything except the waterworks and sewerage put in the dwelling house and premises.

not claim a lien on the real estate as set forth by the Code. But, even if the judge's court erred in excluding this paper, under the well-settled rulings of the Supreme Court, we cannot ourselves consider the paper, by reason of the fact that it is neither included in the bill of exceptions nor identified by the trial judge, and does not precede his certificate. For want of this identification, we cannot lawfully know the contents of the paper excluded by the trial court, so as to be able to determine whether the ruling was in fact erroneous. Whether this paper be defective or not, without it a special judgment could not be rendered, and no special lien could be created.

We come next to consider whether there was error in awarding the nonsuit, for the reason that the plaintiff was entitled to a general judgment. We do not think the court erred in adjudging a nonsuit. The evidence did not establish the fact that the defendant was an undisclosed principal, and that the husband was her agent. There is in the evidence no suggestion that the plaintiff had any contract, agreement, or understanding with Mrs. Terrell in regard to the material or work in question. The only reference made to her in the evidence is the statement that she was present part of the time while the work was being done, and made a suggestion as to putting in a certain wash basin, coupled, however, with the injunction to see her husband about the matter first, which the plaintiff did. There was no stipulated price to be paid for the work to be done, and no evidence that the defendant authorized it to be done. Nor does any reason appear from the evidence why the plaintiff would not have done the work for the husband. Such contract as plaintiff had was with W. W. Terrell only. The account was charged to him, and he made all the payments thereon. There was no escape from a nonsuit, because the plaintiff alleged contractual relations with the defendant, and there was no testimony tending to support this allegation. "A materialman's lien does not arise against the real estate of the true owner unless the material is furnished directly to the true owner, or to one who occupied the legal relation of a contractor, or one who had some contractual relation with the true owner in connection with the improvements to be made." Pittsburgh Glass Co. v. Peters Land Co., 123 Ga. 726, 51 S. E. 725; Jennings v. Huggins, 125 Ga. 340, 54 S. E. 169. The title of the true owner cannot be incumbered by a lien without some act on his part signifying his assent. Repairs or additions might be made at the direction of a disseisor, trespasser, or tenant, and "might even be improvements and add to the value of the property, and yet might not be of a character which the owner desired placed on his land. If the real estate could be subjected to a lien under such circumstances, he might be called upon to pay for that which the next week he would cause to be torn down and removed. It frequently happens that the lot and a new house sell for less than the cost of building, and it is unfortunately true that one is often improved out of his estate. But, before this can be done, he must at least consent to the making of the disastrous improvement." Reppard v. Morrison, 120 Ga. 30, 47 S. E. 555.

We have only referred to these decisions upon the subject of liens because the plaintiff in error strenuously insists that plaintiff was entitled to a general judgment, and the same doctrine of agency or authority to act would be applicable to bind the defendant for the contract of her husband and subject her to a general judgment as would be necessary were the assignment as to the special judgment properly before us. The only real question, therefore, is whether, the relation of husband and wife being shown, a finding is required that the latter shall in any and all events be bound therefor, where the husband for any reason sees fit, of his own accord and upon his own responsibility, to make expenditures upon premises which happen to be owned by the wife, but which were not the basis of the credit extended, or whether the creditor in such cases shall be required to prove other facts or circumstances in addition to the relationship, showing it to be right and proper that the wife shall be bound for the contract. If the husband is acting as agent for his wife and she is simply the undisclosed principal, of course, her liability cannot be questioned any more than if he had, with her assistance, concealed or misled the contractor as to the true ownership of the property, to improve which work or material was furnished. The authorities cited by the plaintiff in error upon the subject of an undisclosed principal are not applicable to the facts of this case. Where the wife is the principal and the husband agent, there are generally at least some circumstances pointing to that conclusion. None such appear in this case. In the absence of evidence of any peculiar circumstances, no conclusive presumption arises, from proof of the relation of husband and wife, that a husband may not present his wife with a new bath tub, or that he may not have put it in the house for his own use and benefit, although the wife may own the real estate. Under the decisions in the cases of Colquitt v. Solomon, 61 Ga. 494, Masland v. Kemp, 70 Ga. 786, and other cases cited, there can be no question that, even if the copy lien tendered should have been allowed as evidence, it cannot be considered by this court. It is attached to the bill of exceptions on a separate sheet and following the judge's certificate. It is not identified by the judge's signature as being the "Exhibit A" referred to in the bill of exceptions. Certainly, therefore, there could not have been a special judgment against the defendant; and as, in our opinion, the plaintiff's evidence fails to show that the wife was the undisclosed principal of her husband, and the evidence showed, without contradiction, that the employment was procured by the husband, the work done according to his suggestion and wishes, and all the payments made by him, there could have been no general judgment against the defendant. There was no error in the judgment awarding a nonsuit.

Judgment affirmed.

HENDRIX v. ELLIOTT. (No. 429.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 10, 1907.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—PLEADING—AMENDMENT.

An account attached to a summons in a justice's court, and set forth in the following language, to wit: "A. to B. dr., to commissions on sales on real estate to Dr. Grove, as per agreement, $75.00"—sufficiently indicates and specifies "some particular fact or transaction as a cause of action" to authorize an amendment amplifying the details and circumstances of the particular transaction.

2. SAME.

A rule of liberal construction is to be applied to section 4118 of the Civil Code of 1895, because the same degree of strictness and precision is not required in justices' courts as in courts of higher jurisdiction. If a defendant in the justice's court is informed of the nature of the plaintiff's demand against him, the purpose of the law is fulfilled.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by J. H. Elliott against J. H. Hendrix. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed on appeal, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. H. Terrell, for plaintiff in error. Aldine Chambers and Wm. M. Smith, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. This suit started in the justice's court. It was appealed to the superior court. The summons called the defendant to answer to an action of debt due on account. Attached to the summons was the following copy of the account: "J. H. Hendrix, to J. H. Elliott, dr., to commissions on sales of real estate to Dr. Grove, as per agreement, $75.00." After the appeal to the superior court, the defendant moved to dismiss the case, "on the ground that no cause of action was set forth in the case of the alleged account attached to the summons." The court overruled this motion, and allowed the plaintiff to amend by setting forth with greater particularity the sales referred to and how the indebtedness for commissions was created. The defendant excepted pendente lite to the overruling of his motion to dismiss, and to the allowance of the amendment. There is no assignment of error in the bill of exceptions as to the rulings to which exceptions were taken pendente lite; and, while error may be assigned as to the subject-matter of exceptions pendente lite by distinct assignment of error in the brief or written argument in this court, it is doubtful

In this case whether there is anything even thus presented to our consideration in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error. As, however, several authorities are referred to, and the point is made that there was nothing to amend by so far as the amendment allowed was concerned, we will consider the brief as containing an assignment of error as to the orders complained of in the exceptions pendente lite.

We think the trial judge did right in requiring the plaintiff to amend, and in refusing to dismiss the case. Really no amendment was necessary. As held by this court in Georgia So. Ry. Co. v. Barfield, 1 Ga. App. 203, 58 S. E. 236, niceties in pleading are not required in justices' courts. The requirement of Civ. Code 1895, § 4116, was certainly sufficiently complied with by the allowance of the amendment, and the statement, "to commissions on sales of real estate to Dr. Grove, as per agreement, $75.00," set forth a cause of action. The use of the word "commissions" indicated clearly that the plaintiff claimed either a percentage or a fixed amount for services as an agent, representing either the seller or the buyer in the purchase of property. The word "sales" put the defendant on notice that there was more than one of the transactions involved. It was clearly stated that the sales for which plaintiff claimed compensation were of real estate. The transactions were then particularly identified by stating that one Dr. Grove was the purchaser of the pieces of real estate in the sale of which plaintiff was concerned and for which he claimed compensation, and the matter was still further identified by the statement that there had been an agreement in reference to the commissions, which, in the absence of anything to the contrary, could only be inferred to be between plaintiff and defendant. "A petition showing a plaintiff and a defendant, and setting out sufficient to indicate and specify some particular fact or transaction as a cause of action, is enough to amend by." Civ. Code 1895, § 5098. The plaintiff in error cites us to the cases of Thomas v. Forsyth Chair Co., 119 Ga. 693, 46 S. E. 869, Powell v. Alford, 113 Ga. 979, 30 S. E. 449, and M. & B. R. Co. v. Walton, 121 Ga. 275, 48 S. E. 940, to establish the proposition that the cause of action is not set forth with sufficient certainty. None of these cases would be applicable to the cause of action attached to the summons in this case. As we have shown, the statement as to the account indicates and sufficiently specifies a particular transaction as required by the Code. The defendant is given notice of what he is required to meet. In the first case cited by counsel for plaintiff in error the judgment was reversed, not only because no bill of particulars was attached to the summons, but because there was nothing to furnish reasonable notice to the defendant as to the character of the plaintiff's demand. By an examination of the original record in Thomas v. Forsyth Chair Co., in the clerk's office of the Supreme Court, we find that the account attached in that case to the summons contained no reference whatever to what it was for—no bill of particulars. It was as follows: "Thomas & Blake in account with Forsyth Chair Company. Chairs and rockers, 1901. April 30, $22.00. Sept. 12, $8.50. $30.50." Following that account are two statements, both dated September 12th—one for "one dozen 156, duplicate, $8.50"; the other "two dozen 60, $17.00, half dozen 156, $23.00, less rebate $1.00, leaving $22.00." It is clear from these accounts that no one could tell what plaintiff purchased from defendant. In Powell v. Alford, Alford was sued as a guarantor, and judgment was rendered against him as a principal. The case was taken by certiorari to the superior court, where the certiorari was sustained and the judgment against Alford set aside on the express ground that, having been sued as a guarantor, a judgment against him as principal could not be sustained; the court holding as follows: "The suit was against J. F. Wood and G. W. Alford as guarantor. No amendment was made either to the summons or the account sued on, both of which stated Alford to be guarantor. I cannot surmise a possible amendment or send the case back on such a surmise. The plaintiff, having so sued Alford, must so recover against him, if at all. He could not, in such a suit, recover against him as sole principal debtor." The case was then carried to the Supreme Court by writ of error and the judgment of the trial court affirmed; the court holding: "The plaintiff in an action in a justice's court must set forth with some degree of certainty his cause of action, and, having done so, must recover, if at all, upon the cause as laid, and cannot recover upon a different and distinct ground of liability." The holding thus embraced two ideas only: One, that the cause of action in that case was set forth with certainty; and the other, that, being thus set forth, the plaintiff must recover on his cause of action as laid, and can, in no event, recover on a totally different cause of action. While in the third case cited by counsel for plaintiff in error it was held that, on motion to dismiss, the action was proper where no cause of action was set forth (even after an appeal had been entered to the superior court) and that that motion should have been sustained in the case then being considered, still the decision in that case is authority for what we now hold. The court in deciding that there was nothing in the statement of account in that case to put the defendant upon notice of the character of plaintiff's claim, inferentially decided, in the spirit of the Code, that where, as in this case, there is ample statement to put the defendant on notice and enable him to prepare his defense, the suit should not be dismissed.

The plaintiff in error also relies upon the decision of Atlanta Ry. Co. v. Shippen, 126 Ga. 784, 55 S. E. 1031. The decision in that case is simply that the suit should have been dismissed because it was doubtful what was the character of the claim sought to be recovered. As said by the Supreme Court: "It might be construed to be a claim for an overcharge. It might be construed to be a claim for a penalty. * * * The penalty for the use of * * * such equivocal language is a dismissal, if the most unfavorable construction would oust the court of jurisdiction. * * * There was no amendment in this case, and the penalty for equivocal language should have been imposed and the case dismissed." The only points in the decision are that, under the facts stated, the suit could be construed as one for penalty without an amendment, and should, therefore, have been dismissed, and that by amendment it could have been saved, the court referring to Atla. R. Co. v. Ga. Ry. Co., 125 Ga. 798, 54 S. E. 753, in which the plaintiff saved his case by amendment. The defendant in error seems to have had the latter case in mind in preparation of the amendment allowed in this case. If there were ambiguity in the cause of action as originally set forth, it was relieved by the amendment. There was no error in allowing the amendment, or in overruling the motion to dismiss. The exception taken to the order overruling the motion for new trial is without merit. The plaintiff fully established his case, if the jury preferred to believe him and his witnesses in preference to the testimony of the defendant, which was uncorroborated; and, the trial judge having approved the finding of the jury, we have neither the power nor the disposition to disturb their verdict as to the facts, nor to interfere with the proper judgment of the court in the premises.

Judgment affirmed.

KAMINSKY v. HERRIGAN, Sheriff. (No. 198.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 18, 1907.)

1. EXECUTION—AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY—REPLEVY BOND.

The obligation of a replevy bond, filed with an affidavit of illegality, is to redeliver the goods at the time and place of sale.

2. BANKRUPTCY—LIEN OF JUDGMENT—EXECUTION—REPLEVY BOND.

The lien of a judgment obtained more than four months prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy is superior to the adjudication in bankruptcy; and the adjudication of the principal in a replevy bond to be a bankrupt does not relieve the surety from the obligation of his bond, especially where such surety takes no step to bring such lien to the attention of the bankruptcy court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 6, Bankruptcy, § 306.]

3. SAME—AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY—REPLEVY BOND.

Where property is levied upon, and it is replevied, the principal or surety must show why the identical property levied upon is not delivered; and, where such writ is brought upon such bond, the burden of proof is upon the defendant surety, and not upon the plaintiff, to show sufficient reason why such property is not produced.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Savannah; T. M. Norwood, Judge.

Action by J. J. Horrigan, sheriff, for use, etc., against L. Kaminsky. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Osborne & Lawrence and E. H. Abrahams, for plaintiff in error. Geo. W. Owens, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. On November 5, 1903, Horrigan, sheriff of the city court of Savannah, levied an execution in favor of Max Ripps for the sum of $192.26 and costs upon the stock of goods of one I. Berendt; the return of the levy being as follows: "On and by virtue of the within execution, I have this day levied upon the following property belonging to one I. Berendt: The stock of goods now in the storehouse kept by said Berendt on the southwest corner of York and East Broad streets, Savannah, Georgia." Berendt contested the levy by affidavit of illegality, and gave a forthcoming bond for the property, with Kaminsky, plaintiff in error, as surety on the bond; the words of description of the property replevied, employed in the bond, being the same as those used in the levy. The affidavit of illegality was filed on December 15, 1903, and the bond was executed on the same day. The condition of the bond was such that should Berendt deliver said property so levied on at the time and place of sale, in the event said illegality should be dismissed by the court or be withdrawn, or should L. Kaminsky do so for him, then said bond to be void; else of full force and effect. The illegality was dismissed by the court on the 11th day of July, 1904. On May 23, 1904, Berendt applied for homestead, filing schedule showing the stock of goods as owned by him as part of his assets, approximating $1,500 in value. On July 23, 1904, the stock of goods in the storehouse kept by I. Berendt on the southwest corner of York and East Broad streets, Savannah, Ga., as the property of said I. Berendt, was surrendered into the custody of the bankrupt court of the United States for the Eastern Division of the Southern District of Georgia, and on July 23, 1904, Berendt was adjudicated an involuntary bankrupt. Under the order of the referee in bankruptcy, the property as above described was sold by the trustee in bankruptcy at public outcry, and brought the sum of $560. After the adjudication in bankruptcy had been made, the affidavit of illegality was dismissed in the state court; and, when the sheriff went to make demand for the goods, he found the same in charge of the deputy marshal of the United States, acting as custodian of the bankruptcy court. The surety pointed out the goods to the sheriff, but delivery was refused by the marshal.

The defendant in error filed his suit to the May term, 1905, of the city court of Savannah, alleging as follows: That I. Berendt and L. Kaminsky were residents of the city of Savannah; that at the November term, 1903, of the city court of Savannah, Max Ripps obtained judgment against the said I. Berendt for $192.26 principal, and interest from November 26, 1902, and costs of court; and that on said date an execution was issued from said court on said judgment and levied on that day on the stock of goods then in the storehouse of I. Berendt, on the southwest corner of York and East Broad streets, in the city of Savannah; that on the 15th day of December, 1903, said Berendt filed his affidavit of illegality to said execution, and gave bond in terms of the law, with said L. Kaminsky as surety on the same, conditioned that should said Berendt deliver said property so levied on at the time and place of sale, in the event said illegality should be dismissed by the court, or withdrawn, or should the said L. Kaminsky so do for him, then said bond to be void, else of full force and effect; that subsequently said illegality was dismissed by the court on the 11th day of July, 1904, and that, subsequent to the filing of the said illegality, said Berendt filed his petition for a homestead in the court of ordinary of Chatham county, and subsequent to filing said petition for homestead filed a petition in bankruptcy in the United States court, for the Southern District and Eastern Division of Georgia, in which he also claimed a homestead, and that on the 23d day of July, 1904, this last petition was referred to the referee in bankruptcy, and on the 28th day of July, 1904, Berendt was adjudicated a bankrupt, and that on the 17th day of August, 1904, a trustee was appointed for said bankrupt's estate, who duly qualified and filed his petition for authority to sell all of the property belonging to said bankrupt's estate, and that an order was duly passed giving said authority on the 10th day of October, and the trustee filed his report of the sale on the 20th day of December, 1904, showing that all of the property of the said Berendt had been sold for the sum of $560, which sale was duly confirmed; and that on the 29th day of November, 1904, said trustee filed his report of the property set apart to said Berendt as a homestead, and an order was passed approving said report, whereby all of the property of Berendt was set aside to him as a homestead. Petitioner further showed that from the date of said levy, namely, November 5, 1903, to the 23d day of July, 1904, when the marshal of the United States court took possession of the stock of goods of Berendt, the said Berendt had remained in possession of the stock of goods levied on previously by the sheriff, and continued to sell the same in due course of business, and continued to do business in his store on the southwest corner of York and East Broad streets, in the city of Savannah, and that, by virtue of the above facts, it was impossible to advertise said property of Berendt for sale or to require him or his surety aforesaid to produce the same at the time and place of sale, whereby the principal and surety became indebted to the petitioner for the use of Max Ripps in the amount of his bond.

In reply to plaintiff's petition the defendant denied the allegation in all other paragraphs, except that he resided in Chatham county; and set up that, though he admitted the execution of the bond described in the petition, he was not liable thereon, because on the 28th day of July, 1904, Berendt was adjudicated a bankrupt, and on the 29th day of November, 1904, he received his discharge in bankruptcy, whereby Max Ripps became barred from further proceeding against the defendant, and for the further reason that all of the property for the forthcoming of which said bond had been given was taken charge of by the bankruptcy court and administered by it, and that, by reason of said administration, he was unable to produce or deliver said goods upon the demand of the plaintiff in this case.

Before the trial of the case, plaintiff amended his petition as follows: "Your petitioner further shows that from the date of said levy, to wit, November 5, 1903, to the 23d day of July, 1904, when the marshal of the United States court took possession of the then stock of goods of the said Berendt, he, the said Berendt, remained in possession of the stock of goods levied on by the sheriff of the court, and continued to sell the same in due course of business, and continued to do business in his store on the southwest corner of York and East Broad streets, in the city of Savannah." To this amendment the defendant demurred, but it was allowed by the court; and to the averment of said amendment the defendant filed no plea.

This case was evidently tried in the court below on the single issue as to whether the stock of goods taken charge of by the United States marshal in aid of the proceedings in bankruptcy was the same stock of goods levied on by the sheriff. The contention of the plaintiff was that, before the marshal took charge of the property, the stock of goods had been changed or disposed of by sale from time to time until more than enough of the stock had been dissipated to pay the plaintiff's debt. The defendant's surety contended that the stock of goods was the same, and that as a surety he was relieved from liability on the forthcoming bond by reason of the fact that the property was placed beyond the power of his principal and himself on account of its seizure by the bankrupt court. We would find no fault with the judgment of the lower court if this were a real issue which should have been determined; for it appears that the stock was for nearly eight months in the custody of the defendant Berendt, and that his doors remained open for business, and we think the jury could have reasonably inferred that in that length of time as small an amount as $192 worth of goods in stock must have been sold or disposed of. We think it, however, fruitless to discuss the various assignments of error arising from a trial predicated upon the theory to which we have alluded. The errors committed, if any, were immaterial. The real issue in the case was whether the surety was liable on his bond for the nonproduction of the property according to the terms of his obligation. Under the agreed statement of facts, he was liable, because the proceedings in bankruptcy were not instituted for more than four months after the levy of the sheriff. The lien was not divested by the proceedings in bankruptcy. Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, §§ 67, 67½, 30 Stat. 564, 565 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3449, 3450]; Dozier v. McWhorter, 113 Ga. 584, 39 S. E. 106. Neither the trustee in bankruptcy nor the United States marshal was entitled to the possession of the goods; and when Berendt, the principal, surrendered them to the bankrupt court, it was the duty of the surety to bring to the attention of that court the fact that the stock of goods was subject to the lien of the fi. fa. which had been levied upon them, and to have procured their release for his own protection. Having tacitly consented to the surrender of this stock of goods, it does not lie in his mouth to claim an advantage from that which he could himself have prevented. In so far as the homestead is concerned, it appears to have been taken in the residue of the stock of goods after the adjudication in bankruptcy, and to have been dependent entirely upon it. As the stock of goods under levy should not have been turned over to the bankrupt court, and as this disposition could have been prevented by the surety, he can derive no benefit from that. As said by the Supreme Court in Fleming v. Odum, 59 Ga. 363: "The personal property was in the hands of the sheriff on final process, and the assignee in bankruptcy could not dispossess him legally of it." And in this case the property levied upon was in the hands of the principal (only by reason of the bond upon which the defendant Kaminsky was surety), and the trustee in bankruptcy could not have dispossessed him if the surety had interposed proper and timely objections. The defendant failed to carry the burden resting upon him. The admission in his answer that he executed the bond, and that the goods were not produced in accordance with its terms, put upon the defendant the burden of showing that all of the goods levied upon had been set apart, and that none of them were sold.

In this view of the case, we think that the verdict for the plaintiff was demanded by the evidence; and, as none of the exceptions taken addressed themselves to this, the true view of the case, they need not be noticed.

Judgment affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Mt. Vernon; J. B. Gelger, Judge.

Martha Mimbs was convicted of keeping a disorderly house, and brings error. Affirmed.

Wm. B. Kent and A. C. Saffold, for plaintiff in error. W. M. Lewis, Sol., for the State.

POWELL, J. 1. The defendant was convicted of maintaining and keeping a lewd house. The evidence shows that the defendant, her daughter, and her niece lived together; that men were seen frequenting the place by night and by day; that the defendant had a general reputation of being a lewd woman, and the house of being a place of prostitution. This was sufficient. McCain v. State, 57 Ga. 391; Hogan v. State, 76 Ga. 82.

2. A witness may testify to facts with a degree of certainty less than that of absolute positiveness. Many men guard their statements as to facts concerning which they are most certain with expressions indicative of doubt. With some people, notably the Scotch, this cautiousness is almost a national trait. But that the witness is not willing to state positively the existence of a fact of which from the nature of things he has some knowledge does not render his testimony inadmissible. The statement of the witness in this case, "It seemed to me that he closed the door behind him," taken in connection with the context, manifestly showed that the witness was not attempting to give his opinion, but to state the impression of his mind as to a fact concerning which his recollection or ability to see perfectly would not permit him to state with more positiveness. In Franklin v. Macon, 12 Ga. 257, the court says: "It is not sufficient to exclude the testimony of a witness, who swears that 'the impression resting on his mind was so and so,' as every witness must swear according to the impressions on his mind, which are the materials of his knowledge, and this is only a more cautious mode of expressing himself." Ordinarily the words "It was my understanding," when used by a witness, means his knowledge and recollection of the fact, though, of course, there are times when these would be apt words to express merely the opinion of the witness. In the former event the evidence is admissible, in the latter not so. Moody v. Davis, 10 Ga. 403; Fleider v. Collier, 13 Ga. 496; Neal v. Field, 68 Ga. 534; Martin v. State, 38 Ga. 297; Printup v. Mitchell, 17 Ga. 558 (3), 63 Am. Dec. 258. The words "I believe" ordinarily indicate that what follows them is merely the opinion of the witness; but this is not always so. They may be merely words of caution, in which event the evidence is admissible notwithstanding the statement may be prefaced by these words. Thompson v. Davitte, 59 Ga. 483 (13); Imboden v. Etowah Co., 70 Ga. 87 (12d). In Central R. v. Coggins, 73 Ga. 689, it is held that, taken in connection with the other facts to which he deposed, it was not error to permit the plaintiff to testify that, "as the engineer slacked up for the switchman to get on the train, he seemed to shut off his engine, and the car ran up on the engine, and he opened his engine right suddenly, I suppose." As to the use of the word "suppose" as qualifying the statement of the witness, but not rendering it inadmissible, see Atlanta Ry. Co. v. Beauchamp, 93 Ga. 3. 19 S. E. 24. In Thomas v. State, 67 Ga. 464 (4), the Supreme Court says: "The appearance of a thing is a fact." To state that a thing "seems" so to a witness is merely to state its appearance as viewed by the witness. See, in this connection, Roberts v. State, 123 Ga. 146,<sup>1</sup> and citations. The words used by Justice Lumpkin in the case of Franklin v. Macon, 12 Ga. 261, are still true and apply to existing conditions. We therefore quote them with approval: "I have long been satisfied that we are too hidebound and restricted in our practice with regard to the admissibility of evidence. The books of Reports will show that there is no state in the Union, and no country in the world, where there are as many captious objections made to the testimony. It is high time that the practice should be discouraged. * * * Nothing tends more to embarrass a trial, civil or criminal, than the frequent and frivolous objections that are so commonly and so capriciously made to the introduction of the proof." Judgment affirmed.

ATLANTA & W. P. R. CO. v. HUDSON.
(No. 333.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 18, 1907.)

1. EVIDENCE—PHYSICAL EXPERIMENTS.

In a suit against a railroad company for killing stock, where the vital point illustrating the question of negligence is the distance that the stock could have been seen on the track by the engineer, it is competent for the plaintiff to prove the results of experiments made subsequently to the accident, where it appears that the experiments were made at the place of the accident, and upon facts and under conditions substantially similar to those surrounding the accident.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 439.]

2. SAME.

Physical experiments based on substantially similar facts frequently elucidate the truth in controversy. The closer the similarity in the facts proved and the facts upon which the experiment is based, the greater the probative value of such evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 439.]

3. TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS — CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

The charge of the court complained of on the subject of the impeachment of witnesses was a substantial compliance with the sections of the Code.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 492.]

4. RAILROADS—KILLING STOCK—DILIGENCE REQUIRED.

The rule of diligence required of railroads in running cars to prevent killing stock is not modified or altered by the legislation known as the "stock law"; and it is not a matter of law contributory negligence to allow stock to run at large in communities where such stock or fence law prevails.

5. SAME—EVIDENCE.

No error of law was committed, and the verdict was warranted by the evidence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of La Grange; Frank Harwell, Judge.

Action by A. O. Hudson against the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Arthur Heyman, Dorsey, Brewster & Howell, and Arthur H. Thompson, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Terrell and F. P. Longley, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff sued the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company for killing two cows and injuring a third. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the motion of the defendant for a new trial was overruled. The evidence showed that the cows were killed at or near a private crossing near the town of La Grange. The contention of the defendant was that the engineer could not see the cows in time to stop or control the train, because of the embankment of a cut through which the track ran just before reaching the crossing; that the cows came from around the edge of the cut, and the engineer did not see and could not have seen them until the train was right at them; that he did everything in his power to prevent the accident after seeing the cows. The plaintiff contended that a cow at or near the crossing in question could be seen by the engineer for several hundred yards before reaching the crossing, and in ample time to stop or get the train under control.

1. The storm center of the evidence was the contested point as to how far a cow could have been seen on the track by the engineer in approaching the crossing at or near which the accident occurred. To illustrate this question, the court permitted the plaintiff to prove the result of certain experiments he and others had made. These experiments consisted in placing a steer at and near the crossing where the cows were killed, and then in determining by sight and measurements how far the steer could be seen up the track in the direction from which the train was approaching, and also by determining in the same manner the distance from the track near the crossing that the steer could be seen by a person standing where the train left the cut before reaching the crossing. The results of these experiments were objected to as evidence by the defendant, on the ground that they were not based upon the actual facts of the case, and were therefore irrelevant. The experiments were made according to the facts as proved by the plaintiff. Experiments made in and out of court sometimes makes a practical demonstration of the question in issue, and are often the best evidence in elucidating the truth. It is necessarily largely within the discretion of the trial court to determine whether the testimony shows that the experiments were made under such conditions as to fairly illustrate the point in issue. Yet, when it is shown that the conditions were essentially the same, the testimony should be admitted, and its weight determined by the jury. If the experiments be predicated upon different facts than those in the particular case, evidence of the results would tend to confuse rather than enlighten the jury, and should be excluded. We think the true rule is that there should be substantial and reasonable similarity in the facts proved in the case and the facts upon which the experiment is based. The facts need not be exactly or in every particular similar. If they are sufficiently similar to accomplish the purpose of assisting the jury to intelligently consider the issue of fact presented in regard to the special point in controversy, the evidence is admissible. Of course, the closer the similarity in the facts of the case and the facts of the experiment, the greater the probative value of the evidence. Morton v. State (Tex. Cr.) 71 S. W. 281; Commonwealth v. Piper, 120 Mass. 185; 5 Enc. Ev. 475, 485. The case of Byers v. Nashville R. Co., 94 Tenn. 345, 29 S. W. 128, is analogous to the present one. It appeared that plaintiff's husband had been killed by defendant's train while crossing a bridge. On the question as to whether the engineer could have stopped the train after coming in view of the deceased, the plaintiff was allowed to introduce evidence of experiments showing the distance at which a man could be seen standing where deceased was killed.

We think, under the facts in the record, the requirements of the law were sufficiently shown to make the evidence of the experiments and the results therefrom admissible.

2. Error is assigned on the following charge as to impeachment of witnesses: "A witness may be impeached by proof of contradictory statements as to matters that are material to the issues on trial. The general rule is that, when a witness has been successfully impeached, he should not be believed. If such witness be corroborated—that is, if there be other evidence in the case sustaining what the witness said—such witness may be believed. In all attempts at impeachment it is for you, the jury, to say whether or not such attempt has been successful." The objection to this instruction is that it took away from the jury the right to believe the witness, although impeached by proof of contradictory statements; it being for the jury to determine the credit to be given his testimony when impeached by proof of contradictory statements. This criticism of the charge is not well taken. The court did leave the whole matter of the witness' credit, although impeached, to be determined by the jury.

3. Error is assigned on the failure of the court to charge the jury upon the issue of contributory negligence. It is claimed that what is known as the "stock law" existed in the community where the cows were killed, and that the fact that the owner of the cows allowed them to roam at large where such law prevailed furnished evidence of contributory negligence. The existence of the stock law may be a pertinent fact to be considered by the jury, along with other facts and circumstances, in determining the question of the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care and diligence in guarding against killing stock by the running of trains. The existence of the stock law is not necessarily evidence of contributory negligence, nor is the rule of diligence imposed by law upon railroads to prevent the killing of stock altered or modified by such local legislation. "With or without the stock law, the degree of diligence required of railroad companies is one and the same. It is ordinary and reasonable care." Besides, there was no request for the court to charge on this subject; and even if such instruction had been proper, there was no error in failing to give it where no request to do so was made.

Judgment affirmed.

BROKERS—ACTION FOR COMMISSIONS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

On the trial of an action by real estate agents for the recovery of a commission on the sale of property, it was error to award a nonsuit, where it appeared from the evidence that the defendant had placed the property in their hands to sell upon specified terms, and that, pending negotiations between the agents and their customer, they were prevented from selling, or at least from concluding their negotiations for a sale, by the action of their principal in taking the matter into his own hands and, without notice to them, selling the property at a lower price to the customer, procured by their efforts. In such a case the good faith of the parties and the question as to whether the stipulated price was waived, as well as whether a purchaser would have given the stipulated price, are all questions of fact for the jury.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Floyd; Harper Hamilton, Judge.

Action by Hill & Moultrie against J. T. Wheeler. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Lipscomb & Willingham, for plaintiffs in error. Seaborn & Barry, Wright, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. We think the court erred in awarding a nonsuit in this case, for we think that there was an issue of fact involved in the evidence upon which only the jury could legally pass. The question was certainly raised by the testimony adduced in behalf of the plaintiff, as to whether the defendant acted in good faith in selling the property himself at a lower price than he had at first stipulated, after using the services of the real estate agents to find a purchaser for it and to interest him in its advantages. Under the testimony for the plaintiffs, the jury could have found (in the absence of any further evidence) that there was a waiver of one of the terms of the sale on the part of the defendant—that is, as to the price at which defendant was willing to sell—and that the defendant himself prevented the sale being made by the real estate agents to prevent them from receiving commissions. It appears from the testimony of the plaintiffs that the defendant and Capt. Garlington, to whom he sold, met several times in the plaintiffs' office, and made two or three trips, after the first one, to view the premises, and that in all of the negotiations up to the very time of the sale the plaintiffs were engaged in assisting the defendant to sell the property, not necessarily, so far as appears from the evidence, at the price first set by the defendant, but at some price to be agreed upon by seller and buyer. To use the language of one of the plaintiffs in the evidence, "We were constantly negotiating, in trying to get them together and get them to agree." It further appears that the defendant never notified the plaintiffs that he had taken the property out of their hands; that he did not withdraw it, but after several different meetings and various propositions and counter propositions, and while negotiation was still pending between the plaintiffs and their customer, the defendant himself sold the property.

We do not mean to say that the plaintiffs were obliged to recover, that the evidence demanded a verdict in their favor, and, indeed, the jury might find, on evidence adduced by both parties, that they were not entitled to recover; but we are clear that the evidence, construed in the light of decisions in our state, would have authorized a finding for the plaintiffs. Where the evidence, in any view of the case, would authorize a finding for the plaintiffs, the case should not be taken away from the jury by a judgment of nonsuit. While a real estate agent, to recover commissions from his principal, must show that he was employed to sell land in which the principal had an interest, and that he procured a customer ready and able to buy upon the terms proposed by the seller, still there may be an implied modification of the terms of sale, arising from the conduct of the seller, which would be equivalent to an express modification. The price at which property is to be sold is only one of the terms of the sale, and may be modified by the principal, as any other term. And, if the owner of the real estate who has placed it for sale in the hands of a real estate agent interferes with the sale by his agent, by modifying the terms of sale as regards the price, he would be just as much liable for his commissions as if he had interfered in any other way. Under the principle laid down in Doonan v. Ives, 73 Ga. 302, if the brokers set to work to sell the property and procured Capt. Garlington as a customer, or one likely to buy from them, and, pending their negotiation with him, the owner interfered, knowing or having information that they were negotiating with the customer, and sold the property to the customer thus procured by them, even with some modifications of the price at which he had authorized them to sell, he could not defeat their commissions, "because it would be the fraudulent taking advantage of their labor without paying for it." If the negotiation in which the plaintiffs were engaged had terminated, and they had abandoned all further efforts to sell, or if the defendant, after reasonable notice to them (if no time limit had been agreed upon), had withdrawn his property from their hands, and thereafter himself sold to Garlington, or any other purchaser, without the plaintiffs' aid, they could not recover. Because one puts property in the hands of a broker to sell, it does not follow that he himself cannot sell. If he does not use their labor to help him, he owes them nothing. If he does use it and puts in to take the trade—its consummation—out of their hands so as to escape paying them, then ex æquo et bono, he does owe them, and must pay just what they could have made by the contract if he had not prevented it. This is sound sense and good law. In this case it is undisputed that the plaintiffs brought the defendant and Capt. Garlington, who purchased his place, together; that previous to this Mr. Moultrie, one of the plaintiffs, had interested Garlington in the property, and had, at his own expense, carried him several miles to see it and taken the trouble to show it to him. On several different occasions, after the defendant and Garlington began to discuss the matter, they used the plaintiffs' office and maps in discussing the proposed trade, and Mr. Moultrie did all he could to effect an agreement. Each time Garlington would say that he would give $9,000. According to the evidence, he never did say that he would not give $10,000, the price agreed upon between the seller and his agents; nor did the seller in these conferences say that he would not take less than $10,000. As Moultrie was present, engaged in assisting the defendant to sell, we think it more fair to presume that the stipulation as to price was waived by the seller than that he should receive the services of the agent for nothing, in view of the fact that he did not withdraw the property from the hands of the agents or lead them to suppose that he would undersell them. The question of good faith was one that should have been submitted to the jury. It should have been left to the jury to say whether by selling to Garlington at $9,000, instead of for $10,000 to a purchaser procured by the plaintiffs, the defendant did not ratify all of the efforts of the plaintiffs to sell, and did not himself waive one of the terms of the sale, to wit, the original price fixed by him in his agreement with the real estate agent. In Odell v. Dozier, 104 Ga. 203, 30 S. E. 813, it was held that the liability of the principal to the agent was not affected by the inability of the purchaser, procured by such agent, to comply with the original terms of sale. In this case the purchaser, instead of being unable, was unwilling to comply with the terms so far as the price was concerned; and, according to the testimony of the plaintiffs, the defendant, without notifying his agents or giving them any further opportunity to perfect the sale at the higher price, sold at a lower price to their customer, and thus perhaps prevented them from making the sale at the higher price. If this is true, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. If it is not true, the defendant can show it and relieve himself from a recovery. In any view of it, it is a question for the jury, and not for the court, to determine.

Judgment reversed.

1. CORPORATIONS — SUBSCRIPTIONS — BINDING CONTRACT.

A stock subscription is a transaction between the subscriber and the corporation, and the obligation of one can only be sustained by the corresponding obligation of the other. If both are not bound, neither is bound. Therefore a subscription which is not binding upon the corporation until a stipulated amount has been secured and accepted by the corporation is also not binding upon the subscriber; and until these conditions have been fully accomplished, and the subscription has ripened into a binding contract, any party may withdraw therefrom without the consent of the others. The subscriber may withdraw his subscription, and the corporation may refuse to accept.

2. SAME—TENTATIVE SUBSCRIPTION.

As to a tentative contract between the subscribers to the formation of a proposed corporation and a third person, conditioned that it shall not become binding until a certain sum is subscribed, one who has signed as a subscriber may withdraw his subscription, without the consent of such third person, at any time before the sum named has been subscribed.

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; W. M. Harrell, Judge.

Action by the Hastings Industrial Company against Allen & Co. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

E. S. Longley, for plaintiff in error. Russell & Hawes, for defendant in error.

HILL, O. J. The Hastings Industrial Company, a corporation under the laws of the state of Illinois, brought suit in the city court of Bainbridge against Allen & Co., a partnership doing business in the city of Bainbridge. The suit was based on a contract of subscription for stock, for a canning factory to be erected at Bainbridge by the Hastings Industrial Company. The material portions of the contract are as follows: "We, the subscribers hereto, desiring a canning factory of the following description located at and near the town of Bainbridge, county of Decatur, state of Georgia, hereby enter into this agreement with the Hastings Industrial Company of Chicago, Illinois, party of the first part, the subscribers hereto being second parties, for the construction and equipment of a canning factory, to be built and equipped according to the descriptions endorsed hereon, on the following terms and conditions, for $8,900. This contract is not binding unless the amount of $8,900 or more should be subscribed, and it is understood that no subscriber is liable for a greater interest in said factory when same is completed than is represented in his or her amount of subscription. Each subscriber agrees to pay the amount subscribed by him or her to the first party when the factory is completed, and no more. Subscriptions to this contract may be secured for any amount; and for this purpose one or more duplicates of this form of this agreement may be circulated by second party, and at any time after the subscriptions on all forms to be circulated shall equal or exceed the purchase price, it may be closed by the first party's special agent signing the same, and such forms shall be taken together and constitute the sole contract between the parties. First party shall have the right to first collect from said subscription if it sees fit the entire amount due under this contract, but all money, notes, or subscriptions, remaining after the first party has been fully paid, is the property of the second parties, and may be used by them as surplus. Second parties agree to appoint an executive committee of three when this contract is closed, with full power and authority in a majority to represent them in all of their business herein, and from time to time to inspect the work and material of the first party while it is building said factory and placing said material. Said second parties shall within ten days from the date of this contract select and furnish at the expense of second parties suitable and reasonably level land, with water ready on same, with which to connect pump for the use of said factory, and designate to first party in writing the land so selected, and it is further understood that in case second parties should fail to furnish said land and water within ten days after the execution of this contract, said party of the first part, at its option, may select and furnish land and water in behalf and at the expense of the subscribers. Said factory to be completed by first party within ninety days, or thereabouts, after the same is located as above provided, and payment for same shall be due from date of completion. In case first party shall be delayed in the execution of this contract by strikes, storms, unavoidable accidents, and other causes over which it has no control, then the time limit for the completion of this contract shall be extended for a period of time equal to such delays. For the purpose of forming a corporation to own and operate said factory and fully carry out the intention of subscribers, it is hereby agreed that, when this contract is closed, second parties are to incorporate under the laws of the state, fixing the aggregate amount of the capital at not less than the contract price, divided into shares of one hundred dollars each, or in accordance with the laws of the state, which are to be issued to the subscribers in proportion to their paid up interests in said factory. The specifications and description of said factory building and machinery attached hereto, and the provisions following same, are a part of this contract. First party agrees to furnish at the expense of second parties an experienced processor for the first season, if second parties give first party thirty days' written notice that they desire one. All contracts with agents must be in print or writing. For the full and faithful performance of our respective parts hereof, we bind ourselves and successors. Executed and dated this 8th day of February, 1906. The Hastings Industrial Company, per O. Pressprick, Special Agent."

The aggregate amount of $6,900 was subscribed by various citizens of Bainbridge under this contract. The defendants subscribed for three shares, or $300. The suit is for this unpaid subscription. The defense relied upon was that this contract was not binding until the amount of the contract price, $6,900, had been subscribed and the contract closed by the special agent of the plaintiff signing the same; that defendants were released from this subscription by the special agent of the plaintiff, who stated that he had authority to make such release, almost immediately after they had made the subscription, before the requisite amount of $6,900 had been subscribed and before the contract had become executed by the special agent signing and accepting the same for the plaintiff. This verbal agreement releasing the defendants was entered into while the contract was unilateral and before it became binding on either party. It was not denied that the agent had released the defendants from the contract. His right to do so was challenged. Nor was it denied that this release was made by the agent before the $6,900 had been subscribed, and before he had closed the subscription and accepted the contract. We do not think the agent's authority to release is material. He was the special agent charged with the work of getting the subscriptions and closing the contract for the industrial company. He certainly was the proper agent for the defendants to notify of their intention to withdraw from the contract. It cannot be doubted that the contract was executory and not binding upon either party unless the $6,900 was subscribed and the subscription closed and the contract accepted. Until these conditions were fully performed, the contract was inchoate and incomplete, and either party had the right to withdraw therefrom. The right of withdrawal was given by law, and did not depend upon the assent of the other party. Whether the defendants' proposition be considered as an agreement to pay so much for the erection of a canning factory, or as an offer to subscribe so much to the stock of a corporation on certain conditions, they withdrew this proposition or offer before acceptance and completion of the contract; and we think they had a clear right to do so. Any unaccepted offer either to pay money or to subscribe for stock may be legally withdrawn. Civ. Code 1895, § 3645; 2 Clark & Marshall on Private Corporations, § 451, and notes. We do not deem it important to decide the other questions in the record, as our judgment of reversal on the foregoing point is conclusive of the case.

2. SAME — WARRANTY — BREACH — RIGHTS OF PURCHASER.

The delivery of a warehouse receipt implies a guaranty on the part of the seller that the articles represented by the receipt are in existence and in the custody of the bailee therein specified; and for a breach of this implied warranty the purchaser, on failure of actual delivery, may recover the purchase price paid by him, or proceed against the warehouseman, at his option. The right of action against the warehouseman is not exclusive of the purchaser's remedy against the vendor, should the purchaser elect to rescind the contract of purchase for the reason that delivery was impossible at the time of his purchase.

Action by J. K. Livingston against U. Anderson & Son. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

De Lacy & Bishop and W. M. Morrison, for plaintiff in error. D. M. Roberts & Son and Tye, Peoples, Bryan & Jordan, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. Livingston brought suit against U. Anderson & Son, alleging that between the 24th and 31st days of December, 1903, he bought from them a bale of cotton, represented by a warehouse receipt as follows.

Eastman, Ga., Nov. 7th, 1906.
Received of T. L. Kirkley.

Petitioner further alleged payment to the defendant of $76.38 for said cotton, and that thereupon the warehouse receipt representing the cotton was delivered to him, that petitioner presented the receipt and the warehouseman failed to deliver the cotton, and that thereupon petitioner took the receipt back to defendants and tendered it to them, and demanded of them the return of the purchase money paid for the cotton, which defendants refused to do. The petition further alleged that the bale of cotton in question was not in the warehouse at the time of his demand, but had, in fact, been shipped out of the warehouse some time before defendants sold the same to plaintiff, of which fact plaintiff had no knowledge or notice until after his purchase from defendants, and until after said receipt was presented to the warehouseman and delivery of the cotton demanded thereunder. The petitioner further averred that, by reason of his purchase and the payment of the agreed price, it was the duty of the defendants, and the law implied a contract, to deliver to petitioner the bale of cotton represented by said warehouse receipt, and that it would be delivered to him by said warehouseman on presentation of the receipt. The petitioner alleged that he had fully complied with the terms of the contract of purchase for the bale of cotton by paying defendants the entire purchase price, relying upon their undertaking and contract to deliver the bale of cotton to petitioner, and that defendants received and accepted from petitioner the full purchase price, to wit, $76.38. The failure and refusal of the warehouseman to deliver the cotton, and the failure and refusal of U. Anderson & Son to deliver it to petitioner in pursuance of the sale and of defendant's contract and agreement to deliver to him, is alleged as a breach of contract by the defendants, and judgment is asked "(a) for the recovery of said bale of cotton and the hire thereof, or its value; or (b) for the damages resulting to petitioner from the breach of contract; or (c) for the recovery of the purchase money of said cotton paid to U. Anderson & Son, and interest thereon from November 7, 1903, treating the contract for the sale of said cotton to petitioner as rescinded by reason of the facts hereinbefore set forth, and petitioner, before the commencement of this suit, having tendered and now hereby continuously tendering back to said U. Anderson & Son said warehouse receipt delivered by them to petitioner."

The defendants admitted, in their answer, the sale of the cotton to the plaintiff, and the delivery of the warehouse receipt as above set out; that the bale of cotton was not delivered by the warehouseman, and that the plaintiff tendered back the warehouse receipt and demanded back the purchase price; and that they refused to pay the plaintiff the value of the bale of cotton or to deliver the cotton to him or to return to him the amount of the purchase money paid therefor. The defendants set up as their defense that they purchased the bale of cotton in the usual course of business; that they bought by sample and sold the same way, obtaining the warehouse receipt from the party to whom it was issued, and delivered the receipt to the plaintiff; that the plaintiff knew the warehouse in which the cotton was stored, as shown by the receipt, and knew that the defendants did not have the cotton at their place of business; that the defendants acted in good faith, believing that a warehouse receipt meant something, and that when a warehouseman issued a receipt, agreeing to hold the cotton represented by it until the cotton was delivered back to him, this agreement would be kept and the bale of cotton would remain in the warehouse until the cotton was surrendered. Defendants insisted that plaintiff's cause of action was against the warehouseman, and that plaintiff's petition drew them into useless litigation, and they asked for damages against the plaintiff.

The case was submitted to the judge, without the intervention of a jury, upon the following agreed statement of facts: "It is agreed by and between the parties and their attorneys in the above-stated case that the facts are as follows: Plaintiff bought from defendants during the latter part of December, 1903, the bale of cotton described in the warehouse receipt set forth in plaintiff's petition, the same being the original warehouse receipt given for said cotton, and paid defendants the agreed price of $76.38 therefor, and defendants delivered to plaintiff or his agent said warehouse receipt. As a matter of physical fact, the cotton was not in the warehouse at the time of said sale, but had some time previously been shipped away by M. H. Edwards & Bro., who claimed it under a duplicate receipt issued on the same day as said original receipt, but after the issue of said original receipt; but Livingston did not know of the claim of Edwards & Bro., or of said shipment, until after he bought from defendants and until plaintiff presented the receipt he got from defendants to the warehouseman and demanded the cotton, but both plaintiff and defendants supposed the cotton was in the warehouse at the time of the sale by defendants to plaintiff. When plaintiff presented the receipt to the warehouseman and demanded the cotton and learned that it was not there, but had been shipped away before the purchase from defendants, he took the receipt back to the defendants, and demanded of them either the bale of cotton or the return of the purchase money he had paid to them for it; and defendants refused either to deliver the cotton or return the purchase money, and still refuse to do so, and plaintiff has never, in fact, received the cotton or the return of the money he paid for it. Defendants claim that his claim or right of action, if any, should be against the warehouseman. Defendants paid T. L. Kirkley $62.63 for said bale of cotton by their check on the Citizens' Banking Company November 7, 1903, and then received from Kirkley said original warehouse receipt, which they delivered to the plaintiff at the time of selling said bale of cotton to plaintiff, and said check was paid by said bank." The trial judge rendered judgment for costs in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff asks for a review of that judgment by direct bill of exceptions.

The question in the case is whether the plaintiff's right of action against the warehouseman is his only remedy, or whether he has not also the right of recovery against the defendants for the amount paid to them for the bale of cotton represented by the warehouse receipt which he tendered back to them with a demand for his money. It is undisputed that at the time the warehouse receipt was delivered to him there was no cotton in the warehouse subject to delivery by virtue of that receipt. It is likewise undisputed that that fact was not known to either of the parties. It is unquestioned that the plaintiff made his tender of the receipt within 30 days from the time that he became aware that the bale of cotton would not, and could not, be delivered by the warehouseman. The plaintiff can maintain an action against the warehouseman, and he could have brought such an action. Defendants contend that this was his only remedy; and this seems to have been the view of the trial judge. In our opinion the plaintiff not only had the right to bring an action against the warehouseman, but he might, at his option, have treated the contract as rescinded; and, having tendered back the receipt within a reasonable time, he was, under the agreed statement of facts, entitled to recover the $76.38 paid by him, with interest from the time of demand for repayment.

The cases cited by the learned counsel for the defendant in error establish only a proposition as to which there can be no dispute—that this plaintiff could have brought an action of trover against the warehouseman, or could sue and recover the value of the bale of cotton from the warehouseman. To this effect is the ruling in Nall v. Farmers' Warehouse Co., 95 Ga. 770, 22 S. E. 665, Zorn v. Hannah, 99 Ga. 634, 25 S. E. 829, and Citizens' Banking Co. v. Peacock, 103 Ga. 171, 29 S. E. 752, and Peacock v. Citizens' Banking Co., 110 Ga. 284, 34 S. E. 851, so far as affects this case. In Central Ry. Co. v. Exchange Bank, 101 Ga. 353, 28 S. E. 866, it is said: "Cotton packed into bales is certainly personalty. The transfer or surrender of warehouse receipts, or other symbols representing cotton, may very properly be regarded as equivalent to an actual physical delivery of the cotton itself, and therefore will operate as a constructive delivery passing title." But in that case the cotton in question was at the warehouse, was levied upon by an officer, and the only question involved, as stated by the Supreme Court on page 351 of 101 Ga., and page 865 of 28 S. E., was: "In whom was the legal title to this cotton at the time of the levy?" That question was to be answered by determining whether one Roosevelt was or was not the agent of the claimant, and the court decided that he was not such agent. That was the only issue passed upon by the court. In Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Bennett, 120 Ga. 1012, 48 S. E. 398, the defendant came into possession of warehouse receipts without the consent or knowledge of the plaintiff, presented them at the warehouse, and received two bales of cotton, and disposed of them without any authority from the plaintiff; and it was held that the bank, as pledgee, might either bring an action of trover against the defendant, or waive the tort and sue in assumpsit for the market value of the cotton. In the case of Rawls v. Saulsbury, 66 Ga. 397, nothing more is held, so far as applicable to this case, than that the plaintiff could have brought an action against the warehouseman, and the same thing may be inferred from Gunn v. Knoop, 73 Ga. 510. All of these cases, as well as Shepard v. King, 96 Ga. 84, 23 S. E. 113, recognize that the transferring of a warehouse receipt is a mode of effecting delivery, and that it is further true that a sale may be completed without actual delivery of the goods sold. In all of the cases we have been able to examine, the personal property was in the hands of the bailee at the time of the transfer of the symbol representing such property. In this case it is admitted that, unknown to either party, the bale of cotton described in the warehouse receipt delivered by the defendants to the plaintiff was not at the time of such transfer in the custody of the bailee—the warehouseman. The warehouseman could not deliver the cotton. He might not be able to respond to a judgment for the value thereof, and, in either event, the plaintiff had received nothing for his money, except a demand and right of action against the warehouseman. This makes a case, as to its facts, unlike any which has been expressly ruled in this state. If the Supreme Court has ever held (while holding that the pledgee or transferee of a warehouse receipt can proceed against the warehouseman) that the holder of such receipt, where the cotton or other goods cannot be reached, is confined solely to an action against the warehouseman, we have been unable to find it; and, in the absence of a distinct ruling to that effect, we think that the plaintiff has his option to proceed, if he chooses, against either the warehouseman or the defendants in this case, because there was no cotton which could be delivered by the warehouseman, and upon his discovery of that fact he promptly treated the contract as rescinded, offered to restore the receipt, and made timely demand for the purchase price. When Livingston brought this action on the case, he elected to take, and asked for, a judgment against Anderson & Son for the purchase money he paid them for the cotton, with interest thereon. At the time of the purchase there was no such cotton; and to deny Livingston the right of recovery would be to permit Anderson & Son to sell him a bale of cotton which they did not have, but which they were supposed to have, and get his money for it, and thereafter neither deliver the cotton nor return the purchase money, and thus get Livingston's money for absolutely nothing.

It is clearly held in Biggers v. Pace, 5 Ga. 172, that, notwithstanding title may have passed from seller to buyer, yet, if the seller refuses to deliver the goods, the buyer may either bring trover to recover the goods, or a special action on the case for damages. Where one party to a contract is ready and willing to perform and the other is not, the first may maintain an action against the other. So that, granting that the title would have passed, if the defendants had had the cotton in the warehouse, by the delivery of the warehouse receipt, under the doctrine in the Biggers Case, we think this plaintiff can recover. As we have stated above, the effect of the rulings of our Supreme Court is simply that the delivery of warehouse receipts is such constructive delivery of the articles therein described as will pass title; and a provision to the same effect in favor of pledgees is contained in Civ. Code 1895, § 2956. But, as a person selling personal property is bound to deliver the thing sold to the purchaser, and as the law makes it his duty to do so whether he in express terms agrees to deliver the articles sold or not, the very fact of selling the thing raises an implied contract of delivery. A constructive delivery by delivering a bill of sale or a warehouse receipt for the articles sold will not relieve the seller from making actual delivery of the thing which such bill of sale or warehouse receipt represents, where the uncontradicted evidence shows that such article was not in the possession of the bailee at the time of the sale. The constructive delivery relies upon the presumption that the property is, as it purports to be, in the possession of the warehouseman or the bailee. If, as a matter of fact, the property of which the warehouse receipt was a symbol has already passed from the possession of the bailee, there is no constructive delivery. The seller must then rely upon actual delivery, or the purchaser may treat the contract as rescinded, and recover damages for the breach of the contract. The law declares the delivery of a warehouse receipt for cotton to be a constructive delivery of the cotton represented thereby for the sole purpose of passing the title, so that an action in trover against the warehouseman issuing the receipt can be predicated thereon by the holder, just as if there had been an actual delivery of the cotton itself, in the event of a conversion by the warehouseman or his refusal to deliver the cotton to the holder, and in such case the warehouseman will not be heard to deny the title of the holder of his own receipt, whereby he obligated himself to deliver the cotton upon the presentation and surrender of the receipt. But this does not relieve the seller from making an actual delivery of the cotton when demanded by the purchaser; and a refusal to make such actual delivery subjects the seller, in case the receipt really represented nothing tangible at the time of the sale, to an action by the purchaser for the recovery of the cotton, or the purchase price paid therefor. The sale of the cotton and the delivery of the warehouse receipt therefor to a purchaser is equivalent to a warranty on the part of the seller that the cotton is in the warehouse. This must be conceded to be true, or, at best, the purchaser would be only buying a lawsuit; and but few are anxious for that class of property. If the property represented by the receipt is not in fact in the warehouse (as the purchaser has a right to expect it to be), there has been on the part of the vendor a breach of the implied warranty arising from the fact of sale and delivery of the receipt. In making such a sale, the vendor not only says that he has title, but he in effect says to the purchaser: "I own a bale of cotton, and it is in the warehouse, with the marks and numbers and the weight shown in the warehouse receipt which I now deliver to you, and all you have to do is to take this receipt to the warehouse and get the cotton. I guarantee that you will now find it there and get it on presentation of this receipt." If, in fact, the seller had no such bale of cotton in the warehouse at the time, but it had been previously carried away to parts unknown, it seems to us that, if it is out of the power of the vendor to deliver the thing sold, he should at least be liable to the purchaser for the return of the purchase money paid him.

In this case the defendants prevented the completeness of the plaintiff's title by selling him a bale of cotton that they did not actually have and could not deliver in pursuance of the sale, and upon the representation, necessarily implied from the circumstances of the transaction, that the cotton was in the warehouse, when, in fact, it had been several weeks previously taken out of the warehouse and shipped away by an adverse claimant. The defendants cannot dispute the plaintiff's title, for it came through them; and the defendants cannot defend by questioning the sufficiency of the plaintiff's title, because the act of the defendants themselves prevented the completeness of their title. See Holton v. Carter, 90 Ga. 299, 15 S. E. 819.

According to the evidence, there was a mutual mistake of fact on the part of both parties in this case. When Anderson & Son undertook to sell the bale of cotton to Livingston and he paid them for it, Anderson & Son, as well as Livingston, erroneously believed that the cotton was in the warehouse. As a matter of fact, it was not there at that time; but some time before the transaction had been shipped away to parts unknown. As soon as this fact became known to Livingston, he undertook to rescind the contract of purchase, and treated it as rescinded, and took the warehouse receipt back to Anderson & Son and tendered it, demanding that the purchase price be refunded, and they refused to accept the receipt or refund the purchase money. A contract predicated upon a mutual mistake of fact may be rescinded. It is undisputed that in this case both parties were laboring under the belief that the cotton was in the warehouse, and based their contract upon that belief, when as a matter of fact it was not there. Livingston, having tendered back the warehouse receipt to Anderson & Son when the mistake was discovered, rescinded the contract. And Livingston having done all that a court of equity could have required him to do, and the exercise of affirmative chancery powers of extraordinary equitable relief not being asked, it was not necessary for the plaintiff to go into a court of equity, but, the contract of purchase being treated as rescinded, the plaintiff could sue for the recovery of the purchase money paid. The action was properly brought, and, under the admitted facts, the court erred in not rendering a judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of the purchase price, with interest thereon.

Judgment reversed.

POWELL, J. The trial judge charged: "Moral and reasonable certainty is all that can be expected in legal investigation. In all civil cases the preponderance of testimony is considered sufficient to produce mental conviction. In criminal cases a greater strength of mental conviction is held necessary to justify a verdict of guilty." Exception is taken to so much of this instruction as states that "in all civil cases the preponderance of testimony is considered sufficient to produce mental conviction," on the ground of its irrelevancy to the issue. While in criminal trials it is not appropriate that the judge should ordinarily refer to the rule of proof applicable in civil trials, yet, taken in connection with the context and with the fact that the judge fully instructed the jury as to the benefit of reasonable doubt to which the defendant was entitled and as to the presumption of innocence in his favor, it is clear that no injury resulted to him. Jackson v. State, 125 Ga. 102, 53 S. E. 607 (3).

WESTERN & A. R. CO. v. CLARK. (No. 324.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 18, 1907.)

1. RAILROADS—KILLING STOCK—EVIDENCE.

In the absence of positive evidence of negligence, or where the only express evidence of negligence in behalf of the plaintiff is a mere expression of opinion, the presumption of negligence arising against a railroad company from proof of the killing of an animal is met and overcome by evidence for the defendant company showing that the animal could not have been seen soon enough to avoid the casualty, and after it was discovered all diligence was used to prevent the killing.

2. ERROR, WRIT OF—FINDING OF JURY—CONCLUSIVENESS.

But where the evidence for the plaintiff shows negligence as a matter of fact, and is in material conflict with the evidence introduced by the defendant for the purpose of rebutting the presumption of negligence, an issue of fact is raised which must be determined by the jury, and their finding thereon will not be disturbed by this court.

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—CERTIORARI—ANSWER.

Unless the point be waived, a judge of the superior court commits no error, of which plaintiff in certiorari can justly complain, in overruling the certiorari, where the answer to the writ of certiorari does not verify the statement in the petition that a verdict and judgment were rendered against it in the court in which the case originated, or disclosed what disposition (if any) was made of the case in that court.

RUSSELL, J. This case has been to the Supreme Court, and is reported in 121 GA. 419, 49 S. E. 290. No opinion follows the judgment rendered in the headnote. So far as appears from the headnote, the judgment of the lower court was reversed at that time because the evidence in behalf of the railroad company, rebutting the presumption of negligence arising from proof of the killing of the animal by the defendant company's train, was uncontradicted, except by a mere expression of opinion by one witness. We have not thought it necessary to examine the original record transmitted to the Supreme Court on the former hearing, because, regardless of what may then have appeared, there is in the record before us a direct conflict in the evidence upon the subject of negligence as related to the killing. This issue of fact it is the exclusive province of the jury to decide, and we have neither the power nor disposition to disturb their finding. It appears that the engineer and fireman rebutted the presumption of negligence arising from the killing of the steer by the defendant company's train by testifying that they did not see the animal in question (and on account of a curve could not see it) until it was within 20 or 30 feet of the engine. They both swore that they were looking ahead, and that the steer was killed 450 yards north of the public road crossing. Both swore it was too late when the animal was seen to do anything to stop the train, and that nothing was done. Under this evidence the presumption of negligence would have been rebutted, and without more a finding for the plaintiff would not have been authorized. In the answer, however, appears the testimony of two witnesses for the plaintiff, which is in direct conflict with the evidence in behalf of the defendant, as to the only material issue in the case. The only real question in the case was whether the cattle came so suddenly on the track from previous concealment that it was impossible for the train crew, though ever so diligent, to prevent the casualty. The two witnesses for the plaintiff testified that the steer could have been seen for 250 yards, that there was nothing to prevent the engineer and fireman (either embankment, curve, or other obstacle) from seeing if they had been looking out. One of these witnesses stated that he saw the killing; that the cattle were in plain view, and could have been seen by the engineer, if he had been looking out, for a distance of 200 measured yards; that no effort was made to stop the train before the killing; that the speed of the train was not slackened, and the whistle was not blown. According to the plaintiff's evidence, the killing could have been prevented, because the engineer himself testified that the train could be stopped in 136 yards. According to defendant's testimony the accident could not be prevented; and this clearly raised an issue of fact, which could not be settled except by the jury. As it does not appear that their finding was induced by or dependent upon any error of the court, it cannot be disturbed.

We have passed upon this phase of the case only because no notice seems to have been taken in the court below of the defect in the magistrate's answer, or, at least, the plaintiff in error was given the benefit of the doubt as to the unexpressed intention of the magistrate, and the point was waived.

It doubtless was the intention of the magistrate to adopt the allegations of the petition as to the judgment rendered and the assignment of error, but he failed to say so; and the judgment of the superior court in overruling the certiorari would be sustained if his decision had been based only on the ground that the answer did not disclose what disposition was made of the case in the trial court. The language of the answer is as follows: "And now comes the defendant, answering the writ of certiorari served on him, and says that the following is also held as his answer, except as follows." This is all of the justice's answer, except that following the words above quoted he purports to give the substance of the testimony of two witnesses for the plaintiff (defendant in certiorari). We would have decided the case upon the principle announced in Stoner v. Magins, 116 Ga. 797, 43 S. E. 45, and frequently since reaffirmed, without any discussion, except for the fact that the point seems to have been waived in the court below. It was at least treated thus by the trial judge; for the answer of the magistrate was traversed, a trial had upon it and a verdict rendered, finding against the traverse. As stated above, we think that the magistrate intended to adopt the allegations of the petition for certiorari, so as to verify the statement therein that a verdict and judgment were rendered against it in his court. But he failed to do so, and for that reason, if for no other, the judgment of the superior court in overruling the certiorari must stand affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

HOLT v. STATE. (No. 506.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — TRIAL — REMARKS OF COURT.

It is never necessary or proper for a court, during the trial of a case and in the hearing of the jury empaneled therein, to relieve itself by reference to the right of the Supreme Court to reverse its rulings to which respectful objection is being made, and by suggesting that counsel try the remedy. In a case stubbornly contested and close and doubtful, to intercept, cut off, and prevent a question from being asked a witness by defendant's counsel, with the remark: "I may be wrong about this. You have your remedy. You can go to the Supreme Court. I won't permit him to testify about a matter on the former trial until the record is read to him"—was prejudicial to the defendant, and it is such an intimation of the court's opinion that the defendant is guilty as requires the grant of a new trial.

OHLEN v. ATLANTA & W. P. R. CO. (No. 158.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 18, 1907.)

1. CARRIERS—INJURY TO FREIGHT—BURDEN OF PROOF.

A common carrier, sued on its common-law liability for loss or injury of goods received by it for transportation, may relieve itself of liability by showing that the goods were damaged before it received them. Where it does not appear either that the carrier received the goods as in bad order or that they were in fact in bad order when received, the presumption is that they were in good order, and the burden of proof is upon such carrier to show that it was free from negligence, and that its negligence did not cause or contribute to the damage.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 581.]

2. SAME—DAMAGES.

Where there was evidence of the delivery by the carrier in a damaged condition of an entire shipment, and that the goods were originally shipped in good condition, and evidence as to the amount of damage, authorizing the recovery of a larger amount as damages on the entire shipment, it was error to direct a verdict for only a portion of the damaged goods, as to which the defendant conceded liability.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reld, Judge.

Action by F. X. Ohlen against the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company. From a verdict for plaintiff for less than the amount claimed, he brings error. Reversed.

Moore & Pomeroy, for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Ohlen filed suit in the city court of Atlanta against the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, to recover damage for 109 kegs of fish shipped from St. Andrews, Fla., to Atlanta, Ga. This suit is based upon two counts: First, the statutory action against the last of the connecting lines of carriers; and, secondly, the common-law liability. The plaintiff insisted only upon the common-law count; and hence the count based on section 2298 of the Civil Code will not be considered. The court directed a verdict for $8 in favor of the plaintiff. The plaintiff excepted, and brings the case to this court for review.

There are two assignments of error. The first assigns error upon the overruling of plaintiff's objection to a freight bill "dated May 4th, bearing the name of F. H. Allen, covering car 9077, 100¼ kegs of fish, marked, 'Weight 8,750 pounds,' with $51.20 freight, marked, 'Paid on May 14, 1904,' and bearing the signature of S. C. McGill, Agent"; the objection made by the plaintiff being that the evidence was immaterial, irrelevant, and illegal, and that it was an admission by the defendant in its own favor. The second assignment of error excepts to the ruling of the court in directing the verdict over the plaintiff's objection. We shall consider the second assignment first, because the principles involved are controlling in the case.

While the verdict was directed for the plaintiff, it was in effect, a verdict directed for the defendant, because the defendant conceded that one keg was lost, and one keg so damaged as to be worthless, and tendered $8 and court costs in court. So far as insisted on by the plaintiff, the petition alleged that on or about the last day of April, 1904, he bought and had shipped to him from St. Andrews, Fla., to Atlanta, Ga., 109 quarter kegs of fish, which were delivered to him by the defendant in Atlanta on or about May 14, 1904; that when shipped the fish were in good order, and not in a damaged condition, but when delivered they were decayed, unmerchantable, and in a badly damaged condition; and that a portion of the fish (one-fourth keg) was never delivered. He charged that the time consumed in conveying the fish was unreasonable and unnecessary, and that this fact contributed in a measure to their damage, that this shipment of fish should have arrived in Atlanta on or about May 4, 1904, and that the defendant wrongfully and negligently held and refused to deliver the shipment until on or about May 14, 1904, which fact, he charged, contributed to their damage.

The evidence for the plaintiff showed that one Ponder, as his broker, received the bill of lading from him and sold the fish to J. J. & J. E. Maddox while they were in transit. When the bill of lading arrived about the 1st of May, Ponder telephoned to the office of the defendant company at Atlanta, and inquired for the fish, and was told that they were not there. He then called on the cashier at the office of the Atlanta & West Point Railroad, about a week after he received the bill of lading, and was told that the fish were not there. Two or three days later he again made inquiry, and was told that they had not arrived. He then went into the depot and made a personal search, and found the fish, marked "F. X. Ohlen." This was between the 8th and 10th of May. After the fish were found, they were not delivered until the 14th of May; for the reason that the defendant company insisted on collecting a larger amount of freight than that called for in the bill of lading. The fish were sold to Maddox at $3.25 per keg, though the market price was more than that. After the fish were delivered to Maddox, it was discovered that they were rotten and of no value. Maddox refused to pay for them, and tendered them back. The tender was waived, because it was apparent that the fish were worthless. The witness further testified that a shipment of fish from St. Andrews, Fla., should reach Atlanta within three or four days after shipment. It further appeared in the evidence that permitting fish of the character in question to sit in a hot warehouse for a number of days would cause them to decay. It appeared from the testimony of Mr. Maddox that there was no brine in the kegs when they were opened. He also noticed Ohlen's name on them, and could not say they were only marked with the initials "F. X. O." He also testified that the market value of the fish between the 1st and 15th of May was $5 a keg. The agreed price was $3.25 a keg.

Under a notice to the defendant, the bill of lading was produced and introduced in evidence for the plaintiff, as follows: "Pensacola, St. Andrews and Gulf Steamship Co. Consignee's receipt. Original. Received in apparent good order from H. W. Steinhöiser of date April 29, 1904, at St. Andrews, Fla., consigned to F. X. Ohlen, Atlanta, Ga., marked F. X. O., 104¼ kegs fish. Rate 63c per hundred pounds. Weight 8750. [Signed] C. Wisenburger, Agt." Indorsed: "Deliver to bearer, May 5, 1904. Frank X. Ohlen." Plaintiff also introduced a letter from Ponder to McGill, agent of the Atlanta & West Point Railroad, as follows: "We hold B/L for 109 packages salt fish, which from marks on package we found out arrived here on the 4th inst. We inquired at the depot in person once or twice, and over the phone, if goods had arrived, and were informed in the negative. On the 10th inst. we searched for the goods through your depot and found them there. Rate of freight on B/L is indorsed 63c per cwt., and we have in our possession letter from E. R. Cobb, G. F. A. of Pensacola, St. Andrews & Gulf Steamship Co., who issued B/L giving rate from Cromston, Fla., to Atlanta, Ga. of 63c. We have been refused delivery of the shipment unless freight charges in full, which is more than 63c per cwt., be paid. Weather is getting hot and fish are being damaged every day they set in warehouse, and this is to put you on notice that we shall demand of your road damages, whatever they might be, and if the freight charges are not adjusted at once we will reject the shipment entirely and bring suit for amount of shipment." Also letter from S. C. McGill, agent, to C. B. Ponder Company, of May 14, 1904, as follows: "Confirming my telephone message to your bookkeeper this a. m., this is to notify you that we are ready to protect rate of 63c per cwt. on salt fish from St. Andrews, Fla., to Atlanta, Ga. Will you kindly send down and get shipment, which is at our depot?" According to the testimony, the fish were put up in brine, in little quarter barrels, with wooden hoops around them. They were put up to keep, and in cool weather ought to keep 60 or 90 days. "They would go to pieces quicker if stored in a warm place for any length of time." It was also in evidence that, so far as its general appearance was concerned, the kegs were apparently in good condition. And the testimony showed that, if there was a leakage, it would make the kegs lighter, though there was no evidence that the kegs were weighed before delivered.

In our opinion the exception to the verdict directed by the court is well taken. Considered by itself, the testimony in behalf of the plaintiff entitled him to a recovery for the market value of the entire shipment of 109 kegs, and, considered in connection with the testimony for the defendant, the most that can be said is that an issue of fact was presented which should have been submitted to the jury. We apprehend that our learned Brother of the trial bench was controlled in his decision by the ruling announced in Evans v. A. & W. P. R. Co., 56 Ga. 502, in which it was held that the receipt of corn in apparent good order given by an agent of a steamboat, which corn was to be carried by water to Memphis and thence by rail to La Grange, furnished no evidence that the defendant received the corn in good order, or apparent good order, or as in good order. In our judgment the decision above cited has no application whatever to the case at bar, although there is a similarity as to the facts. In the Evans Case it appears that the action was based upon section 2084 of the Civil Code of 1895, now section 2298, and the decision is based entirely upon a strict construction of that statute; Judge Jackson, in rendering the opinion, saying, "Our statute (section 2084 of the Code) makes the last company of connecting railroads liable. It is silent in respect to any connection with steamboats." But, even in that case, it was held that if it had been proved that any of the connecting railroads received the corn in good order, or as in good order, "then the presumption would have arisen that the corn remained in that condition of good order from connecting road to connecting road until it reached defendant, and hence that it was received by plaintiff as in the good order in which it left the other road, and such presumptive proof would have been sufficient to carry the case to the jury, and, unless rebutted, to have authorized a recovery from the defendant. Such seemed to be the authorities and principle and practical good sense, and the convenience of the public sus-tain it. But this case breaks down from the fact that there is no positive proof that the defendant received this corn in good order or as in good order, and no presumptive proof thereof by proof that any road with which it connected so received the corn, nor any proof that it received the corn from any other carrier." Under the evidence submitted by the defendant in the form of the freight receipt, had the plaintiff insisted on his statutory remedy under Civ. Code 1895, § 2298, his case would not have broken down, as Judge Jackson termed it, for lack of proof that a road with which it connected received the fish in good order, or that it received the fish from another carrier. It must be borne in mind, however, that the statutory action predicated on section 2298 was expressly abandoned by the plaintiff. Perhaps it was abandoned on account of the decision in the Evans Case, but, in any event, as that case was brought under the provisions embodied in section 2298 (which was formerly section 2084 of the Code), the ruling in the Evans Case is not in point. Where the action is based on the common-law right of action, the carrier is bound, if he receives goods in good order, to deliver them in good order, whether there be a bill of lading or no bill of lading, a connecting carrier or no connecting carrier. The general rule as to the common carrier's liability for goods in his possession as carrier (and regardless of contractual exceptions) is that the carrier is liable for all loss or destruction of or injury to such goods not occasioned by the act of God or the public enemy. Therefore, where the loss is not due to the excepted causes, proof of negligence is immaterial, and the carrier cannot escape liability by proving reasonable care and diligence. Under the common law the carrier is absolutely liable to deliver the goods in the condition in which it receives them, with only the exception stated in the rule above. This general rule is stated and illustrated by Judge Nisbet in the early case of Fish v. Chapman, 2 Ga. 349, 46 Am. Dec. 398. In the more recent development of the rules of the carrier's liability, it has been held that he is not liable for loss or damage due to the intrinsic qualities of the goods carried. But this exception is not included in the exception made for the "act of God" in the common-law rule. The act of God, as expressive of a cause of loss or damage, means a casualty not due to human agency, not only not due to it, but one which is in no way contributed to by human agency.

With the rule of common-law liability settled, it is clear that the question of fact in this case is: What was the condition of the fish at the time the defendant received the kegs containing them? The evidence is undisputed that the fish were received in a damaged and worthless condition from the defendant. By this proof the plaintiff established the fact that he had not contributed to the injury, and shifted to the defendant the burden of showing responsibility for the bad condition of the fish to be chargeable to some one else, either a connecting carrier or the shipper, where it was shown that the goods were recently in good condition. The carrier had the right to refuse the shipment when tendered to him, whether by the original shipper or by a connecting carrier, if in bad condition, to inform himself of the condition and nature of the goods before receiving them for shipment, and he had the best opportunity of furnishing information as to who was responsible for the unsound or damaged condition of the shipment. It can be presumed that the fish were at one time sound, and, whether the defendant received them from the shipper or from a connecting carrier, if a carrier delivers them in bad condition from his hands, the presumption will arise that the damage accrued while in his custody; for the reason that a carrier is not required to transport articles unfit for shipment or in bad condition without at least being able to prove that fact. On the other hand, in most instances all that the consignee can prove is the condition of the goods at the time he received them, and the fact that they came from the custody of the carrier. For this reason, we think that the plaintiff made a prima facie case when he proved that the goods had been in possession of the defendant as a carrier from May 4th to May 14th, and, when delivered by the carrier, were worthless. It then became the duty of the carrier to show that the goods were in bad condition when delivered to him; and, upon failure of such proof, the presumption that they would not have been received by him except in proper condition to be shipped is not rebutted, and the carrier becomes liable for the damage. We are aware that this rule imposes a burden upon the carrier for hidden defects in some cases, but the carrier will still be protected by the rule which relieves from liability where the injury or destruction of the shipment is caused by the act of the shipper, or by violation by the shipper of reasonable rules made by the carrier, or where there is a fraudulent concealment of the nature or value of the goods, or where the shipper dissuades the carrier from inquiry and thereby misleads the carrier as to the nature and value of the shipment, or where the goods are insufficiently packed, if the defect is not known to the carrier and the carrier is without fault.

The Supreme Court in the case of Breed v. Mitchell, 48 Ga. 537, fully justifies our holding in this case. Judge McCay, delivering the opinion for the court, says: "Whatever may be the rule as to the presumption of the condition in which goods are received, it is certainly true that the carrier will be presumed to have received the goods in good order for shipping; that is, that they were in such condition that they could be moved without loss. A carrier is not bound to receive goods which cannot be moved without loss. A man may have a right to compel a carrier to ship damaged goods, but he cannot compel him to ship goods that are so badly packed as that they cannot be transported. At any rate, it is but a fair presumption that, when the carrier got the goods, they were in such a condition as that they were capable of being transported." And upon the same principle we hold that, if a carrier can be compelled to ship damaged goods, it is his duty to know it. He is best prepared to prove it, and is so out of the ordinary rule of business transactions that, in the absence of proof that he did receive the goods in damaged condition, it is fair to presume that he received them as in good condition, if not actually in good condition. It is in evidence in this case that the goods were actually received from a connecting carrier, the Western Railroad of Alabama, and carried in the same car to Atlanta, by the defendant; and, as said by the Supreme Court, in Paramore v. W. R. Co., 53 Ga. 386: "If the carrier who receives them finds that they are not in good order, that damage has already occurred, he can protect himself. It might be his duty to receive them in such order and to deliver them—that is, he may be compelled to receive even damaged goods—but he is not bound to receive them when they are so badly packed that they cannot be received without loss. Breed v. Mitchell, 48 Ga. 533. So the defendant was not bound to receive these cars from the Atlanta & West Point Railroad with the hogs so crowded that they were in danger of suffocation. If it did, it made the act of that road its own act, and was bound for the damages resulting from it. And the burden is on it to show whether the suffocation occurred before or after its receipt of such cars." In this case the car containing the goods was received by the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company from the Western Railroad of Alabama, instead of being received by the Western Railroad of Alabama from the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, as in the Paramore Case, and the shipment is fish, whereas hogs were being carried in the case cited; but the rule must be the same. The goods in each case were destroyed, so far as practical use was concerned, and the burden is on the carrier delivering the goods to show whether the injury occurred before or after its receipt of the shipment. It is true that the action in the Paramore Case was based on section 2084 of the Code, but that fact would not vary the sound reasoning upon which the presumption of receipt in good order is based. The court further proceeds to say that, if the goods be in bad order or damaged, any road can so specify in its receipt and be protected; and that, if a carrier can protect himself against liability for the receipt of goods in bad order—in an unmerchantable condition—"at least the burden is on him of showing that it was not by his default or his own negligence that the injury was caused." While this action, so far as recovery is concerned (plaintiff having abandoned the first count), is not based upon section 2298, still, as a matter of fact, it appears from the receipt offered by the defendant that the goods were delivered in good order by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to the Western Railroad of Alabama, and that that road, without change of cars, delivered the goods to the defendant company. So that, if we consider the goods in the light of the receipt, they must be presumed to have been in good order when received by the defendant, and the burden is shifted to the defendant to show the contrary. Furthermore, the bill of lading issued by the initial carrier, the steamboat company, is in evidence, and recites that the goods were received in good order. And in Bell v. W. & A. R. Co., 125 Ga. 512, 54 S. E. 532 (a case based upon the common-law liability of the carrier), it is held that "the bill of lading issued by the initial carrier plays an important part in the plaintiff's case, whether the plaintiff relies upon the count growing out of the breach of duty arising under the contract, or on the count charging liability on the part of the defendant under Civ. Code 1895, § 2298, as being the last connecting carrier who received the goods in good order. In the first instance, though the consignee be not a party to a contract of carriage between a railroad company and a shipper, the consignee may make proof of such contract with a view to showing that the company became liable to him for a failure to comply with its legal duty as a common carrier." And in the same case (page 513 of 125 Ga., and page 533 of 54 S. E.) it is held that, "when a connecting carrier who has completed the transportation and delivered the goods to the consignee in a damaged condition is sued for the loss in value, upon proof that the initial carrier received the shipment in good order, the jury have the right to infer that they continued in that condition down to the time of the delivery to the carrier making the delivery to the consignee, and that injury or loss occurred while in his possession. If nothing more had appeared than that the consignor delivered the cabbages to the initial road in good order, the plaintiff would have shifted the burden on to the defendant company of showing that it was not responsible for their damaged condition when delivered." The cases of Henry v. Central R. Co., 80 Ga. 815, 15 S. E. 757 (1), and W. & A. R. Co. v. Exposition Mills, 81 Ga. 529, 7 S. E. 916, 2 L. R. A. 102, sustain our holding that, where a railroad company is sued on its common-law liability for damages to goods delivered by it in a damaged condition, the presumption arises that it received the freight in good order, and that this presumption must be rebutted by proof. In Henry's Case, cited above, it is held that where it does not appear either that the carrier received the goods as in bad order or that they were in fact in bad order when received, the presumption is that they were in good order. Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 1348, is authority for the proposition that the bill of lading issued by the initial carrier is competent evidence to establish the condition of goods at the time of their delivery to such carrier, and that, where goods are received as in good order by the initial carrier, the presumption is that the goods remained in the same good condition when they came into the possession of the carrier sued. Section 2298 of the Civil Code of 1895 has reference only to railroads, and consequently the bill of lading issued in this case by the steamboat company would not have been competent evidence had the count for the statutory remedy been relied on; but, as only the count based on the common-law liability of the defendant was insisted upon, the bill of lading issued by the steamboat company, the initial carrier, was properly admitted. Its contents established the fact that the goods were delivered by the consignor in good order, and certainly, in connection with the other evidence in the case, raised the presumption that the defendant, the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, received them in good order. This presumption, unless rebutted, entitled the plaintiff to a recovery; and consequently it was error to direct a verdict for an amount so small that it amounted to a verdict for the defendant.

Judgment reversed.

STILES v. SHEDDEN. (No. 445.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 10, 1907.)

1. TRIAL—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE.

In an action upon a contract, the defendant is entitled to open and conclude when, by his pleadings, before the introduction of any evidence, he admits a prima facie case for the plaintiff; that is to say, such a case that, if no evidence were introduced, the plaintiff would be entitled to take judgment for the full amount authorized by his petition.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 50.]

2. BILLS AND NOTES—DELIVERY—TITLE.

The title to a negotiable promissory note indorsed in blank by the payee may thereafter pass by delivery to subsequent holders.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, § 466.]

3. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

Instructions inapplicable to the pleadings and the evidence, and therefore tending to confuse the jury, should not be given.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 587.]

4. SAME.

The court should not single out one of several issues and instruct the jury that it is the main issue; nor should he instruct them that this issue is to be determined by a consideration of the evidence of the witnesses who have testified on the stand and by interrogatories, where material documentary evidence has been introduced upon the question.

5. SAME.

Instructions tending to mislead the jury as to the true nature of the defense set up in the case should not be given.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 569.]

6. EVIDENCE—OPINION EVIDENCE.

Where a witness has stated that a note was turned over to another for a specific purpose, he may, as against the objection that it is opinionative, testify that this purpose has ended.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Cartersville; A. M. Foute, Judge.

Action by R. F. Shedden against William H. Stiles. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Shedden sued Stiles upon a promissory note for $500. The note was signed by Stiles, payable to himself or order, indorsed by himself and George T. Hodgson; both the indorsements being in blank. It also bore the indorsement: "For collection account of English-American Loan and Trust Co., Roby Robinson, Cashier." The defendant's answer admitted the execution of the note, and that the same was transferred by indorsement to Shedden. He set up in defense that the note was an accommodation paper, wholly without consideration; that it was obtained by Hodgson for Shedden at Shedden's instance and request, with the sole view that Shedden might use it as collateral; that these facts were fully known to Shedden at the time he took the note; that he paid nothing for it; that Shedden, recognizing this to be the fact, had never prior to the bringing of the suit presented the note for payment, or claimed that Stiles owed him anything on it, though nearly 10 years had elapsed in the meantime; that the note had long since served its purpose, and would have been canceled and returned, but for the fact that the parties thereto were under the impression that it had been destroyed. The defendant, therefore, alleged that he was not indebted to Shedden on the note, and that the latter was not a bona fide holder of the same for value. Upon this plea the defendant claimed the right to open and conclude. The court overruled this demand, and allowed this privilege to the plaintiff. This ruling is the basis for one of the exceptions taken in the record. The oral evidence was conflicting. That of the defendant tended to show that Shedden was the general agent and Hodgson the local agent of the Mutual Life Insurance Company; that Hodgson borrowed money from Shedden, and Shedden borrowed in New York; that Hodgson, in addition to certain notes which he put up as collateral for the loan made by Shedden to him, as an accommodation to Shedden executed his notes in blank to the sum of $100,000, and turned them over to Shedden in order that the latter might borrow money on them; and that at Shedden's instance he also, for the same purpose, obtained notes from his friends, getting them from Stiles, his partner, from Mure, his brother-in-law, Hodgson, his nephew, and Nicholson, his office boy, and the note in suit was of this number. When business connection between Hodgson and Shedden closed, all of these notes, except the one in suit, were returned by Shedden. By oversight the one in suit was not returned. Shedden, as a witness in his own behalf, denied all this, and said that he had bought this note from Hodgson and had paid him $500 for it. A large amount of letters and other documentary evidence was introduced by the defendant, tending strongly to support his plea. We mention this fact because exception is taken to a charge of the court tending to eliminate this evidence from consideration by the jury. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. In the motion for a new trial, the plaintiff in error assigned error upon the following instructions of the court to the jury: (1) "The plaintiff contends that he bought this note from one George T. Hodgson, and that he paid value for it according to its terms—in other words, that the note was discounted to him and that he took it up, paying value for it; that it was not a mere accommodation to him at all; that he did not receive it that way, and did not use it that way. You look to the evidence, gentlemen, and see what the plaintiff contends, and examine the note, which will be before you, and see if there is any evidence that it was used by the plaintiff at all; and I charge you that as this is a negotiable paper, if he had used it, it would have been necessary for him to have made an indorsement upon the note." (2) "I charge you that every transferrer of a negotiable instrument, whether by indorsement or delivery, warrants (unless otherwise agreed by the parties) that he is the lawful holder and has a right to sell, that the instrument is genuine, and that he has no knowledge of any facts that prove the instrument worthless, either by insolvency of the maker, payment, or otherwise." (3) "I charge you that the title of the holder of a note cannot be inquired into, unless it is necessary for the protection of the defendant, or to let in the defense which he seeks to make. I charge you that an indorsement or assignment of any bill, bond, or note, when the same is sued on by the indorsee, need not be proved, unless denied on oath." (4) "I charge you, gentlemen, that the main question for you in this case is this: Did the plaintiff pay Hodgson a valuable consideration for this note? And, in determining this, you will look to all the evidence as it comes to you from the witnesses, and the evidence presented by interrogatories." (5) "This being a negotiable instrument, if this plaintiff came into possession of it for a valuable consideration before it was due, and without any notice of any dishonor, he would be entitled to recover. I charge you that in support of the defendant's contention he must show, by a preponderance of the evidence, that Shedden did not pay Hodgson a consideration for the paper." Other portions of the charge are excepted to; but, as this court finds no error in them, it is not deemed necessary to set them out here. Another ground of the motion for a new trial complains that the court excluded from the jury the answer of the witness Hodgson, as follows: "This note most assuredly has served the purpose for which it was given, and it should have been returned to me when I made demand upon Mr. Shedden for the return of all my collateral notes, at which time most, and, as I thought, all, of them had been returned; and this one was included in my demand for their return." Other exceptions taken to rulings upon evidence are not considered material. There is in the motion also a ground of newly discovered evidence; but, as the affidavit as to the diligence used by client and counsel to discover this evidence before the trial is not sufficient (for it states the fact of such diligence as a mere matter of conclusion, without giving any facts upon which the conclusion is based), the court does not consider it.

Thos. W. Milner & Son, for plaintiff in error. P. S. Ethridge and J. M. Moon, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the foregoing facts). 1. Under the pleadings the defendant took the burden of proof, and was entitled to the opening and conclusion. In actions ex contractu the test is: If under the pleadings the plaintiff would be entitled to a judgment in his favor for the full amount authorized by his petition, without the introduction of any proof, unless the defendant by his evidence can affirmatively avoid the prima facie case admitted in plaintiff's favor, the defendant is entitled to open and conclude. In this case, the defendant having admitted the execution of the note and the transfer to the plaintiff, he admitted a prima facie case in the latter's favor. The rule does not contemplate that the defendant shall admit an absolute case for his adversary—only a prima facie case.

2. The instruction set out above and numbered 1 is so manifestly erroneous that we attribute it to a lapsus linguae. Of course, a negotiable note already indorsed in blank by the payee may pass by delivery, and in the case at bar Shedden could have used the note without putting his indorsement thereon. Heard v. De Loach, 105 Ga. 500, 30 S. E. 940. Indeed, under the evidence, we cannot reasonably account for the subsequent indorsement of the English-American Loan & Trust Company upon any other theory than that Shedden passed the note to it by delivery. We can readily appreciate how harmful this instruction could have been to the defendant, coming as it did at the beginning of the charge; for one of the defendant's contentions was that Shedden took this note as accommodation paper, in order that he might obtain money on it, a contention strenuously denied by the plaintiff, and this instruction practically settles the matter by informing the jury that Shedden could not have used the note without putting his indorsement on it; whence would arise the conclusion that he had not used it, and from that naturally the inference that he had not obtained it for that purpose.

3. The instructions numbered 2 and 3, while in the abstract correct statements of law, were inapplicable to the pleadings and the evidence, and therefore tended to confuse the jury. It is error to give such instructions. Culberson v. Alabama Construction Co., 127 Ga. 599, 56 S. E. 765, and the long line of cases cited in 7 Michie's Dig. Ga. Rep. 570, et seq.

4. The instruction numbered 4 is erroneous for two reasons: First, because it singles out one of the issues and gives judicial weight to it by characterizing it as the "main question," especially so when under the pleadings and the evidence this is not necessarily so, for, although the plaintiff might have paid a valuable consideration for the note, if he took it with notice of its true consideration, or rather lack of consideration; he would not be entitled to the protection of an innocent holder. Then the instruction eliminates from the consideration of the jury all of the documentary evidence introduced. Lamar v. Glawson, 38 Ga. 252; Bowden v. Achor, 95 Ga. 244 (8), also 245 (11), 22 S. E. 254; McLean v. Clark, 47 Ga. 24; Myers v. State, 97 Ga. 76, 102, 25 S. E. 252.

5. As to the instruction numbered 5, the error is that it overlooks the fact that notice of an original lack of consideration, and not notice of dishonor, was the contention of the defendant.

6. The evidence of Hodgson, set out above, was improperly excluded. He had stated the purpose for which the note had been delivered to Shedden. It was not opinionative for him to state that this purpose had ended. It is strenuously urged upon us that the judgment should be reversed upon the facts. While we must concede that the verdict is apparently strongly contrary to the weight of the evidence, yet this is a matter which addresses itself to the jury and to the trial judge, not to this court. We look only to see if there is any evidence to support the verdict.

Judgment reversed.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v.
COOPER. (No. 820.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1907.)

1. TELEGRAPHS—ERROR IN TRANSMISSION—AGENCY.

This case is controlled by the decision of the Supreme Court in Brooke v. Western Union Telegraph Company, 46 S. E. 826, 119 Ga. 695, and cases therein cited, in which it is held that in the transmission of a telegraphic message the telegraph company is the agent of the sender, to whom, and not to the company, the recipient must look for damages arising out of error in the transmission of the message.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Telegraphs and Telephones, § 37.]

2. SAME—CONTRACT FOR TRANSMISSION—JURISDICTION OF JUSTICE.

The contract for sending a telegraphic message is made with the sender, and not with the addressee or sendee; and hence any action brought by the sendee for delay in delivery must be an action ex delicto for breach of public duty due to the negligence of the telegraph company in failing to transmit or deliver a message in accordance with its legal duty. As held in the case of Wilson v. Western Union Telegraph Company, 52 S. E. 153, 124 Ga. 181, an action by the sendee must allege a breach of duty. The only right of action of the sendee is for the tort arising out of the breach of a legal duty, of which a justice's court has no jurisdiction. Nor does an appeal to the superior court invest such court with jurisdiction. Berger v. Saul, 34 S. E. 1036, 109 Ga. 240.

3. ERROR, WRIT OF—REVERSAL—WANT OF JURISDICTION BELOW—CONSENT OF PARTIES.

A suit in a court having no jurisdiction of the subject-matter is a nullity, and, when it appears from the record that a judgment has been rendered by a court having no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, that judgment will be reversed, although the point may not have been raised in the lower court. "Consent of parties * * * cannot give a court jurisdiction of a subject-matter when it has none by law; and, when this court discovers from the record that a judgment has been rendered by a court having no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the case is brought here for review upon writ of error, this court will of its own motion reverse the judgment." Smith v. Ferrario, 31 S. E. 38, 105 Ga. 53.

RATCLIFF v. SMITH et al., Commissioners. (No. 323.)

CERTIORARI—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE.

Where a petition for certiorari alleged that a trial was had before road commissioners of the petitioner, charging him with being a road defaulter, and a judgment rendered fining him $3 as such defaulter, and the answer to the writ of certiorari did not verify the statement that a judgment was rendered against him by said road commissioners, or disclose what disposition was made of the case by them, and no exception was taken so as to require the commissioners to answer more fully so as to verify the allegation as to the rendition of the judgment complained of, this court cannot reverse a judgment of the superior court overruling the certiorari. Landrum v. Moss, 1 Ga. App. 216; Stoner v. Magina, 43 S. E. 45, 116 Ga. 797; *Manning v. ## MAYOR AND COUNCIL OF AMERICUS v. JOHNSON. (No. 391.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1907.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — DEFECTIVE STREETS.

Municipal corporations are required to keep their streets and sidewalks in safe condition for travel in the ordinary modes by day and by night; and are responsible if they fail to exercise ordinary and reasonable care and diligence for the accomplishment of this end.

2. SAME—CARE OF TRAVELER.

A traveler using a street or sidewalk is required to use ordinary care to avoid being injured by any defect therein or obstruction thereon. What amount of lookout for defects or obstructions he must observe in order to meet this requirement is a question of fact for the jury, to be determined by the circumstances of each case.

3. NEGLIGENCE—ORDINARY CARE.

An instruction to the jury which, in attempting to define ordinary care, makes the jurors the standard of what is a prudent person, is erroneous.

4. DEDICATION — ACCEPTANCE — NECESSITY — EVIDENCE.

In order to bind a municipal corporation for the care of a strip of land offered by an abutting owner as a sidewalk, acceptance by the proper city authorities must be shown. The acceptance may be express or implied. If express, it can be shown only by the minutes of the official tribunal. If implied, it may be shown by proof that the sidewalk was worked and used under authority of the council, or other body having such matters in charge. Testimony that work was done upon the sidewalk by the street hands of the municipality, or by its engineer, or under the directions of its street committee, is admissible for the purpose of raising the inference that the work was done by authority of the municipal body.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Dedication, §§ 64, 83.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Americus; O. R. Crisp, Judge.

Action by Aline Johnson against the mayor and council of Americus. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Lane, Maynard & Hooper, for plaintiff in error. E. A. Nisbet and Blalock & Cobb, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The plaintiff obtained a verdict against the city of Americus on account of injuries received by her through her having fallen over a stump which she claimed was situated upon the sidewalk on the north side of Church street, in that city. There was sharp conflict in the testimony as to whether the stump was within or without the northern margin of the sidewalk, and also as to whether the walk on the north side of the street was a sidewalk, in the sense of a walk used as a portion of a public street and under the control and responsibility of the city government. The injury occurred at night; but there was an electric arc lamp nearby. The plaintiff admitted that she had seen the stump prior to the time of the injury; but explained that she had been accustomed to use the walk on the south side of the street, and was present on the north side on this occasion only by reason of the fact that the other side was temporarily obstructed, and that it had escaped her attention and memory that there was a stump on the walk she was using. The defendant introduced proof showing that, under the deeds by which the city held title to the street, this stump and probably the entire walk on the north side of the street were beyond the limits of the street. The plaintiff introduced evidence showing that the owner of the abutting property on the north side of the street had set his fences back, and had offered a dedication of the strip of land on which the stump was situated for the purposes of a sidewalk, and that the street force of the city had worked it as a part of the street. The minutes of the city council were introduced, showing that that body had never formally accepted the dedication. In the motion for a new trial several exceptions were taken to instructions of the court to the jury, and to rulings upon evidence. Upon that motion being overruled, the city brings error.

1. The degree of diligence required of municipal corporations in the maintenance of their streets and sidewalks is now well settled. It is required that they keep their streets and sidewalks in safe condition for travel in the ordinary modes by day and by night; and they are responsible for a failure to exercise ordinary and reasonable care and diligence to this end. Whether they have exercised that care and diligence is a question of fact, to be determined by the circumstances of each case. In determining this question, regard must be had as to whether the street is newly opened or has been in existence for some time, whether the municipality is small and poor, or populous and wealthy, whether the street is a frequented thoroughfare or a remote passageway. After viewing these and all other legitimate considerations, the jury must determine whether, in the light of all the circumstances, the municipality has used reasonable diligence to make the highway safe. Idlett v. Atlanta, 123 Ga. 821, 51 S. E. 709; City Council of Augusta v. Tharpe, 113 Ga. 152, 38 S. E. 889, and citations; Elliott's Roads and Streets, § 613.

2. The court instructed the jury as follows: "I charge you that there is no duty on a person walking on a sidewalk to watch for the condition of the sidewalk, because the law imposes it upon the municipality to have it reasonably safe." Every person is bound to ordinary care to prevent injury to himself from another's negligence. The judge in another portion of the charge gave the jury this principle; but this, instead of curing the error, tended to aggravate it, for, when the two instructions are taken together, it is tantamount to saying that, while every person is bound to exercise ordinary care to prevent injury to himself, this degree of care would not require him to watch for the condition of the sidewalk. This is obviously a question for the jury. Détrage v. Rome, 125 Ga. 804, 54 S. E. 654. While the jury may take into consideration the duty of the municipality to keep the sidewalk safe, as a circumstance tending to excuse the plaintiff from exercising as much caution for his own protection as otherwise he ought to use, yet this is to be given only such weight in determining the matter of his contributory negligence as the jury may believe it is entitled to under all the facts of the case. In this case the plaintiff knew there was a stump on the sidewalk. Some courts hold that this mere knowledge would defeat a recovery; but our courts, following the stronger current of authority, hold that the plaintiff's knowledge of the defect is not conclusive upon this subject. "The fact that a traveler voluntarily attempts to pass with knowledge of the defect or obstruction is not ordinarily conclusive evidence of a want of due care; but, if he has or ought to have notice thereof, he must exercise such care as the circumstances demand, and, if an ordinarily prudent person would not attempt to pass under the circumstances, he will be guilty of contributory negligence." Elliott, Roads and Streets, § 636. Idlett v. Atlanta, 123 Ga. 823, 51 S. E. 710, and citations; Harrell v. Macon, 1 Ga. App. 413, 58 S. E. 124, and citations. One of the exceptions taken in the record is that the court erred in failing to charge the jury "that, if the plaintiff knew that the stump over which she fell was upon the sidewalk, a greater degree of diligence should have been exercised upon her part to avoid the injury, and that, if she failed to exercise a greater degree of diligence than that required of a person walking along the sidewalk and having no knowledge of any defect or obstruction in the sidewalk, she would not be entitled to recover." From what has just been said it is manifest that this exception is not well taken. The degree of care is the same whether the traveler has knowledge of the defect or not. Ordinary care and diligence is the requirement in either situation. To constitute ordinary care in the case where knowledge exists may require the exercise of more caution, of more forethought, of more circumspection, or the employment of more acts of prudence than in the case where the knowledge does not exist, but the degree of care is always the same. The court should leave to the jury, untrammelled by any intimations further than a statement of the general legal rules applicable, the whole question of what acts the plaintiff should have done or should have refrained from doing under the particular situation.

3. In defining ordinary care the trial judge used this language to the jury: "Ordinary care is that care which you and the generality of men would exercise in taking care of your own property and affairs." A charge which makes the individual jurors the standard of prudence is erroneous. Coleman v. Allen, 79 Ga. 643, 5 S. E. 204, 11 Am. St. Rep. 449. The individual jurors might be extremely cautious men, or, on the other hand, might be somewhat careless; for uprightness and intelligence, not care and caution in handling one's affairs, is the test of the qualification of a juror, but from that intelligence, "from their observation, from their common sense, their common knowledge and experience" the jurors determine the standard of ordinary prudence, of ordinary care and diligence. Broyles v. Prisock, 97 Ga. 643, 25 S. E. 389.

4. To constitute a sidewalk a portion of a public street by dedication, both dedication and acceptance must appear; but both these elements may be shown by implication. To bind the city, the acceptance must be made by the public authorities; as to the city of Americus, under section 43 of its charter, by the mayor and city council. Acts 1889, p. 972. If a formal acceptance be relied upon, this can be shown only by the minutes of the council. Parsons v. Trustees, 44 Ga. 538. If implied acceptance be relied upon, it may be shown by proof that the street or walk was used or worked as a highway under the authority of the council. Mere use by the members of the public is not sufficient. "Acceptance may be implied from repairs made and ordered, or knowingly paid for by the authorities which have the legal power to adopt the street or highway." Abbott's Municipal Corp. § 736; Kelsoe v. Oglethorpe, 120 Ga. 954, 48 S. E. 366, 102 Am. St. Rep. 138; Georgia R. Co. v. Atlanta, 118 Ga. 489, 45 S. E. 256; Parsons v. Trustees, supra; Elliott's Roads and Streets, §§ 151-154. There was sufficient evidence both as to the dedication and acceptance to authorize the submission of the same to the jury. Testimony that work was done upon the sidewalk by the street hands of the city, or by the city engineer, or under the direction of members of the street committee, is admissible for the purpose of raising the implication that the work was done under authority of the city council.

There being evidence tending to show that the stump was not on the land originally bought by the city for a street, and also a dispute as to whether the street had been widened by the donation of the abutting landowner and acceptance by the city of an additional strip to be used for the sidewalk, both these questions should have been submitted to the jury.

Judgment reversed.

LEE & ANDERSON v. LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. et al. (No. 287.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 18, 1907.)

1. GARNISHMENT—PROPERTY SUBJECT—SETTLEMENT OF TORT.

When a summons of garnishment has been served upon the defendant in an action for damages, and when, in compromise of such an action, an agreement is made by the defendant thus garnished to settle the plaintiff's claims for injuries alleged, the proceeds of such agreement or the sum agreed to be paid is subject to garnishment issued in behalf of a creditor of the plaintiff in the suit for damages. While liability on the tort is not garnishable, the amount agreed to be paid in settlement thereof is subject to garnishment. He who disregards a summons of garnishment does so at his peril.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Garnishment, §§ 214-216.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

2. SAME.

Liabilities for torts are not subject to garnishment until liquidated by judgment or otherwise. The burden is on the plaintiff to show, upon traverse, that funds have come into the garnishee's hands, prior to the service of the summons of garnishment or pending the same, subject to the proceedings. This is not done by showing that the defendant claimed a cause of action for tort against the garnishee, and that without admitting liability the garnishee, after service of summons, bought peace by paying to the defendant a sum of money in cash or in a negotiable instrument which the defendant immediately negotiated to a third person; it not appearing that there was any other agreement liquidating the defendant's demand against the garnishee. (Per Powell, J., dissenting.)

Error from Superior Court, Newton County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Action by Lee & Anderson against J. T. Wright. Judgment for plaintiffs. Summons of garnishment served on the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and others. Judgment for garnishees, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Rogers & Knox, for plaintiff in error. Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming and J. M. Pace, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. Lee & Anderson held a fi. fa. against J. Tom Wright, obtained in the county court of Newton county. Summons of garnishment, based upon this judgment, was served on certain railroad companies on the 24th of April, 1906, requiring them to answer at the July term, 1906, of Newton county court, what property, money, or effects of the defendant they had at the date of the service of the summons of garnishment, and also what property, money or effects of the defendant may have come into their hands at any time from the date of said service to the date of the answer, and also what they owed the defendant at the date of the service, and also what they may have become indebted to the defendant at any time between the date of the service of the summons and the answer. At the time of the service of said summons there was pending in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia, at Atlanta, a suit for $15,000 for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained on March 4, 1905, in which said J. T. Wright was plaintiff and the garnishees were defendants. On the 14th day of May, 1906, while the trial of said case was in progress, there was a parley between plaintiff and defendants therein, the outcome of which was that the garnishees agreed to pay J. T. Wright the sum of $1,750 in full settlement and release of any and all claims whatsoever growing out of said injury. On the same day the garnishees gave to Wright a sight draft for $1,750 in full settlement of any and all claims and damages incident to the alleged personal injuries, which draft was paid by the garnishees on the 15th day of May, 1906, in full. The garnishees thus ignored the garnishment of plaintiffs in fi. fa., and paid the whole amount of said $1,750 to said Wright. The garnishees filed their answer at the July term, 1906, of the county court of Newton county, denying that they were indebted to J. T. Wright at the time of the service of the summons of garnishment, or that they had become indebted to him at any time since the service, in any sum whatever which was subject to the process of garnishment, or that they owed him any debt; but the answer stated the facts substantially as herein set out. The answer was traversed by the plaintiffs in fi. fa., and the case was appealed by consent to the superior court. On the trial the plaintiffs tendered in evidence their fi. fa. against Wright, obtained at the October term, 1903, of Newton county court, for the principal sum of $291.34; also, certified copies of the suit in the United States court and of the judgment of that court withdrawing the case from the jury and dismissing it; also, the paid draft given by the garnishees to said Wright for $1,750 in full settlement of his claim for damages from personal injuries. The court rendered judgment against the traverse and in favor of the garnishees and the plaintiffs excepted, insisting that the garnishees acted in their own wrong in ignoring the garnishment and paying the defendant the full amount of money, as the summons of garnishment operated as a lien from the time of service up to the time of making the answer, and that by no act of the debtor or the garnishees or both could the lien be defeated.

Two questions are presented. Is the fund, for any reason of law or public policy, exempt from garnishment? Or are the garnishees protected by reason of the fact that the draft outstanding in the hands of other persons might subject them to liability to pay the amount a second time? A claim for tort is not subject-matter of garnishment; and it is insisted that agreements to settle or compromise should not be hampered or thwarted, because it is to the public interest that such cases be settled. The draft in this case was drawn by a railroad company on itself "An order for money, drawn by a municipal corporation upon its own treasurer, payable upon demand and without condition, is in effect a promissory note and is 'an unconditional contract in writing' within the meaning of Civ. Code 1895, § 4134." Morgan v. Cobutta, 120 Ga. 423, 47 S. E. 971. Then, could a promissory note be garnished? We think the court erred in finding against the traverse. Every facility should be afforded to creditors for the collection of debts, and the processes of courts should not be disregarded and contemned unless the right to ignore them is unquestioned. With the exceptions hereafter mentioned, garnishment reaches everything due at the time of service of garnishment, and everything becoming due by the garnishee to the debtor up to the time of the answer. Having been served with process of garnishment, if there is any time between the service of the summons and the date of his answer when he becomes indebted to the garnishing plaintiff's debtor, no matter what the manner of his payment, he pays at his own peril. The public policy which favors the compromise and settlement of lawsuits is not superior to the public policy in favor of collecting a just debt and requiring that the proper notice be taken of the process of the courts. The question then is: Was there any time after the service of the summons when the garnishees in this case were indebted to Wright, the defendant in garnishment? If there was any such time, the lien of the garnishment would attach. It is immaterial whether the garnishees were liable to Wright in tort or not; for that liability is not subject to garnishment. See Holmes v. Pope, 1 Ga. App. 338, 58 S. E. 281. The fact that Wright was plaintiff in an action for damages arising from personal injuries to himself is therefore immaterial, unless for some reason or in some way it became the occasion of a contract by which the garnishees became indebted to him. We think the undisputed evidence shows that a debt from the garnishees to Wright was created by the proposition to pay him $1,750 and his acceptance. It was not payment, but it was a promise to pay, supported by the consideration that he would dismiss the suit. It was a mutual understanding, creating an obligation on the part of each of the parties and enforceable by either on his compliance with his agreement.

The fact that the garnishees denied liability as to Wright's suit is inconsequential in the case. They bought their peace for the fixed stipulated price which Wright charged for it. The bargain was struck, and they owed him for their purchase until they paid him. The draft was, in effect, a promissory note, but neither the draft nor note is the debt. Each is only evidence of a debt which antecedes it. The note would presume the existence of a debt, but a debt does not depend upon the creation of either draft or note. When the parties in the case in the United States court made their bargain by which the garnishees promised to pay Wright $1,750, they could have paid it in cash as well as by draft. If they could, then the fact that they gave a draft is immaterial in the elucidation of the question as to whether they are subject to garnishment. To say this would be to hold that the length of time required to discharge a debt determines the question as to whether it is such a debt as will be reached by garnishment already of force and served upon the garnishee. If a garnishee's promissory note or negotiable draft is outstanding when the garnishment is sued out, the garnishee is protected, to prevent him from having to pay the debt twice. But where a garnishee, having no obligation to pay outstanding voluntarily assumes one to the debtor of a garnishing creditor, he cannot invoke protection against a creditor which he himself has created. The garnishees insist that to hold them subject in this case would be to prevent sales for cash by a debtor where a possible purchaser has been garnisheed. We do not think this of necessity follows. We are, at least, not called upon to so decide. Whether this is or is not true when the garnishees gave Wright the draft on themselves, it was to all intents and purposes a promissory note due and payable on demand; and it cannot be questioned that the debt thus evidenced, not being for any admitted or established liability in tort, is subject to garnishment. The very learned counsel for the defendants in error insists that, in accordance with the provisions of the garnishment law applicable to negotiable instruments, the garnishees from the moment they gave the check or sight draft were indebted, not to Wright, but to whomsoever was the bona fide holder at the time it was presented for payment. We do not think that a garnishee required by mandate of the court to answer as to his relation and status, whether as to property in his hands or debt due by him, should be allowed to nullify the process of the court, and at the same time claim its protection against his own act. But, whether or not we are right in this opinion, when the debt is evidenced by a draft drawn by one on himself, the rule relied upon is not applicable.

We have considered the case wholly from the position that there was no property in the hands of the garnishee up to the time of the answer, and that the only question to be considered was whether any debt, at any time prior to the answer, became due by the garnishee to Wright, the defendant in garnishment. We have borne in mind the uniform ruling that liability for tort is not a debt, and that the debt which arose was independent of any such liability, and that, as insisted by the garnishees (defendants in the action for damages), no such liability in fact existed. But, while liability for tort is not a debt, the fact must not be lost sight of that a garnishee is not only required to answer what he owes the defendant, but he is also made responsible to account to the court for any property of the debtor subject to the garnishee's control and disposal. If A., having B.'s horse in his hands as bailee, answers that after being garnished he exchanged him by B.'s order, for a piece of land in Alabama, not subject to the garnishment, would he be discharged? If, then, the garnishees had any property of Wright in their hands, the lien of the garnishment would attach, and they could not change its status or character. And, while liability for tort is not subject to garnishment, that a claim arising from a tort is property has been held by the Supreme Court. In Banks v. McCandless, 119 Ga. 798, 47 S. E. 332, it was expressly held that the contingent liability of a tort-feasor is property which the debtor cannot transfer to the injury of a creditor. If this be true, and if it is based upon any sound reason, can the debtor, with the aid of the garnishing creditor, be permitted to put the property where a creditor cannot reach it? If it be property subject to a creditor's demand, as expressly held in 59 and 119 Ga., will not garnishment hold it until the proper tribunal may at least have an opportunity of adjudging whether it is or is not exempt from the process? We think so. The extent of the holding as to liability for tort was that such liability was not a debt subject to garnishment. The reason for this is apparent, because the amount has not been ascertained; for, after judgment, garnishment is effective to fix a lien on the recovery. Under the ruling in Westmoreland v. Powell, 59 Ga. 258, the term "debtor" is applicable to tort-feasors, and is extended so as to include "one who owes another for an unascertained damage to person or property," so far as fraudulent conveyances by that debtor is concerned. And following this with the ruling in 119 Ga., 47 S. E., supra, the court, in our opinion, makes the principle applicable to garnishments by holding that an unascertained claim for damage is property.

And we see no conflict in these holdings. A claim for unliquidated damages may be property (its value dependent upon circumstances very great or very small), while it cannot be a debt because the amount is unknown. As property the claim of Wright in this case was subject to garnishment, and as a promise of the garnishees to pay a certain sum, whereby a debt was created, it was no less subject. In either event the judgment of the trial judge was erroneous.

Judgment reversed.

POWELL, J. (dissenting). I will outline my reasons for dissenting in this case. Before the plaintiffs could recover against the garnishees (the railroad companies), it was incumbent upon them to show that the garnishees were indebted to the defendant (Wright) at the time of the service of the summons of garnishment, or became indebted between that date and the time of filing their answer. Proof that at the time of the service of the summons an action was pending by Wright against the railroad companies is not proof that the companies were really indebted to him. This would be true even as to an action ex contractu; and it is irrefragably true as to an action for tort. Gamble v. Central R. Co., 80 Ga. 595, 7 S. E. 315, 12 Am. St. Rep. 276. If it had been shown that, as a result of either form of action, a final unappealed judgment had been rendered, this would have been sufficient evidence of an indebtedness from and after the rendition of the judgment. In the case at bar no final judgment was ever rendered. Did the railroad companies, then, become indebted between the service of the summons of garnishment and the date of the answer thereto? If the parties merely liquidated, by agreement, an admitted or established tort, the question should be answered in the affirmative. From the record it is clear they did not do this. In the very proposition of settlement the companies denied liability, and merely offered, as a cash transaction, to buy peace. They offered to buy for cash something which was not, at least so far as the proof shows, a liability against them. This they could do without incurring an indebtedness; for in cash transactions no indebtedness is contemplated by the parties, or by the law. Bergan v. Magnus, 98 Ga. 514, 25 S. E. 570; Mathewson v. Belmont Company, 76 Ga. 359; Emery v. Atlanta Exchange, 88 Ga. 325, 14 S. E. 556. It was a cash transaction; but it is said that the companies did not pay in cash. They did the same thing. They paid by a negotiable instrument; and, as Lord Mansfield says of such instruments in the case of Miller v. Race, 1 Burr. 457: "Now they are not goods, not securities, nor documents for debts, nor are so esteemed; but are treated as money, as cash, in the ordinary course and transaction of business by the general consent of mankind, which gives them the credit and currency of money to all intents and purposes. They are as much money as guineas themselves are, or any other current coin that is used in common payments as money or cash." Indeed, this court and the Supreme Court recognize that an indebtedness by negotiable instrument is not subject to garnishment, unless the garnishing creditor shows that the bill has become past due in the hands of the defendant, or that it is otherwise so impounded that possibility of its negotiation is excluded. Of course, if the draft given to Wright was not a negotiable instrument, my whole argument falls. It was in the following form: "$1,750.00. Georgia Railroad. Atlanta, Ga. May 14, 1906. At sight pay to the order of John T. Wright the sum of seventeen hundred and fifty dollars, in full settlement of any and all claims and damages incident to alleged personal injuries sustained at Atlanta, Ga., in the Union Passenger Depot on March 4, 1905. To W. S. Morris, Esq., Treasurer, Ga. R. R. Augusta, Ga. Jos. B. Cumming, Gen. Counsel Ga. R. R." Indorsed: "John T. Wright." Also: "Pay to the order of any bank or banker. Prior endorsements guaranteed. May 14, 1906. Fourth National Bank of Atlanta, Ga., Chas. J. Ryan, Cashier." "A bill of exchange may be drawn upon the drawer himself, and is then in effect the promissory note or the accepted bill of the drawer at the holder's election; and this is true in general of a bill or a draft drawn by a principal on his agent, or by an agent on his principal, or in the principal's business by one agent on another." 7 Cyc. 569. Treated purely as a promissory note, the instrument in question may be properly considered as past due, and therefore not negotiable from the moment of its issue, under the rule stated in Civ. Code 1895, § 3700. Under the same section, if treated (as the holder was entitled to do at his option) as a bill of exchange, it was not due until presented for payment, if presented in a reasonable time. The intention of the parties as derived from the form and nature of the instrument largely controls. It was manifestly not the purpose of the railroad company to give its note payable on demand, but to give a draft made in Atlanta, and not payable until it could be presented in Augusta, and to have it operate and pass as an ordinary bill of exchange. In the case of Lynch v. Goldsmith, 64 Ga. 50. Judge Bleckley—and, when in Georgia decisions we speak of Bleckley, "we have reached the mountain from which the drift boulders were detached,"—after deciding as to the applicability of Civ. Code 1895, § 3700, to the instrument then in question, adverts by way of obiter to the proposition that the intention as to the maturity of the instrument should be determined by the purposes it is issued to subserve. In the case at bar the maker of the paper manifestly intended that it should not be payable on immediate demand. The payee likewise so took it, for he immediately negotiated it to the bank. Being a negotiable instrument, the garnishment did not catch the indebtedness thereby represented.

I think therefore that the trial judge decided the case properly, and dissent from the judgment of this court to the contrary.

Action by Garrett & Russell against G. W. Stone. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Stone shipped 24 bales of cotton to Garrett & Russell, cotton factors, at Augusta, Ga. From time to time he drew drafts on Garrett & Russell against this cotton. These drafts were cashed by Garrett & Russell, and Stone admitted receiving the money thereon. The drafts were all introduced in evidence, and showed that the total amount advanced exceeded the proceeds for which the cotton was sold by the sum sued for. Suit was brought for this amount in the county court, and appealed to the superior court. The defense was that the plaintiffs had been instructed by the defendant to hold the cotton until he ordered them to sell it, and that they disregarded his instructions and sold it when the market was down. His letters to the plaintiff, put in evidence, showed that he directed them to sell the cotton and apply the proceeds to the payment of the drafts. This the plaintiffs did in the usual course of trade, and, after applying the proceeds to the payment of the defendant's drafts, there was left the balance represented by the suit. The jury found a verdict for the full amount, with interest. A motion for a new trial was made by the defendant on the general grounds, and was overruled.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—PLEADING—DEFECTS IN MACHINERY—INSPECTION—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In a suit by a servant against the master, the petition should plainly and distinctly set forth the elements necessary to a recovery. Legal results arising from the facts alleged may be pleaded in general terms or in the form of a legal conclusion. A petition so drawn is good against demurrer.

(a) In such a petition, as to the element of the master's knowledge of the defect in the instrumentality causing the injury, if the facts alleged make a case where by law the duty of knowing of the defect is imposed upon the master, the pleader may, without subjecting his petition to successful attack by a demurrer, charge in general terms that the master "knew or ought to have known" of the defect; aliter, where the facts alleged do not as a matter of law devolve this duty upon the master.

(b) Among the absolute duties of the master is that of making inspections for the discovery of defects and dangers in those instrumentalities within the range of which the servant is likely to come in the discharge of his duties; hence, by law, the master ought to know of such defects as a reasonable inspection would disclose.

(c) The servant must allege and prove his lack of knowledge, both actual and constructive, of the defect; but this want of knowledge, especially in cases where the death of the servant has resulted, may be shown circumstantially.

(d) As a general rule, a servant is under no obligation to inspect the appliances about which he works, or that part of the plant by which his safety may be affected, for the purpose of discovering concealed dangers which would not be discovered by superficial observation.

(e) If the allegations of the petition show that the machinery furnished by the master was not reasonably safe for a servant operating it with reasonable care and diligence, the petition is not subject to demurrer on the ground that it is not also alleged that it was not equal in kind to that in general use.

(f) Sections 2611 and 2612 of the Civil Code of 1895 are not statutory in origin. They are not, and do not purport to be, exhaustive of the subject of the reciprocal liabilities and duties of master and servant. They are mere codifications of particular phases of the law as applied by the Supreme Court in certain reported cases, and, for the most part, rest on statements culled in those cases from text-books; and are therefore to be construed in connection with the entire general law on the subject.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Polk County; F. A. Irwin, Judge.

Action by F. M. Helms against the Southern States Portland Cement Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The error assigned in this case is the overruling of a general and special demurrer to the plaintiff's petition. The petition, in substance, alleges: (1) The jurisdiction of the court over the person of the defendant. (2) That defendant has damaged plaintiff in the sum of $10,000. (3) That petitioner is the wife of one Charles E. Helms, who was on the 24th day of October, 1905, killed while engaged at his work as what is known as "oller," at the plant of defendant, where the defendant is engaged in the manufacture of cement, in said county. (4) That "her said husband was at work at said cement plant, and the only duty he had to perform under his contract of employment was to oil the machinery, which he was doing at the time he was killed." (5) That "it was not her husband's duty to watch and keep in repair, or to adjust any of the said machinery, or to examine the same at any time, or to observe or inspect it and note any misconstruction or disarrangement thereof. That he was incompetent to do so, which was known to the said defendant." (6) That "among the machinery of the defendant at said plant there is what is known as 'tube mill' No. 4, which is constructed and connected with and operated by a line of iron shafting, which rests upon a cement wall and extends from an electric dynamo or motor near said cement wall, across said wall to a cogwheel that is attached to the large drum or tube, in which the cement material is in some manner treated. That on top of said cement wall, where the said shafting rests, there is a boxing or journal in which said shaft revolves; and on top of this boxing or journal are two places or small holes made to admit oil therein, and that this particular place and piece of machinery was being oiled by petitioner's husband at the time of his death." (7) That "there is an iron cuff or collar that is made in two pieces that is fastened together on each of the two sides of said shafting by bolts and set screws. The said cuff or collar is made with a trench or groove in the outer circular edge thereof, evidently for the purpose of permitting the said cuff or collar to be fastened together and around said shafting by means of two iron bolts, and at the same time prevent said bolts and also the set screws (which hold the cuff or collar in place) from protruding beyond the outer surface of the said cuff or collar, and, upon being properly constructed, would present a smooth and regular surface." (8) That "the set screw was an iron or steel screw that went through the edge of the cuff or collar and into a slot or notch in said shafting to hold the said cuff or collar in its proper place. That if the said screw had been properly made, of the right size and length, it would have served its purpose perfectly, and the head of it would have been below the outer surface of the said cuff and down in the trench or groove in the said cuff. Said cuff was placed on said shaft just flush with the edge of the said cement wall on the side next to the dynamo, and this was the side of the wall from which plaintiff's husband had to approach the said oiling places to oil the said piece of machinery." (9) That "the said bolts holding the said cuff together were extended so far at each end as to be dangerous; for the reason that, if any part of the clothing of ordinary kind worn by petitioner's husband happened to come into contact with the cuff while the machinery was in motion, the rapid revolving shaft would cause the ends of said bolts to catch the clothing." (10) That "the head of said set screws protruded quite a way beyond the edge of the said cuff, and that said shaft while in operation made about 200 revolutions to the minute." (11) That "it was her husband's duty to oil said machinery when it was in motion, and that, while he was so doing on the date aforesaid, the head of the said set screw and the ends of the said bolts in the said cuff or collar came in contact with his clothing, and the shaft, being operated by electricity, was rapidly revolving as aforesaid, and caught up his clothing which he had on, and held him by this means and forced his body around as the shaft revolved, and struck his head and other parts of his body against the said cement wall and other parts of said machinery, and in this manner caused his death." (12) That "it was negligence on the part of the defendant to have constructed said machinery as aforesaid, and in permitting it to so remain." (13) That "said machinery could have been made perfectly safe by an expenditure of not more than $10, by placing guard rails along the outside of said cement wall, just a few inches beyond the said cuff or collar, which would have prevented any injury or danger to petitioner's husband while in the discharge of his duty as oller, and to others in going around said shaft and cuff. Petitioner alleges that the failure on the part of the said defendant to so place such guard rails was negligence." (14) The age and earning capacity of petitioner's deceased husband is alleged.

To the original petition the defendant demurred on the following grounds: No cause of action is set forth. No liability against defendant is shown. No negligence rendering defendant liable is shown. It appears that the alleged injury was caused by the negligence of the deceased. It does not appear that the deceased could not have avoided the injury by exercise of proper care. It appears that the deceased had equal means with the master of observing the danger. There is no allegation that the master knew of the danger, or that the servant did not know of the danger or had not equal means with the master of knowing the danger. It also demurred specially to paragraphs 9 and 13 of the petition, "because it is not alleged that the construction of the machinery therein mentioned is not like that used in other plants of like nature and engaged in the same business," the defendant not being bound to furnish any certain, particular contrivance. It also specially demurred to paragraph 10, in that it was not specific as to the distance the set screw protruded. The plaintiff thereupon filed the following amendment, adding at the close of paragraph 7 the words: "It was the duty of the defendant so to construct its machinery as to make its operation attended with no unusual danger to the said husband of the plaintiff, Charles E. Helms, while performing his duties in connection therewith. This was not done, as defendant was bound to do, but, instead of the said cuff being properly put together, around the shaft in the manner it was made and intended should be, it was unskillfully and carelessly done, for the reason that one of the iron or steel bolts that held the two pieces of the collar together was too long, and protruded beyond the outer surface of the collar from three-eighths to one-half inch. That plaintiff's husband had only been at work at the said place in the capacity of oiler but a few days, and, the said machinery being in motion night and day, he had no opportunity of knowing its improper manner of construction, and that he had no notice given him of it, and, not being a skilled mechanic, did not know how it should be constructed. That plaintiff's said husband could not by ordinary diligence have discovered the defect and danger. That the defendant had a mechanic whose duty it was to see that the machinery was properly constructed, and it was not plaintiff's husband's duty. Besides, it was the duty of the defendant to properly construct and keep in repair all its machinery, and to keep it in a reasonably safe condition. That defendant knew or ought to have known of the defective condition of the said machinery above described." To the amended petition the demurrer was renewed, the following additional grounds being added: As to the statement in paragraph 5 that deceased "was incompetent to do so, which was known to the said defendant," on the ground that the allegation is a mere conclusion of the pleader, and states no facts on which said allegation is based. As to paragraph 2, on the same ground. As to the amendment to paragraph 7, on the ground that it is confused, mixed, and not clear in meaning. As to the statement in this amendment, that "it was the duty of the defendant so to construct its machinery as to make its operation attended with no unusual danger to the deceased," because it states a mere conclusion, with no facts upon which to predicate it. Also as to that portion of the original petition which states that deceased had been at work as an oiler but a few days, on the ground that the number of days is not definitely stated. Also as to the statement in the amendment "that plaintiff's said husband could not by ordinary diligence have discovered the defect and danger," because it states a mere conclusion of the pleader. And as to the statement "that defendant knew or ought to have known of the defective condition," on the same ground. There were other grounds, but all of them are of substantially the same nature as these above set out. Upon the amendment being made, the court struck paragraph 13 of the petition and overruled the demurrer, and the defendant excepts to this judgment. It also complains that the court erred in allowing the amendment.

Blance & Tison, for plaintiff. In error.
Janex & Hutchens, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. 1. In the case of Cedartown Cotton & Export Co. v. Miles, No. 332, 58 S. E. 289, this court undertook to discuss and to elaborate the form and nature of a petition for the recovery by a servant against his master for damages for personal injuries received in the course of the employment. The petition in this case seems to come up to the standard there set. In fact, if the pleader in this case had had the opinion just referred to before him, he could hardly have followed it with greater accuracy. The nature of the servant's employment, of the instrumentality causing the injury, and of the defect which was the immediate cause, as well as the relation existing between these things as bringing about an actionable wrong, are carefully and definitely set forth. Matters of fact are set forth as such, while those matters of which the court will take judicial notice are pleaded as legal conclusions, which is unobjectionable. The petition states that the deceased was employed as an oiler, and connects the employment with the injury, by alleging that in pursuance to the performance of his duty he was engaged at the time he was hurt in oiling the defective pieces of the machinery. The duty of the defendant to furnish reasonably safe machinery is alleged in general terms, and, as said before, this is allowable under the rules of good pleading. The instrumentality is definitely described, and the definiteness of description increases, as, indeed, it should, as it touches the questions of the relation of the instrumentality to the duties of the servant, to the specific mode of the injury, to the exact nature of the defect, to the negligence of the master and the lack of contributory negligence on the part of the servant; for by alleging the presence of the journal and the oil holes therein it shows the relation of the instrumentality to the duties of the servant. By alleging the presence of a projecting set screw capable of catching clothing, it shows the relation of the instrumentality to the exact mode of the injury. By alleging the presence of this projecting set screw at a place where in the ordinary construction and arrangement of the machine it would not be expected to project, because of the groove into which it should fit snugly, it shows the exact nature of the defect. And from these same things the negligence of the master appears, and by showing the speed at which the shaft and collar revolved it negatives the contributory negligence of the servant. The defect is set forth with certainty, and from the facts stated it appears that it was latent; also, that it was the proximate cause of the injury. As to the element of the master's knowledge, the allegation is "that the defendant knew or ought to have known of the defective condition of the machinery above described." Taken in connection with the other allegations of the petition, this is sufficient. As was said in the Miles Case, supra: "If constructive knowledge be charged to the master, and the facts stated in the petition make a case where by law the duty of knowing is imposed upon the master, the resulting legal conclusion 'that he ought to have known' is not subject to objection." Among the absolute nondelegable duties of the master are those of furnishing reasonably safe machinery and of making inspections for the discovery of defects in those instrumentalities within the range of which the servant is expected to come. Dennis v. Schofield's Sons Co., 1 Ga. App. 489, 57 S. E. 925; Moore v. Dublin Cotton Mills, 127 Ga. 610, 56 S. E. 839 (3); Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Dukes, 121 Ga. 791, 49 S. E. 788; Babcock v. Johnson, 120 Ga. 1034, 48 S. E. 438 (6); McDonnell v. Central Ry. Co., 118 Ga. 86, 44 S. E. 840. Hence by law the master ought to know of such defects; and it therefore follows that, the preliminary facts necessary to raise the duty having been set forth in detail, the statement of the legal conclusion is unobjectionable. Pierce v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 122 Ga. 664, 50 S. E. 468. The servant's lack of actual knowledge is not directly alleged, but this element is inferentially shown from the facts stated; and, in the absence of a more specific demurrer pointing out the fact that this is pleaded inferentially, and not directly, we shall hold the petition sufficient. "Demurrer, being a critic, should itself be free from imperfections." Special demurrer must put its finger upon the exact point of weakness. The allegations are that plaintiff's husband had only been at work at the said place in the capacity of an oiler but a few days, and, the said machinery being in motion night and day, he had no opportunity of knowing of the improper manner of construction, and that he had no notice given him of it, and "could not by ordinary diligence have discovered the defect and danger"; and this in connection with the fact that the shaft revolved at the rate of 200 revolutions per minute, which would naturally render the defect ordinarily unobservable, makes a circumstantial case of lack of knowledge. As the Supreme Court says, through Justice Cobb, in the McDonnell Case, 118 Ga. 91, 44 S. E. 843: "Want of knowledge on the part of the servant as to the defects in the machinery may be shown by circumstances, as well as by direct evidence. Of course, in a case like the present, where the servant loses his life, it is impossible in a suit by his widow to show by direct evidence this want of knowledge. If the circumstances are such that it can be reasonably inferred that the servant did not have knowledge, this inference from the facts sufficiently establishes want of knowledge." As a nicety of pleading, it is better to allege the lack of actual knowledge directly, even though the proof be circumstantial. However, in the light of what we have just said, we hold that the petition sufficiently alleges a lack both of actual and of constructive knowledge. As to the element of constructive knowledge, the statement in Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Dukes, 121 Ga. 787, 49 S. E. 788, is pertinent: "As a general rule, a servant is under no obligation to inspect the appliances about which he works, or that part of the plant by which his safety may be affected, for the purpose of discovering concealed dangers which would not be disclosed by superficial observation." See, also, Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Gladman, 1 Ga. App. 259, 58 S. E. 249.

Since in this case the servant met his death, not from the obvious danger of the rapidly revolving shaft, but from the concealed danger of a projecting set screw, the case is easily distinguishable from the case of Commercial Guano Co. v. Neather, 114 Ga. 416, 40 S. E. 299, and McDaniel v. Acme Brewing Co., 118 Ga. 80, 38 S. E. 404. It must be remembered, too, in this case that the projecting set screw was located in a place where a servant relying upon the prudence of the master would not ordinarily anticipate it. Indeed, while the construction of the machine seems to have necessitated the presence of a set screw in this collar, yet, since it was also necessary to oil the adjoining bearing, the maker of the machine, obviously anticipating the danger that would exist by leaving the head of the crew exposed, had arranged a groove in the collar into which the set screw might fit without protruding. The negligence consisted not in the use of a set screw, but in leaving it protruding, instead of protecting it by placing it down within the groove. See, in this connection, Labatt, M. & S. § 77, and cases cited in the footnote.

The objection that the petition does not allege that the machinery was not equal in kind to that in general use is not well taken. In the first place, this fact does inferentially, if not absolutely, appear from the allegations made. Also, under Civ. Code, § 2611, the master is bound to exercise ordinary care "in furnishing machinery equal in kind to that in general use, and reasonably safe for all persons who operate it with ordinary care and diligence." Taken thus conjunctively, these two clauses are measureably accurate in stating the rule upon this subject. In cases involving the law of master and servant we must not forget, in applying the two sections of our Civil Code of 1895 (sections 2611 and 2612), that they are not statutory in origin. They are mere codifications of particular phases of the law as applied by the Supreme Court in certain reported cases; and for the most part rest on statements culled in these cases from Wood's Law of Master and Servant. As we said in King v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 1 Ga. App. 88, 58 S. E. 252, codification has given them no element of exhaustiveness, but the whole law of master and servant exists just as it did before these sections appeared in our Code; and there are many phases of this branch of the law not covered by these two Code sections. We look to the general law as limiting, explaining, and extending their meaning. The fact that the machinery furnished by the master is equal in kind to that in general use is a circumstance tending to show that he has exercised ordinary care in that respect; but, after all, there is the further test that it must be reasonably safe for all persons who operate it with ordinary care.

With the exceptions of some regrettable lack of unity in form and order of arrangement, a rhetorical rather than a substantial blemish, the petition is well drawn. As amended it sets out a clear, definite cause of action; and the court properly overruled the demurrer.

2. The amendment to the petition was properly allowed, over the objection that it introduced a new cause of action. King v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., supra, and cases therein cited.

1. BRIDGES—PUBLIC BRIDGES.

"A bridge which constitutes a portion of the public road is necessarily a public bridge."

2. SAME — REPAIRS — NEGLIGENCE — LIABILITY OF COUNTY.

It matters not by what authority such bridge is constructed, whether by act of the General Assembly or an order of the county

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Early County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by J. R. Fain against Early county. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

R. H. Sheffield, for plaintiff in error. L. M. Rambo, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Fain brought suit in a justice's court against Early county, on account of damages resulting from injuries received by his horse in falling through a public bridge of said county. By consent the case was appealed to the superior court without a trial in the justice's court. The judge of the superior court, without the intervention of a jury, tried the case on the following agreed statement of facts: "That on the 14th day of February, 1904, J. R. Fain was driving along the Ft. Gaines and Damascus public road in a buggy with a horse attached thereto, which was the property of J. R. Fain; that on said public road, about one-fifth of a mile south of Gaines cross-roads, in the 1535 district, G. M., of Early county, a bridge was constructed over a gully or drain, said bridge being under 10 feet in length, by the county of Early by its proper officers, to wit, the superintendent of roads of Early county, Ga., and not constructed under sections 344, 345, or 346 of the Political Code of 1895, since December 29, 1888; that said described bridge formed a part of the Ft. Gaines and Damascus public road, and was a continuation of said public road over a drain, and was used by the public as a public bridge; that on the 14th day of February, 1904, the flooring of said bridge was in an inferior, insufficient, and decayed condition, and that the timbers of said bridge were in an inferior and decayed condition, which was unknown to J. R. Fain, and which was known to the superintendent of the public roads of Early county and the county commissioners of Early county; that on the said 14th of February, 1904, the horse which the said J. R. Fain was driving fell, without fault on the part of J. R. Fain, through said bridge, on account of the inferior and decayed condition of the flooring and the timbers of which said bridge was constructed, and sustained permanent injuries, which decreased the value of the horse in the sum of $75, in which sum the said J. R. Fain was and is damaged." The court found for the plaintiff $75, and judgment was entered accordingly. Defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled.

The single question submitted for our decision is whether the bridge, whose defective condition caused the injury to plaintiff's horse, was a public bridge within the meaning of the Code. The Supreme Court in the cases of Tatnall County v. Newton, 112 Ga. 730, 38 S. E. 48, and Howington v. Madison County, 126 Ga. 700, 55 S. E. 942, defines a public bridge as follows: "A bridge which constitutes a part of a public road is necessarily a public bridge." The pleading in this case alleged that the bridge in question was constructed by the county authorities since the passage of the act of December 29, 1888, and was a public bridge. The stipulation as to the facts is that the bridge was so constructed since the passage of said act, and "formed a part of the Ft. Gaines and Damascus public road, and was a continuation of said public road over a drain, and was used by the public as a public bridge." The court in the Tatnall County Case, supra, says: "If a public bridge, and not within the limits of an incorporated municipality, it seems inevitable that it must be regarded as a county bridge. No matter how the bridge comes into being, if it does so or remains in place with the assent of the proper county authorities, its character as a public concern becomes established." "If an individual builds a bridge, and the public use it, and it becomes a public utility, the public authorities must repair it." Elliott on Roads and Streets (2d Ed.) §§ 28, 30, 32; 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 921. We therefore conclude that a bridge which constitutes a portion of the public road is necessarily a public bridge. To make it a public bridge, it is not necessary that it be established by an act of the Legislature or an order of the ordinary or county commissioners as a public bridge, and built and repaired according to Pol. Code 1895, §§ 344, 345, 346, with funds raised under section 404, par. 4. It may be built by the road hands and kept in repair by them, or it may be built by private individuals and given to the public. It is nevertheless a public bridge if a part of the public road, and becomes a public utility by public use. It is admitted that the bridge in question was "constructed by the county of Early by its proper officers; that it formed a part of the public road, and was used by the public as a public bridge." Its character as a public bridge is thus established by these admissions under the rulings of the Supreme Court and other authorities above cited. The act of December 29, 1888 (Pol. Code 1895, § 603), very largely extends the liability of counties for injuries caused by defective public bridges. It makes counties primarily liable for all injuries caused by reason of any defective bridges, whether erected by contractors or county authorities. It is admitted that the bridge now under consideration was constructed by the county authorities since the act of 1888. It seems clear that under these admissions, coupled with the other admissions that the bridge was defective, that the county authorities knew of such defective condition, and that the injuries occurred to the horse because of such defective condition and without fault of the plaintiff, the judgment of the court against the county was inevitable.

The tendency of modern legislation is to greatly enlarge the statutory liability of counties with reference to highways. This is due to the fact that counties are becoming more populous, and are invested with greater powers and provided with larger means of performing their public duties. The distinction which now exists between municipalities and counties as to the duty of keeping in repair highways and bridges, and correlative liability for failure to exercise such duty, will gradually disappear as the reason for such distinction ceases. "Both cities and counties are governmental corporations invested with authority over a designated locality, and what is the duty of one is, in its essential nature, the duty of the other." Elliott on Roads and Streets (2d Ed.) § 52; Dill, Mun. Corp. (3d Ed.) § 978.

BUSH v. WEST YELLOW PINE CO. (No. 386.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 10, 1907.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In a suit by a servant against his master on account of injuries received through a defective instrumentality furnished to the former by the latter, the servant's knowledge, actual or constructive, of the defect, may usually be considered in establishing either or both of two defenses open to the master—the one, assumption of the risk by the servant; the other, contributory negligence on the servant's part.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 574-600.]

2. SAME—COMPLAINTS—ASSURANCES OF SAFETY.

While ordinarily the law reads into contracts of employment an agreement on the servant's part to assume the known risks of the employment, so far as he has the capacity to realize and comprehend them, yet this implication may be abrogated by an express or implied contract to the contrary. If the servant complains to the master that the instrumentality appears to be dangerous, and thereupon the master commands him to proceed with the work, and assures him there is no danger, the law implies a quasi new agreement, whereby the master relieves the servant of his former assumption of the risk, and places responsibility for resulting injuries upon the master.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 649, 650.]

3. SAME—QUESTION FOR JURY.

"If the plaintiff by ordinary care could have avoided the consequences to himself caused by the defendant's negligence, he is not entitled to recover." The servant by continuing to work after knowledge that the instrumentality is dangerous may defeat his case on the theory that such conduct is within the rule just stated; but the command of the master and his assurances of safety may be shown by the servant as a circumstance tending to excuse him from the exercise of that caution which otherwise would lawfully be expected of him. Unless the exposure to the danger is obvious and rash, the question whether the servant under the circumstances has been guilty of a breach of due care is for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1168-1179.]

4. SAME—PLEADING.

The court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the plaintiff's petition.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Valdosta; O. P. Hansell, Judge.

Action by J. T. Bush against the West Yellow Pine Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Woodward & Smith and G. A. Whitaker, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Thomas, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. This case comes to us upon the sustaining of a demurrer to the plaintiff's petition. The allegations of the petition as amended are that the plaintiff was employed as a servant of the defendant in loading cars with heavy lumber. He was unskilled and inexperienced in his work, and unfamiliar with the use of the appliances furnished. This fact was known to the defendant. Pieces of timber called "jumpers" were furnished, with which the lumber was to be slid and loaded. The plaintiff called the attention of the defendant's superintendent in charge of the work to the fact that these "jumpers" did not appear to be of sufficient size and strength to withstand the strain upon them, and also told him that he (the plaintiff) was unfamiliar with the character of the work and the sufficiency of the appliances. The superintendent told him that he (the superintendent) knew his business; that the "jumpers" were properly adjusted and were all right and perfectly safe; that there was no danger, and ordered plaintiff to go ahead with the work. Relying upon these assurances, plaintiff continued in the work. As a matter of fact the "jumpers" proved to be too short, and under the strain gave way; and as a result a piece of timber fell upon plaintiff and injured him.

1. The servant's knowledge, actual or constructive, of the dangerous condition of an instrumentality furnished him by his master, becomes an important matter of investigation, from two distinct phases of the case, when he has been injured through that instrumentality and attempts to hold the master responsible for the injury. First, it may be considered in relation to his assumption of the risk, a matter included by implication in the contract of employment; and then in relation to the question of his contributory negligence. These two aspects are sometimes confounded, but they are distinct. Every student of the law of master and servant recognizes the correctness of Labatt's statement (M. & S. § 1): "The doctrines which define the extent of a servant's right to recover damages for personal injuries received in the course of his employment represent, broadly speaking, the results of a compromise between the principle that a servant agrees to assume all the risks incident to the work undertaken by him, and the principle that a master is answerable for the consequences of any negligent acts which may be committed by himself or his agents. In the last analysis, therefore, every problem in the law of employer's liability consists essentially in the determination of the question whether the facts under review shall be controlled by the one or by the other of these principles." As a part of the compromise referred to, the law reads into every contract of employment a prima facie agreement on the servant's part that he assumes all the known risks of the employment so far as (his mental and physical development considered) they are within his capacity to comprehend, and also that he will use a corresponding due care and diligence to become informed of and to understand such other risks as are not immediately known and comprehended. This element of assumption of risk may, therefore, in a suit by the servant against the master for personal injuries, be considered as a matter of contract, whereby, if it be applicable under the particular facts of the case, the master escapes civil responsibility, notwithstanding he would otherwise be liable, just as in a suit ex delicto against a carrier for a breach of its public duty to safely carry goods a special contract of carriage may be shown by the carrier to limit his liability. Thus the servant's knowledge of a defect in an instrumentality furnished by the master is a relevant matter of investigation, as tending to show that as to such defect he has assumed the risk; but it is also relevant upon the other phase of the case, that which relates to his contributory negligence. Since no plaintiff can recover for an injury of which his own negligence is the proximate cause, or which he could have avoided by the exercise of ordinary care, it frequently becomes a matter of defense to the master that the servant's exposure of himself to a known danger amounted to a failure to exercise due care, or amounted to contributory negligence. Thus, by viewing the element of the servant's knowledge in separate aspects, we shall the better be able to see the particular effect to be given to the insertion into the case of the new elements of a direct order of the master and of his assurances that the work may be safely done with the instrumentalities furnished.

2. Now, since the assumption of risk is a contractual result, it may be varied as any other term of the contract might be. For instance, it would be competent for the master and the servant to make an express agreement that the servant should not assume any of the risks of the employment, and such a contract would be enforced by the court. That which otherwise would be implicit yields to that which has become explicit to the contrary. Not only may terms which the law would ordinarily imply into a contract be varied by express agreement to the contrary, but, also, where the circumstances warrant it, the original implication may cease, and new and distinct terms may be implied. Even express terms may sometimes be subsequently varied by implication. Our Civil Code of 1895 (section 3642) upon the subject of mutual temporary disregard of contract is an express recognition of this principle. So, although primarily the servant contracts to assume the risks of the character we have been discussing, still, pending the course of the employment, transactions may occur between the master and servant wherefrom the law will imply a quasi new agreement as to this matter, and will hold that the master has implicitly agreed to release the servant from his promise to assume the risk. To make the specific application, the servant, recognizing that the risk is on himself, says to the master: "This instrumentality furnished by you to me is unsafe." The master replies: "Use it. It is safe." Or: "Use it temporarily, and I will repair it and make it safe." The servant obeys the order and is injured. What effect will the law give to such transactions? In the first, where the master says, "It is safe," the law will construe these words as such a warranty that a breach of it will release the servant from the assumption of the risk. In the other case, where the master says, "Use it; I will repair it and make it safe"—the law implies an agreement on the master's part that the temporary use pending the time necessary to get the repairing done shall be at his risk, and not at that of the servant, who has complained of the instrumentality. Just here the quotation from Cooley on Torts (2d Ed.) § 559, reproduced with approval in the case of Cheeny v. Ocean Steamship Co., 92 Ga. 731, 19 S. E. 35, 44 Am. St. Rep. 113, is directly in point: "If the servant, having a right to abandon the service because it is dangerous, refrains from doing so in consequence of assurances that the danger shall be removed, the duty to remove the danger is manifest and imperative, and the master is not in the exercise of ordinary care unless or until he makes his assurances good. Moreover, the assurances remove all ground for the argument that the servant, by continuing the employment, engages to assume its risks. So far as the particular peril is concerned, the implication of law is rebutted by the giving and accepting of the assurance; for nothing is plainer or more reasonable than that the parties may and should, where practicable, come to an understanding between themselves regarding matters of this nature." See, also, Labatt, M. & S. § 260.

3. Viewed from the standpoint of the servant's contributory negligence, the master's direct command to use the instrumentality, and his assurance that it is safe, stand in this relation to the servant's right to recover. The law recognizes that, under normal circumstances, the knowledge and means of knowledge possessed by the servant are inferior to those possessed by the master; and the former is, as a general rule, justified in relying upon any express statement made by the latter in respect to the extent of the danger of the employment, and, in view of this disparity of information, an assurance of safety, or a specific order, may be regarded as having had the effect of lulling the servant into a feeling of security, and as having given him good reason for relaxing that vigilance for his own safety which he otherwise would have exercised, and it is therefore usually a question for the jury whether such command and such assurance do not operate to relieve the servant from the imputation of contributory negligence or failure to use due care, which otherwise would be imputed to him. Labatt, M. & S. §§ 407, 440, 451. "The servant does not stand on the same footing with the master. His primary duty is obedience, and if, when in the discharge of that duty, he is damaged through the neglect of the master, it is but meet that he should be recompensed." Patterson v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co., 76 Pa. 389, 18 Am. Rep. 412. "A prudent man has a right, within reasonable limits, to rely upon the ability and skill of the agent in whose charge the common master has placed him, and is not bound at his peril to set his own judgment above that of his superior." See Indiana Car Co. v. Parker, 100 Ind. 181; Shortell v. St. Joseph, 104 Mo. 114, 16 S. W. 397, 24 Am. St. Rep. 317; Harrison v. Denver, etc., R. Co., 7 Utah, 523, 27 Pac. 728; Kain v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 375; Connolly v. Pollion, 41 Barb. 366. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in the case of McKee v. Tourtelotte, 167 Mass. 69, 44 N. E. 1071, 48 L. R. A. 542, expresses the idea thus: "When we say that a man appreciates a danger, we mean that he forms a judgment as to the future, and that his judgment is right. But, if against this judgment is set the judgment of a superior—one, too, who from the nature of the callings of the two men, and of the superior's duty, seems likely to make the more accurate forecast—and if to this is added a command to go on with his work and to run the risk, it becomes a complex question of the particular circumstances whether the inferior is not justified, as a prudent man, in surrendering his own opinion and obeying the command. The nature and the degree of the danger, the extent of the plaintiff's appreciation of it, and the exigency of the work all enter into consideration, and no universal rule can be laid down." In the footnote to the case just cited, as it is reproduced in 48 L. R. A. 543, is a lengthy citation of authorities supporting this proposition. This court, in the cases of Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Gladman, 1 Ga. App. 259, 58 S. E. 249, and the Supreme Court in Moore v. Dublin Cotton Mills, 127 Ga. 609, 56 S. E. 839, have recently discussed the effect of a direct order of the master as tending to relieve the servant from the exercise of that degree of caution which would lawfully be expected of him in the absence of such a command. Of course, the servant is only the more excusable for relying upon such an order when it is accompanied by an assurance of safety.

4. It is actionable negligence for the master to order his servant to work with an unsafe instrumentality. An assurance of safety, coupled with the order, not only aggravates the master's negligence, but also relieves the servant from the assumption of the risk. The assurance of safety likewise makes the question of the servant's contributory negligence one for solution by the jury, unless the danger be so obvious that to undertake to encounter it amounts to plain rashness. The master's command and assurance of safety to the servant prevents the former escaping liability on the theory that the latter has assumed the risk. It is for the jury to say whether the servant's conduct in continuing to work in the light of his knowledge of the danger, even after the assurance of safety is given due weight, was or was not negligence; for a person who has failed to exercise ordinary care to protect himself cannot recover. This is a maxim of the law applicable to all suits predicated upon negligence, and is wholly independent of the question as to who has assumed the risk as a matter of contract. This is a jury question which the court did not have the power to determine on demurrer.

Judgment reversed.

CARTER v. STATE (No. 427.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 4, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

The exclusion of evidence offered to rebut the presumption of malice, in a trial for murder, is not cause for a new trial, where the defendant is only convicted of voluntary manslaughter.

2. HOMICIDE—DYING DECLARATIONS.

That a witness may have made a different statement as to alleged dying declarations, on the examination by the court into their admissibility, from that thereafter made by him in the hearing of the jury, is not ground for excluding his evidence as to such declarations. The injunction that dying declarations are to be received with great caution is directed more especially to the jury than to the judge. The judge, in passing upon the admissibility of dying declarations, determines only whether a prima facie case is presented, conceding the testimony to be true. He does not pass upon the credibility of the witness delivering the testimony. If a witness makes different statements in any respect material to the proof of dying declarations, the jury may discredit him, but the trial judge cannot for that reason withhold his testimony from the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Homicide, § 458.]

3. CRIMINAL LAW—CAPACITY TO COMMIT CRIME.

The ability to distinguish between right and wrong in relation to a particular act about to be committed is the general test of criminal responsibility in this state. The only exception so far recognized, as to one who has reason sufficient to distinguish between right and wrong as to the act about to be committed, is where such act is connected with a peculiar delusion under which the prisoner is laboring, and where, in consequence of such delusion and without criminal intent, the will is overmastered. Intermittent insanity, caused by physical weakness or nervous disorders, is no excuse or justification for crime, unless it appears that at the time of the act committed the defendant was incapable of adjudging the quality of the act and of knowing whether it was right or wrong.

4. SAME—INSANITY—INSTRUCTION.

Where evidence as to the insanity of a defendant is introduced under the general plea of not guilty in a criminal case, it is the duty of the trial judge to instruct the jury upon the subject of insanity as a defense. In the absence of evidence that the defendant acted under the influence of an overmastering delusion, there was no error in the charge complained of in this case. If fuller instructions were desired, they should have been requested in writing.

5. SAME—TRIAL—CONDUCT OF JUDGE—APPEAL.

The conduct of the judge towards witnesses will not be controlled, except for such abuse of his authority as would manifestly tend to shape or unduly influence the finding of the jury. The refusal of a trial judge to allow a question to be answered by a witness cannot be reviewed, unless it appears that the answer expected to such question was stated at the time of the ruling complained of.

6. SAME—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

While testimony that one of the defendant's witnesses or her husband had unlawfully sold whisky should have been repelled upon the objection offered, that such testimony was irrelevant and immaterial, still the error in admitting this testimony is not sufficiently grave to warrant a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 2209.]

7. SAME—NEW TRIAL.

The remaining assignments of error are without merit.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 2328.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Polk County; Price Edwards, Judge.

Will Carter was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and brings error. Affirmed.

J. K. Davis, J. M. Hunt, and Bunn & Bunn, for plaintiff in error. W. K. Fielder, Sol. Gen., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error was convicted of the offense of voluntary manslaughter. He excepts to the judgment refusing a new trial. The testimony in the case is extremely voluminous, but is substantially as follows: On the part of the state it was shown that after a trial in a justice's court, in which Carter (the plaintiff in error) was one of the parties and the deceased, Reed, was a witness, Reed, in company with several other persons, started from the courthouse toward home. The decision of the justice's court was adverse to Carter. Reed was a witness at the trial, in behalf of one Townsend, who was the opposite party in the suit against Carter. He was perhaps also somewhat interested in the result of the case, and concerned in favor of Townsend. The deceased was over 70 years of age and quite deaf. As he was proceeding homeward with his companions, the party was overtaken by Carter, who walked along with them about 200 yards, during which time Carter charged the deceased with being responsible for the lawsuit against him, and used some vile epithets about the deceased. Perhaps on account of his deafness, the deceased did not appear to have heard Carter's first remarks. A little later Carter and Reed became involved in an altercation, and Carter drew from his pocket a pistol and shot Reed, who was unarmed, except with a small walking cane, and who fell to the ground and screamed. Townsend seized Carter and the pistol, and held him until the pistol was taken from him. The evidence for the state does not disclose that Reed had any weapon of any kind other than the small walking cane; and it was proved that he habitually carried this to walk with. He was picked up, carried home, and undressed, and no weapon was found upon him. As a result of the wound, death supervened four days later. Before his death Reed stated that he was going to die. He made this statement on the night of the difficulty, as well as an hour or two before his death. And after each of these statements, showing consciousness of his condition, he gave his version of the difficulty. The testimony for the defendant, as to the material issues in the case, was squarely in conflict with that for the state. Witnesses on behalf of the defendant testified that Reed made the first advance upon Carter and struck him with his walking stick, and that Reed had a knife in his hand. Some of the witnesses testified that they did not know whether the deceased struck with the knife or not, while others testified that the deceased struck the defendant with the knife and cut his coat upon the shoulder, and that thereupon, while the deceased was still cutting at him with the knife, Carter stepped backward and fired. There was also testimony showing that there was a mutual intent to fight, and that Reed drew his knife and Carter his pistol about the same time. The defendant also attempted to show that he was insane; and testimony was permitted from several witnesses showing that he was at times wild and irrational. He further offered evidence of partial or temporary insanity, of weakness of mind in connection with his weakened condition, and of a distortion of mind in connection with his disturbed nervous condition, and of his habit of taking liquor and narcotics impairing his capacity. The defendant moved for a new trial upon the general grounds, and upon grounds relating to the charge of the court and the failure to charge, as well as grounds relating to the exclusion and introduction of testimony, and to conduct of the court, which is claimed to have been prejudicial to the defendant, and upon the ground of newly discovered evidence.

1. The first ground of the amended motion assigns error in that the court ruled out certain evidence relating to the purported testimony of Carter, the defendant, at the justice's court immediately preceding the difficulty which resulted in Reed's death. The only error assigned is that the court should have admitted this testimony in order to permit the defendant to rebut the idea of malice on his part against Reed, and to meet the state's theory that Carter had ill will against Reed and was the aggressor in the fight. It is unnecessary to consider whether the exception would have been well taken if the verdict had been for murder; for, inasmuch as the defendant was only convicted of voluntary manslaughter, no harm resulted to him by reason of the court's ruling. The jury, by their verdict, found that the killing was done without malice, and the testimony repelled by the judge was only proper to be considered by the jury to induce the same result as occurred.

2. The second exception of the plaintiff in error is that the court erred in refusing to allow him to prove by one Mr. Reeves whether the witness had not heard him state from the stand that Mr. Evans had asked him to let Mr. Reed pasture in the pasture, and that he was going to do it. He contends that this evidence was material and would have been beneficial, and was offered for the purpose of showing that he had no malice or ill will against the deceased. He further insists that this evidence would have greatly assisted him in showing the jury that he acted in self-defense and without malice or ill will. The verdict being for voluntary manslaughter, the lack of evidence showing absence of malice was not injurious to the plaintiff in error. Furthermore, the offer to prove the facts stated was not properly made. Counsel should have stated what the witness of whom he wished to ask the questions would testify. It not being shown by such statement that the witness would have testified what the plaintiff's counsel offered to prove, this assignment of error cannot be considered.

3. The third ground of the motion assigns error upon the admission of certain purported dying declarations of the deceased. The objections offered were that such declarations should be received with great caution, and that the evidence should be excluded because the witness J. H. Wilson, by whom the declarations were shown, had testified during the court's examination into the admissibility of the testimony, and, in the absence of the jury, "that such declarations were made by the deceased on Friday night prior to his death on the following Tuesday morning, and that deceased was conscious until a short time before he died and had been told that he would recover," and, after giving that evidence, testified: "That is all he said, and he never did make any other statement; and I stayed with him several nights, and had him by the hand when he died. * * * That is all I heard him say." And, after delivering this testimony, the witness was present in court, heard the argument of counsel, and went upon the stand, and stated that upon Tuesday night, just before Reed's death, Reed stated that "he had done nothing to Mr. Carter to cause Mr. Carter to kill him." The complaint of the plaintiff in error is that the court should not have admitted the declarations alleged by the witness to have been made by Reed on Tuesday morning, shortly before his death, because the witness had changed and altered his evidence in the presence of the court; that the court violated the rule that dying declarations should be received with great caution, by permitting the witness to testify to the jury with relation to the statements made by Reed shortly before his death. We cannot see that the ruling of the court was, for the reason assigned, erroneous. In the first place, the instruction that dying declarations are to be received with great caution is more especially directed to the jury than to the judge. In the next place, the judge, in passing upon the admissibility of dying declarations, only determines whether a prima facie case has been established; and, so far as the credibility of the witness is concerned, a court of review cannot from the very nature of the case control his discretion. In the third place, the court permitted the discrepancy in the statement by the witness to be proved to the jury, so that it was within their power to pass upon the questions of fact involved, and, if the witness had really made contradictory statements, it was in their power to impeach and discredit him thereby. After all, we see no real conflict (after careful reading and re-reading Wilson's testimony)—at least, no necessary conflict—in his statement. After detailing to the court the statements made by Reed to him on Friday night, he proceeds to say "that is all he said, and he never did make any other statement; and I stayed with him several nights"; etc., "that is all I heard him say." The statements the witness related to the jury as having been made by Reed on Tuesday morning shortly before his death are in practically the identical language of those he repeated to the court shortly before adjournment the evening before; and if he had replied, using the same language he did, with three very immaterial changes, his veracity could not have been questioned even by the plaintiff in error. As innocence is to be presumed instead of guilt, and as the language of both declarations detailed by the witness is identical, and as the ordinary witness is not so skilled in the art of speech as to aptly choose the very word suitable to convey the shade of thought he might seek to convey, we think that the trial judge properly understood the witness as intending to say: "That is all he said, and he never did make any different statement. * * * That is what [all] I heard him say." Plainly, to our mind, the only idea the witness intended to convey was that the statements he had attributed to the deceased were truthfully repeated, and that the deceased had not at any time made any other or different statement in his hearing. If the witness had been asked the distinct question whether the deceased ever repeated these statements at any other time than Friday night, and had answered the question in the negative, the jury would have been authorized to discredit him; but the trial judge could not for that reason withhold his testimony from the jury. In the absence of evidence that the witness' attention was specifically called to the point, to discredit him because of the language used in the answer which we have heretofore quoted would be manifestly unfair.

4. In the fourth ground of the motion for new trial it is insisted that the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "The defendant sets up the further defense of insanity. A person shall be considered of sound mind who is neither an idiot, a lunatic, afflicted with insanity, or who has arrived at the age of 14 years, or before that day, if such person knows the distinction between right and wrong. The law presumes every defendant to be of sound mind, and the burden is on the defendant to satisfy the jury to a reasonable certainty that he was not of sound mind when the act was committed. The insanity which the law recognizes as an excuse for crime must be such as dethrones reason and incapacitates an individual from distinguishing between right and wrong as to the consequences of his conduct. If you find from the testimony submitted on the trial of this case, to a reasonable certainty, that the defendant at the time of the homicide was afflicted with insanity to that extent as to dethrone reason and to incapacitate him from distinguishing between right and wrong as to the consequences of his act or conduct, you should acquit the defendant of the offense charged. If you find from the testimony that the defendant at the time of the homicide had sufficient mind and understanding to distinguish between right and wrong as to the consequences of his own act and conduct, he is responsible for his act. In other words, if he was not at the time of the homicide afflicted with insanity to such an extent as to dethrone reason and incapacitate him from distinguishing between right and wrong as to the consequences of his own act and conduct, it would be your duty to find against the plea of defendant of insanity. A lunatic or person insane, without lucid intervals, shall not be found guilty of any crime or misdemeanor of which he may be charged, provided the act so charged as criminal was committed in the condition of such lunacy or insanity; but, if a lunatic has lucid intervals of understanding, he shall answer for what he does in those intervals as if he had no deficiency. So, gentlemen of the jury, if you find from the testimony that the defendant was afflicted with insanity at times, he would be responsible for his acts when not under the influence, or not in that state of mind. If he did the act, and was not in one of these conditions at the time—not in a condition of not distinguishing between right and wrong at the time—he would be responsible for his act as though he was not afflicted with insanity at all.” The complaint of the plaintiff in error is that the judge presented the law of total insanity, and not a theory on partial insanity or temporary insanity or distortion of mind growing out of a physical condition of the defendant, and its effect (by reason of the shattered nervous system of defendant and the use of stimulants and opiates) on his mental condition. Counsel for plaintiff in error insists that, under the evidence as to the physical condition of the defendant, excitement would unbalance him and cause him to lose his normal judgment and discretion and make him like a man wild or crazy, and that under these conditions, although the defendant did not set up full insanity, nor seek to prove it as a complete defense, in and of itself, defendant was not to be held to use the same normal judgment, discretion, and coolness that the ordinary man would be called on to use, and that the judge should have instructed the jury that the defendant should be judged, as he was, and not held to the standard required of the normal ordinary man unafflicted, as he was, with reference to his conduct at the time of the difficulty, and that the jury should have been instructed that they should consider the mental condition or distortion of mind of the defendant if they believed such was caused by his physical condition in determining whether the defendant acted in good faith, believing that there was a necessity for taking the life of his assailant to save his own life or to prevent a felony from being perpetrated upon him. The exact exception to the charge quoted above is thus set out by plaintiff in error in this motion for new trial: “The defendant did not set up as matter of defense such insanity at the time of the homicide as would make him irresponsible for his acts under the general rules of law relating to pleas of insanity, but offered evidence of a partial or temporary insanity, or weakness of mind or distortion of mind, in connection with his weakened physical condition and his disturbed nervous system, and the habit of taking liquor and narcotics, as impairing his capacity, under circumstances of excitement or danger, to act with the same calmness and deliberation and discretion as the average or ordinary man would be held to act and judge, and the defendant, by his counsel, claimed that, owing to his mental and physical condition, he would not be held, and should not be held by the court and jury, to act with the same discretion and judgment as the ordinary physically and mentally sound man, and claimed that the court should submit that question in his charge to the jury; that in determining as to whether he acted in good faith, believing that his life was in danger and that it was necessary to shoot the deceased to save himself, the jury should have been allowed to consider this question. This theory of defense was not submitted at all by the court to the jury, but, in lieu thereof, the court gave to the jury the general law of insanity, and the movant insists that he erred therein, and further erred in not submitting the claim, as above set forth, which was urged by the defendant through his counsel.”

The objection is twofold: That the charge on insanity, being irrelevant, was hurtful to the defendant; and that the real contention of the defendant upon this subject was not presented. We find no error in the charge complained of, and, if fuller and more explicit instructions were desired, they should have been requested. It appears from the record that evidence was introduced for the purpose of showing that the defendant was insane at the time of the homicide, and therefore it was incumbent upon the court not to turn the jury loose upon that evidence without chart or compass to aid them in applying them. And the rule announced by the court has been uniformly recognized in this state, at least ever since the case of Roberts v. State, 3 Ga. 310. The rule there laid down by the Supreme Court is as follows: “If a man has reason sufficient to distinguish between right and wrong in relation to a particular act about to be committed, he is criminally responsible.” The only exception made to this general rule is where the act done is connected with a peculiar delusion, and is committed in consequence of such delusion without criminal intent, but by reason of the will being overmastered and overpowered by such delusion. The doctrine laid down in the Roberts Case has never been overruled or questioned by the Supreme Court. The case has frequently been cited with approval. See Choice v. State, 31 Ga. 424; Danforth v. State, 75 Ga. 614, 58 Am. Rep. 480; Carr v. State, 96 Ga. 284, 22 S. E. 570; Flanagan

v. State, 103 Ga. 625, 30 S. E. 550; Taylor v. State, 105 Ga. 775, 31 S. E. 764. The judge could not present the theory of partial or temporary insanity insisted upon by the plaintiff in error, because there was no evidence that the defendant was acting under the influence of any delusion and that the act was committed in connection with such delusion. There has never been any morbid sentimentality on the subject of insanity in the decisions in this state, and yet there has been always the exercise of the largest humanity in behalf of the actually insane. The question is not without difficulty. As said by Judge Nisbet in Roberts v. State, supra: "The laws of the sane mind are but little understood. Much less are the laws, if indeed such phraseology is predicable of it, of the unsound mind. We can judge of the one by external developments and by our own consciousness; but of the other only by external indicia. There are few men so balanced in intellect as not at some time and upon some subjects to approximate towards derangement. Intellectual enthusiasm not unfrequently approaches the line of insanity. The numerous cases of mania or delusion which leave the mind sound in general, but as to certain things shattered or wholly obliterated, have increased the difficulty of any specific general rule as to the responsibility of those generally classed as insane. * * * The subject of insanity is not responsible—humanity, reason, the law so adjudge. In all definitions of murder of which I have knowledge the requirement is found that the slayer must be of sound mind. Our own statutory definition requires him to be 'a person of sound memory and discretion.' Accountability for crime presupposes a criminal intent, and that requires a power of reasoning upon the character and consequences of the act—a will subject to control. The difficulty is to determine who is 'a person of sound memory and discretion,' who is incapable of a criminal intent, who is incapable of reasoning upon the character and consequences of the act, and who is without control over his will. * * * Mr. Chitty says: 'In criminal cases the question is whether at the time the act was committed the prisoner was incapable of judging between right and wrong, and did not then know that the act was an offense against the law of God and nature.' * * * There are some exceptions to this rule, one certainly which was first established in the leading case of The King v. Hadsfield. The great speech of Mr. Erskine in defense of Hadsfield has shed new light upon the law of insanity. It is looked upon by the profession as authority. * * * In that case he assumed the position that a man might have reason sufficient to distinguish between the right and wrong of an act about to be committed, and yet, by reason of some delusion overmastering the will, there might be no criminal intent. To apply this proposition, it was admitted by

Mr. Erskine that the act itself must be connected with the peculiar delusion under which the prisoner labored. * * * To use the language of Mr. Erskine: 'Reason is not driven from her seat, but distraction sits down upon it along with her, holds her trembling upon it, and frightens her from her propriety.' " Our courts have never gone to the full extent of Mr. Erskine's argument, and certainly never held the contention of the plaintiff in error upon this subject to be the law. No decision has come under our observation where temporary insanity or loss of self-control, caused by physical infirmity, has been held to justify a killing or even to reduce the offense from murder to manslaughter. In its last analysis the contention of the plaintiff in error is that, while ordinarily sane, his physical condition was such and his nerves were so unstrung that he was more easily excited than an ordinary man, and that, when thus excited, he became temporarily irresponsible. Similar defenses have been several times disapproved by our Supreme Court. In Fogarty v. State, 80 Ga. 450, 5 S. E. 782, the Supreme Court held that there was no error in refusing to charge the jury that "If the defendant commit an assault, knowing it to be wrong, when driven to it by an uncontrollable and irresistible impulse, arising not from natural passion, but from an unsound condition of mind, he is not criminally responsible." In the case of Patterson v. State, 86 Ga. 70, 12 S. E. 174, while the court affirmed the judgment of the trial judge in excluding certain testimony for a different reason, Chief Justice Bleckley took occasion (while the language used by the trial judge is not stated) to say that what he said was pertinent, and the ruling upon the question in that case is authority for the statement that the citation of the learned counsel for plaintiff in error upon the subject of the appearance and general health, etc., of the person whose sanity is in question, are not in point in this case. In Lee v. State, 116 Ga. 569, 42 S. E. 759, and in Rogers v. State (Ga.) 57 S. E. 227, the doctrine announced in Studstill v. State, 7 Ga. 12, that there is no distinction as to partial or temporary insanity and that such insanity is not recognized as a defense, relieving from responsibility of crime, is reaffirmed. In Lee's Case the trial judge refused, upon request, to charge the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the defendant at the time of the homicide was afflicted with epilepsy to such an extent as to be insane, and that under the influence of such epilepsy he was incapable of controlling his action, but was impelled by the effect of such disease to the commission of the homicide in question, even he may have had knowledge as to the right or wrong of the action in question, that the defendant would not be guilty. The refusal to thus instruct the jury was expressly approved. The court then proceeded to reaffirm the former decision as to the general rule and the exception in regard to delusional insanity. But, as to a very similar theory to that contended for by the plaintiff in error in this case, Chief Justice Simmons, delivering the opinion, says: "It seems to us that to uphold such a theory would be to put the public at the mercy of any person who fails to suppress his anger or jealousy, who is sane at one moment, insane at the next, and then immediately afterwards sane again. It is, however, useless to elaborate any further, as this court is bound by its former decisions upon this subject, which will be found cited in Carr v. State, 96 Ga. 284, 22 S. E. 570; Taylor v. State, 105 Ga. 746, 31 S. E. 764; Minder v. State, 113 Ga. 773, 39 S. E. 284. We therefore conclude that requests to charge which sought to substitute another test of sanity for the knowledge of right and wrong should not have been given. With regard to the exception to the general rule in case of delusional insanity, the charge was correct, and followed the cases of Roberts v. State, 3 Ga. 310; Danforth v. State, 75 Ga. 614, 58 Am. Rep. 480; Flanagan v. State, 103 Ga. 619, 30 S. E. 550."

In this case no request was preferred; but, had the defendant obtained all he contended for in this ground of the motion, it certainly could not have reduced the offense lower than voluntary manslaughter, and, in view of the finding of the jury, no possible harm was done him. The evidence upon the subject of insanity was introduced by the defendant in the testimony of Dr. Chapman, his sister, and other witnesses, and as insanity at the time of the commission of the alleged crime need not be specially pleaded, but may be relied upon as a defense upon the plea of general issue, we think the trial judge should have charged upon the subject. As there was no evidence of delusion on the part of the defendant, or that he acted under the influence of such delusion in the commission of the act with which he was charged, there was no error in not extending the instructions given.

5. The fifth ground of the motion alleges that the court erred in rebuking one of defendant's witnesses in the presence of the jury, and thereby prejudicing defendant's case by discrediting his witness. This is specially insisted upon because plaintiff in error argues that the court was unfair in the trial to the defendant, and partial to the state, as shown by the difference of treatment given these witnesses by the court. It appears that the witnesses had been separated, and that the defendant's witness, not having been informed of the order of the court sequestering the witnesses, sat down for an instant in the courtroom before he came to the stand. Upon this fact being disclosed, although defendant's witness said he heard none of the evidence, the court said to said witness: "You knew the witnesses were separated yesterday, didn't you?" Upon the witness replying in the affirmative, the court inquired: "Why did you come in the courthouse and sit down?" And when the witness answered that he sat down because he was expecting to take the witness chair, the court remarked: "We will see about this when we get through." Plaintiff in error contrasts this with the action of the court in connection with a witness sworn on the part of the state, who had been in the courthouse a portion of the day during the delivery of testimony, and to whom objection was made as a witness upon that ground, but whom the court allowed to testify. We do not fully approve the practice of threatening a witness in the hearing of the jury, but we cannot say that any threat was necessarily implied by the language of the court. The language of the court is just as susceptible of the idea that the court did not wish to consume time with a further examination into the matter at that time, and that he would not, if a hearing was had, punish the witness, as to the construction that, by his language, he threatened witness. But, even if he had fined the witness for disobedience of his order, we could not control his discretion, unless manifestly abused; nor would it necessarily follow that the credibility before the jury would be diminished because of the fact that the court might have adjudged him guilty of disobedience of the court's orders. So far as the treatment of the state's witness being improper, it is always discretionary with the trial court as to whether certain witnesses may, for any special reason, be allowed to remain in the courtroom, and the fact that the witness has heard the testimony is not sufficient reason to exclude his testimony. We cannot say that the treatment of the two witnesses shows partiality to the state or was prejudicial to the defendant, as contended by plaintiff in error, nor that the treatment of these two witnesses, as it appears in the record, is tantamount to an expression of opinion, on the evidence in the case, unfavorable to the accused.

6. The sixth ground of the motion contends that the court erred in allowing testimony from the witness Mrs. Gill, showing that her husband had sold liquor and trying to show that she herself had sold liquor. The objection to the evidence was that it was immaterial and irrelevant. And error is also assigned because such evidence was not proper to be used as a mode of impeachment. We readily concur in the opinion of counsel for plaintiff in error that the fact that the party may or may not have been guilty of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor is not a proper mode of impeaching a witness, and the business followed by the witness's husband was immaterial. But, conceding that the court erred in his ruling in this matter, the error is not sufficiently grave to warrant a reversal.

7. There was no error on the part of the trial court in refusing to allow the witness

Reeves to show that the pasture in question in the lawsuit which preceded the difficulty was in the possession of Carter, and that he had the right to it. In any view of the case, this evidence was immaterial.

8. Nor was any harm done the defendant by the refusal of the court to allow the witness Jackson to testify what the defendant threw up early in the morning of the day of the difficulty. The court allowed testimony without limit as to the comparative size and strength of the defendant and the deceased at the time of the difficulty, and the witness Jackson was allowed to testify as to the health of the defendant early in the morning of that day, and that the defendant turned sick and threw up. If defendant was sick, and the sickness had not been relieved at the time of the difficulty, the weakness caused thereby might be considered by the jury, but could not be material as to what was thrown up, in the absence of any statement to the court by counsel as to what he expected to show.

9. The defendant also insisted in his motion that a new trial should be granted upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. The affidavit of W. M. Raper tended to show that, while the deceased was being undressed after the difficulty, his pants fell upon the floor and something heavy hit the floor (presumably a knife), and that deceased showed great anxiety about what was in his pocket, and called several times to his wife and family to see after it. This witness also testified that he asked the deceased what caused the trouble, and he said: "Oh, Lord, I couldn't take everything." This witness testified at the trial. The most that can be said as to the testimony of this witness in so far as being of advantage to the defendant is concerned is that it tends to show that the deceased might have had a knife in his pocket when he was carried home, and therefore might have had one at the time of the difficulty. As this evidence is merely cumulative of the testimony of several witnesses for the defendant, who testified on the trial more strongly to the same effect, it affords absolutely no reason for granting a new trial. The other affidavit made by Joseph Hendrix cannot be considered because it is not accompanied by the affidavits of counsel or of the defendant or of witnesses vouching for deponent's good character and associations, as required by law.

After a very painstaking investigation and consideration of the mass of testimony in this case, and careful examination into every contention urged by the plaintiff in error, we are firmly convinced that no error was committed requiring the grant of a new trial. The evidence was conflicting. We have no power to disturb the verdict of the jury thereon. And, if we had such power, the interest of society would not be subserved by its exercise in this case.

Judgment affirmed.

ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. v. BUNN et al. (No. 441.)

1. JURY—COMPETENCY.

Each party in a civil cause has the right to a panel of 24 impartial men from which to select the jury. To be entitled to sit on a case, a juror must be omni exceptione major, and where it appears, before beginning to strike the jury, that any juror is, for any reason, disqualified, such juror should be excused for cause.

2. NEW TRIAL—INCOMPETENT JURORS.

An employé is not a competent juror to try a case in which his employer is a party.

Failure to remove jurors thus disqualified and to fill the panel as provided by Act 1878, p. 145, is ground for new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Jury, § 420; vol. 37, New Trial, § 77.]

3. RAILROADS—ROAD CROSSINGS.

A road crossing, such as is referred to in section 2222, Civ. Code 1895, is the crossing by a railroad of a public highway, not only used, but maintained as such by the proper authorities having the same in charge. The evidence must show the road to be a public highway or street, and that such crosses the railroad, before there is proof of a road crossing. See Johnson v. State, 58 S. E. 265, Court of Appeals.

4. APPEAL—REVIEW.

No other error appears.
(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Waycross; J. T. Myers, Judge.

Action by J. R. and T. Bunn against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Bennet & Conyers and Jno. C. McDonald, for plaintiff in error. Wilson, Bennet & Lambdin, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. This case comes to this court on exceptions taken to the refusal to grant a new trial. Several assignments of errors are presented, but in our view of the case it is only necessary to discuss one of them. The fourth ground of the amended motion for a new trial alleges that "the court erred in refusing the motion made by counsel of movant to excuse from service on the jury from the panel of jurors called to try said case W. A. Sweat, J. P. Lide, and Will Youmans, who were employes of the plaintiffs, and by reason thereof disqualified to serve as jurors in said case, said motion having been made before commencing to strike or select the jury in said case; the same being error because: (a) The employes of parties litigant are presumed to be prejudiced. (b) The jury trying a cause should be perfectly impartial between the parties. (c) Any cause which would prompt a juror to lean in favor of one side or the other should be excuse or cause for such juror from serving on the jury, and thereby not force the side against which he would lean to strike him therefrom, and thereby lose any right as to strikes." The employes of the plaintiff were disqualified as jurors. It would not be questioned that under the express rule in the case of Central Railroad v. Mitchell, 83 Ga. 173, the employes of the defendant corporation should be held to be disqualified; and no reason appears to us why the employes of one party would be more likely to have a leaning or to have prejudged the case than the employes of another party to the cause. An employe, whether of an individual, a partnership, or a corporation, may be, in rare instances, an impartial juror in passing upon the rights of his employer. It is possible for a judge or juror to be so absolutely fair that he could try his own cause. But there must be a rule upon the subject, and the only rule that can be adopted with safety is one which recognizes the influence to which humanity is generally susceptible, and not a rule based upon rare exceptions. As said by Justice Jackson, in Central Railroad v. Mitchell, supra: "It is almost impossible, however incorruptible one may be, not to bend before the weight of interest; and the power of employer over employes is that of him who clothes and feeds over him who is fed and clothed. Hence the common law excluded all servants, and our statutes have nowhere altered the rule, and it should not be altered. A close relative is a less dangerous juror, if not a dependent kinsman, than one who is dependent on his employer. See 3 Chit. Black. side p. 363; Bacon's Abridg. "Juries," 2, 347, 5, 353; Tidd's Prac. 852, 3." The employes of a plaintiff should be disqualified as jurors for the same reason that they would be if they were the employes of the defendant; and employes of a person or partnership should be disqualified for the reason that would disqualify them if they were the employes of a corporation. A juror must be omni exceptione major. If, then, these three jurors were in fact employes of the plaintiffs, they should have been excused for cause, if proper objection was made at the proper time. A jury trial is a travesty unless the jurors are impartial.

But it is insisted by learned counsel for the defendants in error that the assignment of error is not in such legal shape as to inform us what action was taken by the court below on the motion submitted by counsel for the defendant (now plaintiff in error); that the defendant was not entitled to have the jurors excused simply by calling the attention of the court to their disqualification; that this court is not informed by the assignment of error what action was taken in the court below on the question, and that the trial court may have found some evidence that the jurors were not disqualified to serve, for the reason alleged. For these reasons, it is insisted by the defendant in error that the assignment of error does not bring to the attention of this court sufficient facts to enable it to determine whether the lower court committed error in refusing to excuse the jurors from service in the cause. We disagree with learned counsel as to this. The recitals of fact in the motion are fully approved and certified by the trial judge. We, of course, cannot tell whether evidence was heard by the court touching the disqualification or not; but it is certified that the jurors objected to were employes of the plaintiff. It is immaterial to this court how knowledge of this fact was obtained by the trial judge, because no point is made that he became possessed of the fact improperly. The trial judge, by approving, without qualification, the grounds of the motion for a new trial, states that it was a fact that the jurors were employes of the plaintiff, and that he knew that fact before passing upon the motion of defendant's counsel. It would have been proper for the trial judge, if the question as to whether the jurors were or were not employes of one of the parties had been in issue, to hear evidence upon that subject; but from the wording of the assignment of error (which is certified by the judge to contain a true statement of fact) it can easily be inferred either that the statement by counsel of the employment of the jurors was admitted by the opposite party, or rested in the court's own knowledge; and in either event evidence would be unnecessary for the information of the court. The language of the fourth ground is, "W. A. Sweat, J. P. Lide, and Will Youmans, who were employes of the plaintiffs"—not who movant insisted or alleged were employes of the plaintiffs. If the wording of this ground had been "W. A. Sweat, J. P. Lide, and Will Youmans, who movant contended were employes of the plaintiffs," the contention of learned counsel for the defendant in error would be sustained. It appears from the testimony of J. P. Lide, set forth in the record, that he was an employe of the plaintiffs, and it can reasonably be assumed that it was not insisted before the trial court that any one of the three jurors objected to was not an employe of the plaintiffs at the time that the defendant asked to have them excused for cause.

The jurors, then, were disqualified. Was the objection properly presented to the trial court? A party in a civil case is only required, where a juror is for any reason disqualified, to request the presiding judge to cause the panel to be filled. Pen. Code 1895, § 854. The counsel for the plaintiff in error properly requested that the disqualified jurors be excused, and we think the refusal of the court to comply was such an error as demands a new trial. "The defendant had the right to a panel of 24 from which to strike—all 24 impartial men. Columbus, Mayor of, v. Goetchius, 7 Ga. 139; Justices v. Griffin & W. P. Plank Road Co., 15 Ga. 39; Howell v. Howell, 59 Ga. 145. He was denied this right. * * * The denial was erroneous and hurtful. A big part of the battle is the selection of the jury, and an impartial jury is the cornerstone of the fairness of trial by jury." Nelson v. Dickson, 63 Ga. 686, 36 Am. Rep. 128.

As the cause will be remanded for another hearing, we do not deem it necessary to deal more fully with the other assignments of error than by reference to what is contained in the headnotes.

Judgment reversed.

STRICKLAND v. THORNTON & NASWORTHY. (No. 344.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1907.)

1. ERROR, WRIT OF—DISMISSAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—DATE OF SERVICE.

While service of a bill of exceptions, before it has been certified by the judge, is equivalent to no service, and an acknowledgment of service on a bill of exceptions cannot by aliunde proof be shown to bear the wrong date, yet other parts of the record outside of the bill of exceptions may be consulted to ascertain the true date of acknowledgment of service on the bill of exceptions. And, when it thus appears that the acknowledgment of service was erroneously dated, the writ of error will not be dismissed. Harper v. Burke, 74 Ga. 412. When a bill of exceptions is certified as of the date October 18, 1906, and the acknowledgment of service is dated October 17, 1906, and it appears from the certified bill of exceptions that the case was not heard until October 18th, it sufficiently appears that the bill of exceptions was not served prior to October 18, 1906, and that this ground of the motion to dismiss is not well taken.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 2829.]

2. COURTS—SUPREME COURT—JURISDICTION.

The Supreme Court of this state had jurisdiction of a writ of error suit brought from the city court of Dawson on October 18, 1906.

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—RIGHT OF ACTION—RECOVERY OF PERSONALTY.

It is error to sustain a demurrer to a petition brought by an administratrix, alleging that her intestate at the time of his death was in possession of a tract of land which he had rented out for the year, during which he died, and that the rent due said intestate for said year, consisting of cotton, had been taken possession of by the defendants without right or authority, and with notice of plaintiff's right to the same, and sold by them, and asking judgment for the proceeds of said sale, upon the ground that the action could not be maintained, because plaintiff had not title in said rent cotton.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 22, Executors and Administrators, § 132.]

4. SAME—TITLE TO PERSONALTY.

Under the provision of Civ. Code 1895, § 3353, the title to all personality, including choses in action, vests in the representative. "Rent is personality, and the right to collect and distribute it is in the personal representative of the decedent." Autrey v. Autrey, 94 Ga. 579, 20 S. E. 431. And that the rent was payable in cotton, and not money, does not change the rule. The petition alleging that the defendants had notice of plaintiff's right, this case is controlled by the decision in Bates-Farley Savings Bank v. Dismukes, 107 Ga. 212, 33 S. E. 175. It differs from Worrill v. Barnes, 57 Ga. 404, especially in the fact that in the case last cited the purchaser was an innocent party and bought without notice, and the landlord was still in life; and the case therefore was not affected by section 3353 of the Civil Code of 1895.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 22, Executors and Administrators, § 132.]

MAYOR, ETC., OF MACON v. DALEY et al. (No. 399.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 18, 1907.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—CHANGE OF GRADE—DAMAGES.

The fact that a change in the grade of a street is made in conformity to an ordinance of a municipality acting in its legislative capacity does not prevent an abutting property owner from recovering consequential damages to such property resulting from said public work.

2. EMINENT DOMAIN—CONSEQUENTIAL DAMAGES.

The Constitution of 1877 (paragraph 1, § 3, Bill of Rights) gives to the citizen the right to recover consequential damage to his property resulting from work of a public character, although such work may be authorized by legislative action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Eminent Domain, § 237.]

3. SAME.

The constitutional provision referred to in the foregoing note limits the power of eminent domain in the state, and in counties and municipalities as the agents of the state. It is remedial in character, and for the purpose of giving property holders additional security, and should be liberally construed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Eminent Domain, § 174.]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—CHANGE OF GRADE.

The measure of damages to abutting property caused by raising the grade of a street is the difference between the market value of the property before and after the change of the grade. On the trial of an action for the recovery of such damages, it is competent to prove the cost of the filling in of the property and raising it to the level of the street as a fact or circumstance illustrating the general question of market value.

5. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION OF CHARGE AS A WHOLE.

Where the court instructed the jury fully, clearly, and correctly as to the measure of damages, there was no material error in failing to charge specifically that, in arriving at market value, any enhanced value of the property caused by the street improvement should be set off against any damages proved. In determining the question of market value, the jury necessarily would have to consider consequential enhancement, as well as consequential damage.

6. SAME—EVIDENCE.

No error of law was committed, and the verdict is amply supported by the evidence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by Janey Daley and others against the mayor and council of the city of Macon.

Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Minter Wimberly and Jesse Harris, for plaintiffs in error. R. D. Feagin and Claud Estes, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Plaintiffs in the court below brought suit against the mayor and council of the city of Macon for damages resulting to their property by the action of the city in raising the grade of the street on which said property was situated. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, and the judgment of the court overruling the defendant's motion for a new trial brings the case to this court. It was admitted that the change of grade of the street in front of plaintiffs' property was in conformity to an ordinance of the mayor and council of the city of Macon in their legislative capacity; and it is therefore insisted that there is no liability for any consequential damages to said property caused by the change in the grade of the street. It is perfectly well settled that municipal corporations, acting under authority conferred by the Legislature, are not liable for consequential damages to abutting landowners arising from grading or changing the grade of streets, provided that in so doing they keep within the limits of the streets, and there is no physical invasion of the rights of private property, and reasonable care and skill are exercised in the performance of the work, unless there is some provision in the State Constitution, in the city charter, or in some statute creating such liability; and, even where the Constitution contained the provision that private property should not be "taken" for public use without just compensation, it was uniformly held by the courts of the state and the United States Supreme Court that municipalities were not liable for consequential damages caused by an authorized change in the grade of a public street, where private property was not actually taken or there was no physical invasion of the property. The theory upon which these decisions was based was that the state had duly delegated to the municipality the power to make public improvements, and as long as the work was carried on within the scope of the authority thus delegated, and without negligence in the performance of the work, there would be no liability whatever damage occurred. "A citizen was thus left without protection in all that large class of cases done for the public benefit, or for a use public or quasi public, although no part of his tangible property was physically taken, the use or value of the property was palpably impaired, or was stripped of incidents comprised within the conception of complete property rights which brought to those rights quite as much value as the mere possession of property." Brown v. Seattle, 5 Wash. 33, 31 Pac. 313, 32 Pac. 214, 18 L. R. A. 161. This was a mischief for which a remedy was sought; and a most complete remedy was found in the constitutional provisions of many of the states. The state of Illinois was the pioneer in this measure of relief to the citizen. In 1870 that state inserted in its Constitution the provision that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation." Many of the states followed the example thus set of a more liberal rule of protecting the citizen against public progress or improvement, and similar constitutional provisions were adopted. Where this special constitutional provision exists, the rule of municipal liability has been changed, and greatly enlarged. The courts have, without a single exception, held that although prior to these provisions a municipal corporation was under no liability to an adjoining abutting landowner for any damages sustained from the action of the city in grading or changing the grade of its streets, unless his property was actually invaded, under such provisions a city is liable to him for all direct and consequential damages resulting from changing the grade of the street, where the damage thus inflicted exceeded the benefit derived from the grading. Of course, the same rule applies to all improvements of a public character. The decisions of the courts announcing this rule of liability are numerous. Many of them can be found collated in O'Brien v. Philadelphia, 150 Pa. 589, 24 Atl. 1047, 30 Am. St. Rep. 835-850, where the subject is ably and exhaustively considered by the learned editor. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 8 Sup. Ct. 820, 31 L. Ed. 638, construing the provision of the Illinois Constitution, supra, declares that, under such provision, "a recovery may be had in all cases where private property has sustained a substantial injury from the making and use of an improvement that is public in its character, whether the damages be direct, as when caused by trespass or physical invasion of the property, or consequential, as in diminution of its market value."

As pertinent to the contention of the able and indefatigable attorney representing the city of Macon, now being considered, that the city is relieved from liability because the change in the grade of the street was in accordance with a profile or plan of improvement adopted by the mayor and council in pursuance of legislative action and under legislative authority, we quote from the opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan this statement: "The city did this work under the power conferred by its charter 'to lay out, establish, open, alter, widen, extend, grade, pave or otherwise improve streets, alleys, avenues, sidewalks, wharves, parks, and public grounds,' and as directed by special ordinances of the city council." The question is not an open one in Georgia. The Constitution of 1877 and decisions of the Supreme Court settle it beyond all controversy. Paragraph 1, § 3, Bill of Rights, declares: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public purposes without just and adequate compensation being first paid." Under the express terms of this broad provision of the fundamental law, neither the state nor county nor city by legislation or otherwise can authorize or do any public work which damages private property without just and adequate compensation. In City of Atlanta v. Green, 67 Ga. 386, the Supreme Court held that the constitutional provision, supra, changed the rule of liability for consequential damages resulting to property owners from raising or lowering the grade of streets, and that such damages were recoverable. This ruling has been approved and followed in every case since. Smith v. Floyd County, 85 Ga. 420, 425, 11 S. E. 850; Moore v. Atlanta, 70 Ga. 611 (3); City of Augusta v. Schrameck, 96 Ga. 426, 23 S. E. 400, 51 Am. St. Rep. 146; Atlantic Railway Company v. McKnight, 125 Ga. 331, 54 S. E. 148; Pause v. Atlanta, 98 Ga. 92, 26 S. E. 489, 58 Am. St. Rep. 290; Mayor and Council of Macon v. Wing, 113 Ga. 90, 33 S. E. 392; Barfield v. Macon County, 109 Ga. 386, 34 S. E. 596; Campbell v. Met. St. R. Co., 82 Ga. 320, 9 S. E. 1078. Indeed, the language of the Constitution is so clear and free from doubt that no room is left for judicial interpretation. The inclination of the court to content itself with reference to its terms has yielded only to the earnest appeal of the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error to carefully consider his contention, and the authorities cited in support thereof. This has been done; but this court has found no reason for not willingly accepting the decisions of the Supreme Court of the state, the unanimous deliverances of other courts of last resort, including the Supreme Court of the United States, or from giving to the plain language of the Constitution its only rational construction. If the position of counsel were sound, the mandatory language of the Constitution would be wholly ineffective and meaningless, and the paramount law of the state would be powerless to protect the citizen wherever private property was taken or damaged for public use, provided such taking and damage was in pursuance of legislative action of the state, or of counties and municipalities by virtue of legislative power delegated to them by the state. Neither the state in its legislative capacity nor the subordinate agents of the state can thus render inoperative and void the supreme law of the land.

2. The first, second, third, fourth, and fifth grounds of the amended motion for a new trial assign error in the ruling of the court permitting testimony to be introduced as to the cost of filling in the lot to a level with the street, and in not instructing the jury as to the effect of such testimony. Plaintiffs are entitled only to recover the diminution in the market value of the property. It is urged that such evidence tended to confuse them as to the measure of damage. Any evidence that will tend to show damage to the property would be admissible. Certainly the cost of filling up the lot to a level with the street was a proper factor to be considered in determining the question of damage. The court clearly and correctly instructed the jury that the measure of damages to abutting property, caused by raising the grade of a street, was the difference between the market value before and after the grade was changed. But this evidence of the cost of the filling in the lot to bring it up to the level of the street was competent, not as an independent item of special damage, but as a fact or circumstance throwing light upon the general question of the diminution of market value. Campbell v. Metropolitan Street Railroad Company, 82 Ga. 320, 9 S. E. 1078; City of Augusta v. Schrameck, 96 Ga. 426, 23 S. E. 400, 51 Am. St. Rep. 146; Atlanta Railway Company v. McKnight, 125 Ga. 329, 54 S. E. 148 (3).

The sixth and seventh grounds are fully covered by the first part of this opinion. These grounds embody requests to charge the principle of law as therein contended by the city.

3. The eighth ground assigns error in the failure of the court to charge the jury that any increased value resulting from the improvements should be set off against the damage proved. While the court did not expressly charge this well-established rule of law, yet the charge was so apt and clear as to the damage that plaintiffs were entitled to recover that we do not think the jury could have been at all confused, or have failed to understand the correct measure of damage. The jury could not arrive at the market value without taking into consideration both consequential damage and consequential enhancement, balancing the one against the other, thus determining if there was in fact any real damage. But there was no request made to charge more specifically on this subject.

In our opinion the law governing the facts of the case was fully, fairly, and aptly submitted to the jury. No error was committed during the trial, and the evidence amply supports the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

ATLANTIC & B. RY. CO. v. SMITH. (No. 376.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 10, 1907.)

1. RAILROADS—KILLING STOCK—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a suit against a railroad company for killing stock, the court instructed the jury as follows: "If you believe from the evidence in the case, and from all the facts and surrounding circumstances, that the defendant did use all the means he possibly could, or such as the law requires, if you believe that he used all diligence in his power to keep from killing the mule, it would be your duty to find for the defendant." The court immediately corrected the error complained of in this charge, as follows: "Now, what I said about all diligence just now I correct that to this extent: Exercise all reasonable care and diligence (that is, the class of diligence required in the matter of stock), all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence (that is, the class required)." Held, that the error was sufficiently cured and rendered harmless. Especially is this true when in the body of the charge the court gave to the jury section 2321 of the Civil Code of 1895, and specifically instructed them that the diligence required of railroads to prevent the killing of stock was as laid down in said section. Savannah Railway Co. v. Hatcher, 45 S. E. 289, 118 Ga. 273; Morrison v. Dickey, 46 S. E. 863, 119 Ga. 701; East Tenn. R. Co. v. Miller, 22 S. E. 660, 95 Ga. 738.

2. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY OF REQUEST.

In the absence of a written request for the court to define to the jury the meaning of the words "ordinary and reasonable care and diligence," there was no error in the omission to do so. It is doubtful if any specific definition would enlighten the jury, or make any clearer the plain meaning of these simple words.

3. ERROR, WRIT OF—REVIEW.

This court again emphasizes the fact that, where there is no error of law, it has no authority to disturb a verdict supported by any evidence. Neither has it any inclination to do so where such verdict is approved by the trial court.

GARRICK v. JONES. (No. 402.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1907.)

1. ERROR, WRIT OF—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

In a court for the correction of errors of law, the verdict of the jury is conclusive as to issues of fact properly submitted to them. Three well-defined issues of fact were involved—contract, performance, advances—upon the determination of which depended the legal result of lien or no lien. The verdict established the plaintiff's evidence as the truth of the case, and is presumptively right. No reason appears why the verdict and the judgment in accordance therewith should be set aside, and the motion for new trial was properly refused.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT—RENTING ON SHARES—TITLE TO CROPS.

According to the facts found by the jury to be true, the plaintiff in error, as landlord, was to furnish the land, plow stock, etc., and the defendant in error was to furnish the labor, and the crop was to be equally divided. The relation of landlord and "cropper" existed, which is merely a mode of paying a laborer wages for his labor, and he has no title to any part of the crop until the rent and advances are paid. It was undisputed that the landlord was in control and had received all of the crop that had been gathered up to the foreclosure of the laborer's special lien; and the jury found, as authorized by the evidence, that the portion of the crop taken by the landlord was more than enough to pay the rent and all the advances, and that the cropper was entitled to foreclose his special lien on the remainder. The right of the jury to prefer this evidence cannot be questioned, and it is equally well settled that, after the payment of the rent and all advances, a cropper is entitled to foreclose his special laborer's lien for the balance due. McElmurray v. Turner, 12 S. E. 359, 86 Ga. 215.

3. AGRICULTURE—LIENS ON CROPS.

If a landlord has no property upon which a laborer's general lien may be foreclosed, a cropper is not required to wait to foreclose his special laborer's lien until the entire crop has been delivered to the landlord and by him disposed of. Theoretical satisfaction is not the equivalent of actual relief. The rent and advances made to aid in making the crop must, from the nature of the case, be first paid, but the agreement to pay the cropper part of the crop as his wages is as much a part of the contract.

4. SAME.

Delivery of the landlord's share of the crop by the cropper, and payment by such cropper for all advances, is full performance of the contract upon his part, and will entitle such cropper to foreclose his lien as a laborer, either upon the remainder of the crop or upon the property of the landlord generally.

While it is necessary, in order to sustain a verdict of guilty of assault with intent to murder, that the evidence should show such a case that, if death had ensued from the assault, the defendant would be guilty of murder, yet it is error for the court to instruct the jury that, if the defendant made an assault with a weapon likely to produce death under such circumstances as would have made him guilty of murder had death ensued, he would be guilty of the offense of assault with intent to murder. Smith v. State, 52 Ga. 88; Napper v. State, 51 S. E. 592, 123 Ga. 571, and citations; Adams v. State, 53 S. E. 804, 125 Ga. 11; Shockley v. State, 54 S. E. 692, 125 Ga. 778; Duncan v. State, 58 S. POWELL, J. 1. The first headnote requires no elaboration. An examination of the authorities cited will show, not only the existence of the rule, but also the sound reasons upon which it is established.

2. While Chief Justice Jackson, in his dissenting opinion in Baldwin v. State, 75 Ga. 489, expresses it as his view of the law, in cases of cutting with a knife, that when, if the offender had killed, it would have been manslaughter, the offense is stabbing, yet the majority opinion in that case, declaring that since the amendment to the stabbing act the circumstances of justification are for the jury in each case, has not been questioned by the Supreme Court in later rulings, and has been expressly followed by this court in Edmundson v. State, 1 Ga. App. 116, 57 S. E. 947. While such a cutting cannot be assault with intent to murder, and cannot be any offense higher than that of stabbing, it is not necessarily the latter offense. See Napper v. State, 123 Ga. 572, 51 S. E. 592. A knife is not necessarily a deadly weapon. Paschal v. State, 125 Ga. 279, 54 S. E. 172. The law infers no intention to kill from the fact of the cutting, unless death actually ensues. A distinction must be kept in mind between those cases in which the jury find that the purpose of the defendant was to take the life of the person assaulted and those in which this fact does not appear to their satisfaction. In cases where the defendant has cut with a knife, or other sharp instrument, if the cutting was done with the specific intention of killing the person cut, the offense is assault with intent to murder, if the cutting was done under such circumstances that, if death had ensued, the homicide would have been murder, and in that event only. Also where the cutting has been done by the defendant with the intention of killing the person cut, if the cutting was done under circumstances that, if death had resulted, the homicide would have been voluntary manslaughter, the defendant would not be guilty of assault with intent to murder, but would be guilty of the statutory offense of stabbing. Although the cutting may have been done by the defendant with the intention of killing the prosecutor, yet, if it was done under such circumstances that, if death had resulted, the homicide would have been justifiable by reason of being committed in self-defense or under circumstances of justification, the defendant would be guilty of no offense. These rules only apply in the event that the cutting was done with deadly intent, with the intent to kill; and this intent is a specific fact to be proved in each case, though it may be inferred by the jury from the facts and circumstances of the case. If the cutting by the defendant was not accompanied with any intention of killing the person cut, the defendant is not guilty of any higher offense than that of stabbing, and his guilt or innocence of that offense is to be determined by the question whether the cutting was done in self-defense or under other circumstances of justification. Whether the stabbing is justifiable or not is to be determined by the jury in each case in light of the nature and extent of the cutting, the character of the weapon used, the provocation, if any, offered by the person cut, and all the other circumstances. While opprobrious language alone will not justify a stabbing (see Ward v. State, 56 Ga. 409), yet a slight cutting not intended to be deadly may be justified by an assault or other provocation offered by the person cut, too slight to justify a homicide or a deadly assault with a knife or similar weapon.

HILL, C. J. Lizzie McConnell was convicted of the offense of keeping a lewd house.

Her motion for a new trial was overruled, and she brings the case to this court. The principal ground of error assigned is that the verdict is without any evidence to support it, and therefore contrary to law. To determine this question, it is necessary to consider the evidence for the state, which, briefly stated, is as follows: The defendant was a negro woman living in a house containing nine rooms, mostly bedrooms, located in what might be called the "tenderloin" district of Savannah. Living in the house with her was her son and one negro girl attendant. It was proved by several police officers in the city that the general reputation of the house was that of an assignation or lewd house, and such had been its general reputation for several years. A short time prior to the arrest of the defendant for keeping a lewd house, it was shown that she had rented a room in her house to a young white woman, who was brought there at midnight in a hack by a white man, and that, while this woman was in the house, an abortion was performed upon her, from the effects of which she died. When the officers arrested the defendant, they found in her house a white woman locked in a room upstairs, in a street dress, with her hat off, who gave them a fictitious name and address. The defendant in her statement to the jury admitted that she had rented the house in question for the purposes of keeping it as a lewd house some three or four years before her indictment, but stated that she had not kept it for such unlawful purpose for three or four years; that she had discontinued keeping it since said time for improper purposes, and lived there with her son and his wife and child until the death of the wife and child, and had continued to live there with her son until the present time. She stated that she owned the house and would have sold it, but could not get any price for it; that she made her living in the summertime by selling watermelons, and in the wintertime selling wood from a wood-yard, and from operating public hacks. It was also shown by the evidence that white men and white women frequented said house. We will first consider the special assignments of error.

1. The court permitted Murphy, a witness for the state, to testify, over the objection of defendant, that he had, in his capacity as a policeman, visited the residence of the defendant about two months prior to the date of his testimony, while he was investigating "that abortion case," meaning the case in which it was alleged that the young white woman had had a criminal operation performed upon her in the house of the defendant, from the effects of which she had died. It was insisted that this testimony was irrelevant and inadmissible, for the reason that, if an abortion had been committed in the house of the defendant, such fact was no proof that she kept and maintained a lewd house, and that the purpose or motive of the witness in visiting the house of the defendant was further irrelevant as not being in line with the alleged purpose for which the defendant kept and maintained the house, and that such testimony tended to confuse the minds of the jury, and mislead and prejudice them against the defendant. The court, in admitting this testimony, instructed the jury that they were not to consider the evidence in reference to any alleged abortion. We think the fact that a young white woman, presumptively of immoral character, had been an inmate of said house, was a circumstance, its weight to be determined by the jury, illustrating the character of the house.

2. It is insisted that the court erred in permitting this same witness to testify for the state, over the objection of the defendant, that defendant had stated to him that she had rented a room in her house to a white woman about two weeks prior to the visit of the police officer, it being urged that this testimony was irrelevant, unless the state could show also that the reputation of the woman to whom the room was rented was that of unchastity, or that the purpose of renting the room to her was for prostitution, or that the woman committed an act of prostitution in the house; it being contended that the mere renting of the room in the house to the woman, without proof of more, was not competent evidence on the charge of keeping and maintaining a lewd house. This admission of the defendant was relevant testimony in connection with the circumstances that the woman in question was a white woman who had been brought to the house at midnight by a white man, who was not her husband or related to her, and that while in the house this woman had performed upon her an abortion.

3. It was said that the court erred in permitting a police officer as a witness for the state to testify, over the objection of defendant, that the woman to whom the room had been rented, and upon whom the criminal abortion had been committed, was not then in life, it being insisted that this testimony was calculated to mislead the jury, and to prejudice their minds against the defendant. The court, in admitting the testimony, stated to the jury that he did so for the sole purpose of explaining why the state did not produce her as a witness, it having already been shown by the testimony that defendant had rented this white woman a room in the house. The further fact that the woman was dead could not have been hurtful to the defendant.

4. Counsel for the defendant offered to prove by two of the state's witnesses that, when they went to the defendant's house to make the arrest, they found a white woman in a bedroom upstairs, who stated to them the purpose of her visit to said house, and the reason for her presence therein; she stating then and there to these officers that she had entered the house for the purpose of finding a dress maker, thinking that a dressmaker was located therein, and that, seeing the officers coming in, she had become frightened and fled upstairs; that she was a respectable lady, and was not in said house for the purpose of lewdness. In view of the fact that in the same conversation this woman had given to the officers a name and address which was found to be fictitious, which facts were allowed to be shown in behalf of the state, we think all of this conversation should have been admitted to the jury. We do not think, however, that the refusal to admit it was such harmful error as to demand a new trial.

5. But the main point relied upon by counsel for plaintiff in error, and presented to this court with much force, is that there was no legal evidence submitted to the jury upon which a verdict of guilty of the crime charged could have been based. It is urged that there is not in the testimony of any witness a single fact based upon his own knowledge to prove the offense charged, to wit, that of maintaining and keeping a lewd house. It is insisted that the testimony given by the police officers that the defendant maintained and kept a house having the reputation of being a lewd house furnishes no evidence to support a conviction, and was inadmissible. The Supreme Court, in Hogan v. State, 78 Ga. 82, held that the reputation of a house being kept and maintained as a lewd house was admissible evidence on the trial of a person charged with keeping and maintaining a lewd house. It is insisted by learned counsel that this ruling is unsound and contrary to decisions of many courts of last resort on the same subject; and we are asked to certify this question to the Supreme Court for the purpose of having this decision reviewed. It is said that this evidence is admissible only where the statute makes it an offense to keep and maintain a house of ill fame. We think the words "ill fame" are used in these statutes as synonymous with the word "lewd," both meaning a house kept for the purpose of permitting the practice of fornication and adultery therein. We cannot think that it was intended to create a substantive offense in keeping a house which, justly or unjustly, had the reputation of being a house of ill fame. The offense must be the keeping of a house which was in fact, and not merely in name, a house for the practice of immorality. But we do not think it necessary to extend this discussion. We do not think the Supreme Court in the decision supra intended to hold that general reputation of a house of itself alone and uncorroborated was sufficient evidence to prove the offense, but that it was admissible as a circumstance tending to prove the fact, and, in connection with other facts and circumstances, might be sufficient to prove the existence of the offense. Construing the decision with this limitation, we see no reason to doubt its soundness, or to certify the question to the Supreme Court for review.

Without going into a consideration of the evidence, we content ourselves with the statement that there were other facts and circumstances proved, along with the general reputation of the house, which warranted the verdict of the jury. What might be called the general complexion of the place had the appearance of lewdness, and there were several leprous spots in this complexion which strongly pointed to the existence of immorality. This court cannot say that there was no evidence to support the verdict, or that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to grant a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

REEVES v. STATE. (No. 599.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1907.)

HOMICIDE — EVIDENCE — VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER.

A verdict of voluntary manslaughter will not be sustained as against the exception that the same is without evidence to support it, when the testimony of the witness and the statement of the defendant present only the issue whether the defendant was guilty of murder or was justifiable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, §§ 3074, 3084.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Meriwether County; R. W. Freeman, Judge.

Jack Reeves was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and brings error. Reversed.

W. R. Jones and Hill & Culpepper, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Terrell, Sol. Gen., for the State.

POWELL, J. This court is very slow to set aside the verdict of a jury, approved by the trial judge, on the ground that there is no evidence to support it; but in this case there is not the slightest scintilla of evidence upon which the verdict rendered can legally rest. The defendant was indicted for murder, and found guilty of voluntary manslaughter. If the jury had believed the testimony of the state's witness, and the dying declarations of the deceased as detailed by his wife, a verdict of guilty of murder would have been authorized; for, according to this version of the case, the defendant committed nothing less serious than a malicious, unjustifiable, unmitigated homicide. But by their verdict the jury found that the defendant was not guilty of this offense, and, for the purposes of the trial under review, acquitted him thereof. The testimony by which a conviction of murder would have been authorized having been eliminated, the remainder of the evidence in the case shows a perfect case of justifiable homicide. There was no evidence whatever of a homicide not justifiable, and not malicious, but provoked by an assault or other equivalent circumstances to justify the excitement of passion; that is to say, of a voluntary manslaughter. According to the state's testimony, the defendant and the deceased were walking along in the road quarrelling. Each had a gun, but, without any more provocation than mere words, the defendant stepped to one side of the road, deliberately raised his gun, and shot the deceased, who was making no assault whatever on him. After the deceased was shot and had fallen to the ground, he raised his gun, and shot the defendant. Of course, this subsequent shot by the deceased could not justify or mitigate the defendant's offense already committed. According to the defendant's statement, corroborated by his witnesses, the deceased and a companion made a joint quarrel with him, which he sought to decline until the deceased, with the statement that he was going to shoot the defendant, jumped back, cocked his gun, aimed it and fired, the load striking the defendant, who, to repel the attack, also fired his gun simultaneously, striking the deceased and mortally wounding him. If this be the truth of the case, the killing was justifiable homicide. There is no theory of mutual combat on which the verdict can be justified. If one draws a gun on me and threatens to shoot me, no mutual combat arises by reason of the fact that I take physical issue with him and shoot first, even though I may have used approbrious words to him. Butler v. State, 92 Ga. 601, 19 S. E. 51; Boatwright v. State, 89 Ga. 140, 15 S. E. 21. If we segregate the testimony, and take so much of the defendant's statement as asserts that the deceased and his companion were provoking a difficulty with him, whether at the immediate scene of the difficulty or earlier in the day (for there was evidence of a previous quarrel), by words and by menaces, and likewise take so much of the state's testimony as asserts that the defendant shot the deceased before he had drawn any weapon, and that the latter made no effort to shoot until after the former had mortally wounded him, the homicide would not be manslaughter; for, while in some cases words, threats, and menaces may be so circumstanced as to operate to afford a justification for a homicide on the theory of reasonable fear, yet in no case are they sufficient to reduce the offense from murder to manslaughter. Cumming v. State, 99 Ga. 662, 27 S. E. 177. It is true, so we find from the record, that over a month before the homicide occurred the defendant and the deceased had had a difficulty, in which the deceased gave the defendant sufficient provocation to have reduced a homicide occurring on account thereof from murder to manslaughter; but there is not the slightest suggestion in the testimony or the statement of the defendant that the homicide was the result of or was in anywise connected with this previous difficulty. In fact, from the context, it seems manifest that this testimony was used for the sole purpose of showing the violent character of the deceased. In fact, after a close, careful scrutiny of the record, we find no evidence of a voluntary manslaughter. The verdict was manifestly a compromise. Such compromises, whereby the jurors give up their deliberate convictions and honest differences over the question of the defendant's guilt of the only crime in issue under the testimony, and compromise by convicting him of another offense of which he is manifestly not guilty, is unlawful, is unfair to the state and unfair to the accused. In this connection, note the typic case of Reed v. State (No. 459), 58 S. E. 312. It is true that the court gave the jury instructions on the law of voluntary manslaughter, and no exception is taken thereto. However, this does not prevent the verdict being as a matter of law without evidence to support it, and exception is duly taken on that ground.

2. SAME—EVIDENCE.

The venue, as any other fact in a case, may be proved by circumstantial evidence, as well as by direct proof, but numerous decisions of the Supreme Court, by which the Court of Appeals is bound, compel a holding that the evidence in this case does not disclose sufficient circumstances to adequately establish that the crime charged was committed in the county alleged.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

Jim Smith was convicted of crime, and brings error. Reversed.

John R. Cooper, for plaintiff in error. Wm. Brunson, Sol. Gen., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The only question in this case is whether the venue is sufficiently proved. It is insisted by plaintiff in error that it is not proved beyond a reasonable doubt, and by the state that it is established by circumstances. Venue can be proved by circumstantial evidence, just as any other fact may thus be established. Were the question a new one, and to be determined by us as an original proposition, we would perhaps hold that the circumstances in this case ought to satisfy a jury beyond any other reasonable conclusion that the car was broken into in the county of Bibb, and that the jurisdiction of the court was thus proved, because it appears that the car was left at the Southern yard in or near Macon, and this court would feel authorized to take judicial cognizance of the geographical extent of Bibb county, and of the location of the city of Macon therein. But in view of the holding in Gosha's Case, 56 Ga. 36, and Moye's Case, 65 Ga. 754, we are constrained to hold that the venue in this case was not sufficiently shown, and that for failure of proof of this jurisdictional fact the case must be remanded for another trial. In both of those cases it is held that the venue of the crime must be established clearly and beyond all reasonable doubts. In Gosha's Case the proof was that the crime was committed within 50 yards of a residence which was in Sumter county. And in view of the locality in which the crime was committed, and the nature of the crime, this would seem to be sufficient. But the Supreme Court thought otherwise, Jackson, J., delivering the unanimous opinion of the court. In Moye's Case the proof showed that the crime was committed in the lumber yard of a Mr. Sloan in the city of Americus, and yet the Supreme Court again held that this was not sufficient to prove that the offense was committed in Sumter county. In Cooper's Case, 106 Ga. 120, 32 S. E. 23, the proof showed that the difficulty occurred in front of a certain store in Lawrenceville, the county town, and it was again held that the venue was not sufficiently proved.

The most that the evidence in this case shows, with reference to the venue, is that the car alleged to have been broken was left in the Southern yard in Macon, and may have been broken into there. Under the decisions above referred to there was no sufficient proof that the crime, if committed by the defendant, was committed in Bibb county. While we are constrained to make this ruling, we would suggest legislation to the effect that a new trial should not be required to be granted upon the ground that the venue has not been sufficiently proved, unless the point be insisted upon at the trial and before verdict.

Judgment reversed.

McCAIN v. STATE. (No. 522.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 26, 1907.)

1. SUNDAY—VIOLATION OF SUNDAY LAW—BARBERS.

A barber who pursues the work of his ordinary calling on the Lord's Day by shaving the members of a club at a room in the clubhouse, and receives compensation therefor, violates Pen. Code 1896, § 422.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Sunday, § 6.]

2. SAME—EVIDENCE.

The criminal character of such act is not affected by the fact that the compensation for said work is not compulsory, but voluntary; nor by the fact that the work is confined to members of the club.

3. SAME—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

The courts will judicially recognize that shaving by a barber is not a work of necessity permitted by the statute to be done on the Sabbath Day.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 715.]

4. SAME—EVIDENCE.

The verdict having been demanded by the undisputed evidence, the errors of law complained of were immaterial and harmless.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Floyd County; Harper Hamilton, Judge.

Slaughter McCain was convicted of a violation of the Sunday law, and brings error. Affirmed.

W. J. Nunnally and Denny & Harris, for plaintiff in error. W. H. Ennis, Sol., and Seaborn & Barry Wright, for the State.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff in error was convicted of the violation of Pen. Code 1896, § 422. The judgment overruling his motion for a new trial is brought to this court for review. The undisputed evidence, substantially stated, is as follows: He was a barber, pursuing his business and work of his ordinary calling during the week in a shop in the city of Rome. On Sundays he went to the house occupied by the Elks Club, and in a room set apart for the purpose he shaved members of the club, receiving therefor whatever the members saw fit to give him. No other persons except members were shaved, and no compulsory charge was made, but the amount paid by the members was 25 cents a shave. It was also shown that some of these members, on account of being engaged all day Saturday, could not conveniently get a shave on said day, and, in order to present a decent appearance in attendance at church, they thought it necessary to get a shave on Sundays. It is insisted by the plaintiff in error that under this evidence there was no violation of section 422 (1) because there was no consideration demanded for the work; (2) because the shaving of the members of the club, under the evidence, was a work of necessity; (3) because the plaintiff in error was not engaged in the work of his usual and ordinary calling at his usual place of business, but the shaving in question was occasional and performed at a private house and confined to the members of the club, who were not able, for reasons stated, to get a shave on Saturday. Error is also assigned to the ruling admitting as evidence a former indictment for the same offense against the plaintiff in error, and the plea of guilty thereon, and, also, that the court erred in not instructing the jury that the burden was on the state to show that the act charged was not a work of necessity or charity.

1. Since colonial days it has been the policy of the state of Georgia to prohibit all persons from using the Sabbath as a day of labor, or from pursuing their ordinary calling on said day. By an act of the colonial Legislature of March 4, 1762, it was provided: "No tradesman, artificer, workman, laborer, or other person whatsoever shall do or exercise any worldly labor, business, or work of their ordinary calling on the Lord's Day or any part thereof (works of necessity or charity only, excepted)." Cobb's Digest of Laws, p. 853, § 2. This colonial act is in the exact language of the statute of 29 Charles II, c. 7. Section 422 of the Penal Code of 1896 is a substantial codification of this act. The terms of the statute are very broad. They not only forbid the pursuit of secular business, but forbid any work of ordinary calling on the Lord's Day, except works of necessity or charity. It makes no sort of difference that the secular business is not carried on on Sunday at the usual place of business. If the work is that of his ordinary calling, and is occasionally performed by the defendant at a different place, he violates the statute. The law not only closes the business places of secular employment during the Sabbath, but stops on said day work of ordinary calling, whatever that work may be or wherever that work may be done. The purpose of the law is to require cessation from labor, and to set apart one day as a day of rest as essential to the physical and moral well-being, not only of the individual, but of society. It cannot be doubted that the plaintiff in error in shaving his customers at the rooms of the club did pursue the work of his ordinary calling. It was simply a change of location, but the work was the same as pursued on week days at his place of business. Neither can it be doubted that this work was done by him because of the compensation paid by the members. The fact that the work in question was confined to the members of the club, and was performed in the clubhouse, may reduce the flagrancy of the offense, but cannot alter the express terms of the law. The work on Sundays was possibly not so active and constant as the defendant's work on week days. Still, shaving was the work of his ordinary calling. "Those things that are repeated daily or weekly in the course of trade or business are parts of the ordinary calling of the man exercising such trade or business." Reed v. State, 119 Ga. 563, 46 S. E. 837.

The contention of the plaintiff in error that the work of shaving the members of the club was a work of necessity, because such members, by reason of their occupation on Saturdays, could not get a shave, and cleanliness demanded a daily shave, cannot be reasonably upheld. While shaving may be regarded as an act of personal cleanliness, desirable to be performed upon the first day as well as upon other days of the week, still this fact does not make shaving necessary or the work of the barber one of necessity. The statute makes no exception in favor of a man who cannot shave himself, or who cannot conveniently procure some one to shave him on a week day. Many states have statutes expressly prohibiting the opening of barber shops on Sundays, and expressly declaring that shaving is not an act of necessity. But it needs no decision of the courts or the declaration of the statute to convince men of ordinary intelligence and experience that shaving is not a work of necessity within the meaning of that term as constituting the exception in the statute now under consideration.

2. We think the court committed an error in permitting the introduction of an indictment against the defendant, and his plea of guilty thereon, for a similar offense, and if there were any doubt, under the uncontradicted evidence in this case, of the defendant's guilt, such error would be reversible;

but, in view of the facts of this case, this error was immaterial and harmless.

3. It is a general rule that the state must affirmatively show that the act of the accused on which a criminal charge is based does not fall within an exception made by the statute. In this case, however, the business or work of the plaintiff in error was proved. The character of such work is peculiarly within the experience and knowledge of all men, and the jury knew as well as any witness could tell them whether this work was a work of necessity or charity. The court in the charge left it to the jury to say whether the work in question was one of necessity or not, and we think the jury could determine this fact without the opinion of any witness. Indeed it has been held, and we think correctly so, that the court will take judicial notice that the shaving of his customers by a barber is a worldly labor or work done by him in the course of his ordinary calling, and is not within the exceptions of the statute. State v. Frederick, 45 Ark. 347, 55 Am. Rep. 555.

We are clear that under the undisputed facts of this case the plaintiff in error was guilty of violating Pen. Code 1895, § 422, and that the evidence demanded the verdict against him. His offense was not a very flagrant violation of the law, but it was a violation. Opinions may differ, and they really do differ, as to whether abstaining from labor on Sunday is a religious duty, but, whether it is or not, it is certain that the Legislature of Georgia has prescribed it as a civil duty, and makes a violation of this duty a criminal offense.

Judgment affirmed.

(2 Ga. App. 361)

WOODRUFF et al. v. HUGHES. (No. 405.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 18, 1907.)

1. CONSPIRACY—CIVIL LIABILITY—GIST OF OFFENSE.

Where civil liability for a conspiracy is sought to be imposed, the conspiracy of itself furnishes no cause of action. The gist of the action is not the conspiracy alleged, but the tort committed against the plaintiff and the damage thereby done.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Conspiracy, §§ 4, 5.]

2. SAME—DEFINED.

A conspiracy is the combining of two or more persons for the purpose of doing something unlawful, oppressive, or immoral, as a means or an end. The allegation and proof of conspiracy is important to the action only because it will enable the plaintiff to recover his damages in case the conspiracy can be proved, not only from the actual participants engaged in committing the injury, but also from those defendants who conspired to accomplish it, although neither present nor participating. An averment that the acts alleged were done in pursuance of a conspiracy does not change the nature of the action, but it may be pleaded and proved as aggravating the wrong of which the plaintiff complained, and to enable him to recover against all the conspirators as joint tort-feasors, or (in case no conspiracy be shown) that the plaintiff may still recover against such of the defendants as may be guilty of the tort.

3. SAME — ACTIONS — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

In an action on the case for conspiracy, the allegation with reference to the combination, conspiring, and concert of action are mere matters of inducement leading up to the relation of the acts from which conspiracy may be inferred. To show conspiracy, it is not necessary to prove that the parties met together or entered into any specific or formal agreement, or that by words or writing they formulated their unlawful objects. Proof that two or more persons, either positively or tacitly, come to an understanding that they will accomplish an unlawful design, or a lawful design unlawfully, is sufficient.

4. PLEADING — CONCLUSIONS OF LAW FROM FACTS ALLEGED.

Possession of realty is presumed to be lawful until the contrary appears, and, where possession is alleged, that such possession is lawful is such a conclusion as can properly be pleaded.

5. SAME—MATTER OF EVIDENCE.

In neither petition nor answer is an exhaustive statement of the exact evidence upon which a party will rely in the establishment of his contentions required. On the contrary, so far as matters of inducement and other minor matters are concerned, a clear, brief statement of immaterial matters (the briefer the better) is to be commended.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, § 31.]

6. SAME.

There was no error in overruling the demurrer.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by J. A. Hughes against G. W. Woodruff and others. G. W. Woodruff was dismissed for want of proper service, and from a judgment for plaintiff the other defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Payne, Jones & Jones, for plaintiffs in error. R. B. Blackburn and Westmoreland Bros., for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. J. A. Hughes brought suit in the city court of Atlanta against G. W. Woodruff, E. Woodruff, J. C. Gentry, Robert P. Jones, and Winfield Jones, to recover damages for an alleged conspiracy to oust the plaintiff from the lawful possession of certain premises. Some time after the institution of the suit, G. W. Woodruff was dismissed as a party defendant, on account of failure to properly serve him with copy process. To the original petition, the defendants, jointly and severally, demurred generally, as well as specially. The demurrer, on being heard before his honor, Judge Reid, was overruled. To the order overruling said general and special demurrers, the defendants except. The petition alleges, in substance, that on the 3d of February, 1906, the plaintiff was in lawful possession of a certain house and lot in the city of Atlanta, known as "No. 16 Railroad street," having been in lawful possession thereof from the 10th of January, 1906, up to and including the 3d of February, 1906; that the defendants, conspiring and confederating for the purpose of evicting the plaintiff from said premises, undertook forcibly to eject him therefrom, failing in which, one of the defendants, acting for and on behalf of the others, caused a warrant to issue against the plaintiff charging him with the offense of criminal trespass; and that under said warrant the plaintiff was arrested and carried before a magistrate, where, upon securing his recognizance bond, he was released from custody. The petition thereupon proceeds to allege that, being released from custody, the plaintiff returned to the said premises, unlocked the door, he having the keys of said house in his custody, and went into the house, and found therein and on the premises agents and servants of the defendants; that immediately thereafter and on the same day the defendants, still further carrying out the conspiracy, caused a warrant to issue charging the plaintiff with the offense of forcible entry and detainer, under which warrant plaintiff was arrested, incarcerated in jail for four or five hours, and, upon giving his bond, was finally released from custody; that, after being released the second time, the plaintiff repaired to said premises and undertook to repossess himself thereof, but was by force and violence on the part of the defendants prevented from repossessing himself of said property, and that the defendants took possession thereof and retained the same over his objection and protest; that, the warrants coming on to be heard, the magistrate dismissed them, and plaintiff was discharged from custody; that both of the warrants were sued out maliciously and without probable cause, defendants well knowing that the plaintiff was in lawful possession of said premises and had not committed the crimes charged in said warrants; that said prosecutions were pressed against him maliciously and without probable cause, there being aggravating circumstances both in act and intention in the conduct of proceedings against him; and that the plaintiff, by reason of said conduct on the part of said defendants, was greatly wounded in his feelings, held up to contempt and ridicule, and humiliated in the extreme. It is alleged that both of the prosecutions alleged were a part of one and the same scheme, conspiracy, and confederation of the defendants to oust the plaintiff from the possession of said property and gain the physical possession thereof. The plaintiff seeks punitive as well as actual damages, and asks judgment against the defendants in the sum of $10,000.

We will first consider the general demurrer of the defendants alleging that the petition sets forth no cause of action, because, if that contention is well taken, the special demurrers need not be considered. We think the petition sets forth such a cause of action as will withstand the general demurrer. It has been frequently said that there is no legal term of which it is more difficult to give an exact definition than conspiracy, and yet its essentials are easily enumerated. "The elements of a conspiracy are: (a) The confederating: The combining together of two or more persons. (b) The intent: For the purpose. (c) The object: Of doing something unlawful or oppressive, or immoral, as a means of an end." Eddy on Combinations, § 365, p. 238. The law of civil conspiracy is only an extension of the law of criminal conspiracy, and, as far as rights and remedies are concerned, all criminal conspiracies are embraced within civil conspiracies. In a criminal conspiracy, the conspiring together is the essence of the charge. It must be either to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by criminal or unlawful means, but proof of the conspiracy to do either will authorize a conviction. On the other hand, where civil liability for a conspiracy is sought to be imposed, the conspiracy of itself furnishes no cause of action. The gist of the action is the damage, and not the conspiracy. As said by Devens, J., in Boston v. Simmons, 150 Mass. 463, 23 N. E. 211, 6 L. R. A. 629, 15 Am. St. Rep. 230: "The averment of a conspiracy in the declaration does not ordinarily change the nature of the action, nor add to its legal force or effect. The gist of the action is not the conspiracy alleged, but the tort committed against the plaintiff and the damage thereby done wrongfully. Where damage results from an act which, if done by one alone, would not afford ground of action, the like act would not be rendered actionable because done by several in pursuance of a conspiracy. On the other hand, when the tort committed and the damage resulting therefrom proceed from a series of connected acts, the averment that they were done by several in pursuance of a conspiracy does not so change the nature of the action, that, if the wrongful acts are shown to have been done by one only, it cannot be maintained against him alone, and the other defendants exonerated." Whether a conspiracy be civil or criminal, if the person who is the object of such conspiracy is damaged, he has his remedy in an action on a case. As pointed out in 8 Cyc. 645, the statement that the conspiracy is not itself the cause of action has two meanings: (1) That the conspiracy is executed to the injury of another; and (2) that the conspiracy will not render an act unlawful which is lawful when committed by one. But all parties to a conspiracy are jointly and severally liable for damages occasioned by the unlawful combination and acts done by any one of the conspirators in furtherance of a common object become the acts of all. Conceding, then, that an averment that the acts alleged were done in pursuance of a conspiracy does not change the nature of the action or add anything to its legal effect, the allegation and proof of conspiracy is important to the action only because it will enable the plaintiff to recover his damages against such of the defendants as may be shown to be guilty of the tort, even should he fail to prove a conspiracy or concerted design; and it may be pleaded and proved as aggravating the wrong of which the plaintiff complains and to enable him to recover against all the defendants as joint tort-feasors. If the conspiracy can be proved, the party wronged may look beyond the actual participants in committing the injury and join with them as defendants whoever conspired to accomplish it. "An action will not lie for the greatest conspiracy imaginable, if nothing be put in execution; but, if the party be damaged, the action will lie." Savile v. Roberts, 1 Ld. Raym. 374.

In passing upon the general demurrer, then, only two questions need be considered: Were sufficient facts alleged in the petition to set forth and constitute a conspiracy within the above definition? And does it appear that the plaintiff was damaged by reason thereof? If both of these questions be answered in the affirmative (as we think they should be), then there was no error in overruling the general demurrer. The law recognizes the intrinsic difficulty of proving a conspiracy. The allegations with reference to conspiracy are treated as matters of inducement leading up to a more particular description of the acts from which conspiracy may be inferred. It has even been held that, when it becomes necessary to prove a conspiracy in order to connect the defendant with the wrong complained of, no averment of the conspiracy need be made in the pleadings to entitle it to be proved. Parker v. Huntington, 2 Gray (Mass.) 124. Less certainty is required in setting out matters of inducement than in setting out the gist of the action. We think, therefore, that paragraph 3 of the plaintiff's petition sufficiently sets forth a conspiracy between the defendants to enable him, if he can, to hold all of them liable as joint tort-feasors, and to aggravate and increase his damages should he be found to be entitled to any. The conspiracy may sometimes be inferred from the nature of the acts done, the relation of the parties, the interests of the alleged conspirators, and other circumstances. The rule is to allow great latitude in setting out in the complaint the particular act upon which the conspiracy is to be inferred, and even to allow individual acts of the conspirators to be averred. "To show conspiracy, it is not necessary to prove an express contract or agreement to the parties thereto. The essential element of the charge is the common design; but it need not appear that the parties met together either formally or informally, or entered into any explicit or formal agreement, nor is it essential that it should appear that either by words or by writings they formulated their unlawful objects. It is sufficient that two or more persons in any manner either positively or tacitly come to a mutual understanding that they will accomplish the unlawful design. And any one, after a conspiracy is formed, who knows of its existence and purposes and joins therein, becomes as much a party thereto as if he had been an original member." 1 Eddy on Comb. § 368. The petition, then, sufficiently alleged "the combining together of two or more persons." It also alleged the intent (for the purpose) of evicting plaintiff from the premises described. Then was the object of their conspiracy, either in the means used or in the end sought to be attained, unlawful, oppressive, or immoral? According to the allegations of the petition, the means used to accomplish the eviction was the unlawful and malicious use of legal process. According to those allegations, two warrants without any foundation were sworn out against the plaintiff. He was twice arrested, was confined in jail, and subjected to humiliation without cause. If these allegations be true, even if the defendants had the right to the possession of the premises, they used unlawful and immoral means to obtain it. If this action was taken in pursuance of a common intent, understanding, or design, all who participated in the acts alleged would be liable. If the proof failed to show conspiracy, then any one guilty of either of the unlawful means by which petitioner was damaged (if he was damaged as alleged) should respond. In view of what has been said above, there was no error in overruling the general demurrer. The conspiracy was sufficiently alleged. It is immaterial whether the act which it is alleged the defendant intended to do was or was not unlawful, oppressive, or immoral. "Conspiracy is the combination of two or more persons to do (a) something that is unlawful, oppressive, or immoral; or (b) something that is not unlawful, oppressive, or immoral, by unlawful, oppressive, or immoral means; or (c) something that is unlawful, oppressive, or immoral, by unlawful, oppressive, or immoral means." 1 Eddy on Comb. § 171. The means alleged, in either event, were unlawful and oppressive. The damages were such as were connected with and would naturally flow from the tortious acts alleged. The damages being the gravamen of the action, the act or acts causing such damages are required to be set forth with particularity; but no complaint is made upon this score by defendants, and, indeed, we think there is no room for such complaint.

The defendants demurred specially as follows:

(1) To the allegation in paragraph 2 of the petition, that plaintiff was in lawful possession of a certain house and lot in the city of Atlanta, etc., on the ground that the allegation is a mere conclusion of the pleader and not based upon any alleged facts to substantiate it; and to the allegation in the same paragraph with reference to the length of time which plaintiff's lawful possession is stated to have existed, upon the same ground; and because it is not shown, by the allegation of said paragraph alone or in conjunction with other paragraphs of the petition, by virtue of what authority, right, interest, or title, or by consent or authority of what person holding title or right of possession of said premises the plaintiff was in lawful possession of said premises. We think that this demurrer was properly overruled, because, if it is specific enough to reach the word "lawful" as being the conclusion of the pleader, it would not be well taken, because possession is presumed to be lawful until the contrary appears, and the statement that the possession was lawful would be such a conclusion as naturally followed the statement of possession. For the same reason, it is not necessary for the petitioner to state by what authority or title he is in possession. Indeed, from our standpoint, the matter is entirely immaterial, because it is a statement made by the way of inducement leading up to the tort alleged later in the petition.

(2, 3) The second ground of demurrer complains specially to the allegation that "the defendants each and all confederated and conspired together for the purpose of evicting plaintiff from said premises," on the ground that said allegation neither by itself, nor with conjunction with other paragraphs of the petition, alleges any circumstances upon which the conspiracy can be based. As we have already stated, the conspiracy is not the cause of action, and the statement of conspiracy is only for the purpose of aggravating the damages and of joining defendants who may have conspired, and yet have not personally participated in the acts done. This demurrer is settled by the case of Parker v. Huntington, above cited. And, for the same reason, the statement in the petition in regard to defendants causing Winfield Jones to appear before a justice of the peace and make oath that the plaintiff had committed the offense of forcible entry and detainer is sufficiently ample.

(4, 5) Defendants demur specially to the allegation that plaintiff "sought to repossess himself thereof, but was by force and violence, menace, and threats made by defendants, their agents and servants, prevented from repossessing himself of said property," on the ground that it is not alleged by what authority or title the plaintiff sought to repossess himself, and because it is not alleged how the parties seeking to prevent the plaintiff from entering the premises were the agents of the defendants. They also demurred specially to the allegation that "the defendants, their agents and servants, took possession thereof and retained the same," on the ground that the allegation does not show that the defendants, their agents and servants, had no authority or right to take possession of said premises. We think this special demurrer was properly overruled, not only because it fails "to put its finger on the point" by specifically stating what further allegation should have been made, but also because no amendment was necessary. It is impossible and impracticable for a pleader to do more than state the fact upon which he relies. He is not required to insert in his petition or plea a statement of the evidence upon which he expects to rely any more than to give the names of the witnesses by whom he hopes to establish his contentions. The same ruling applies to the fifth special ground of demurrer.

(6) The sixth special ground of demurrer complains that the plaintiff fails to show any facts constituting lawful possession on the part of the plaintiff, or how the defendants could have known of such alleged lawful possession. As already stated in ruling upon the first demurrer, the insertion of the word "lawful" was a conclusion properly to be derived from the other facts stated, and could be averred. And, in the absence of proof to the contrary, the defendants would be presumed to have notice and knowledge of the character and extent of the plaintiff's possession. Defendant also demurs to the statement of the petition contained in paragraph 11, "there being aggravating circumstances, both in act and intent, * * * and said acts were wanton and willful and oppressive in the extreme," the demurrer being that the allegation fails to show how the act and intent of defendants were wanton and willful, and of what the aggravating circumstances consisted. We think it clear that the aggravating circumstances and the wanton, willful, and oppressive conduct of the defendants can well be derived from the allegation with reference to the issuance of the warrant and the arrest thereunder. If those allegations are proved, the jury would have the right to infer that the act and conduct of the defendants were willful and wanton and oppressive in the extreme.

(7) The seventh special ground of demurrer, that the allegations of the petition failed to show any facts or circumstances upon which the conspiracy to oust the plaintiff from possession is based, was without merit; for, as hereinbefore ruled, no averment is necessary on the subject of conspiracy further than that one was entered into between the defendants.

(8, 9, 10) The eighth, ninth, and tenth special grounds of demurrer were properly overruled, because, although the petition may have contained the statement of facts which might have constituted separate and distinct causes of action and alleged acts done at different times, and differing in character, still each of these acts, as clearly appears from the petition, are stated to have been done in pursuance of and with a sole view to effectuate the illegal conspiracy, unlawfully to deprive the plaintiff of his possession of the premises.

The allegations of plaintiff's petition are consistent, and will entitle him, if proved as laid, to a recovery. A conspiracy to oust him by unlawful means from premises of which he was in possession is alleged. The unlawful acts used in carrying out the intent and purpose formed are fully detailed, and his damages, flowing from these acts, are set forth.

Judgment affirmed.

DURHAM v. STATE. (No. 583.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—REMARKS OF JUDGE.

Where it clearly appears from the evidence that the guilt or innocence of the accused depended upon whether the jury would believe the prosecutrix, it was error for the court, either by questions having reference to another case which had been withdrawn from the jury or otherwise, to say or do anything amounting to an expression of an opinion as to what the court believed to be the truth of the transaction, or as to what evidence the court attached importance.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 1533.]

2. SAME.

The questions asked by the court and the answers thereto were prejudicial to the defendant, and such an expression of opinion on the part of the court as demands a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Sylvester; Frank Park, Judge.

John Durham was convicted of crime, and brings error. Reversed.

Perry & Williamson, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Tipton, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant was prosecuted in the committal court for carrying a concealed pistol, for pointing a pistol at another, and for the offense of rape. On the committal trial he was discharged so far as the charge of rape was concerned, but bound over to the city court of Sylvester on the other two charges. Accusations were filed in the city court, charging him with carrying a pistol concealed and with the offense of pointing a pistol at another, and an accusation was also filed against him for the offense of assault and battery, all the offenses occurring at the same time, as alleged. By consent of counsel for both sides, the defendant was put on trial for all three offenses at once, and before the same jury, who were to render separate verdicts in each case. After the prosecutrix had delivered a considerable portion of her testimony, the court, without the consent of the defendant, withdrew the accusation and charge of assault and battery from further consideration by the jury. The testimony of the prosecutrix was that the defendant came to her house a certain Sunday in December, 1905, finding that her husband was away from home, requested sexual intercourse with her, and upon her refusal, and after she had run into a crib and closed the door, took from his pocket a pistol which had been previously concealed, and pointed it at her. According to her testimony, this transaction involved three offenses—obscene and vulgar language in the presence of a female, carrying a pistol concealed, and pointing a pistol at another. The prosecutrix further testified that the defendant again came to her house on Tuesday, December 17, 1905, broke down the door to the house, seized her, and raped her. The defendant again disclosed his pistol, which was concealed before he took it out of his pocket. Both visits to the prosecutrix's house were in the daytime; the first visit, the sun was about an hour high in the afternoon, and the latter occasion was about 2 o'clock in the afternoon. The house of the prosecutrix is in plain view of other houses. The defendant introduced a number of witnesses to show that they could have seen the house and crib he was alleged to have visited, and would have heard the noise of breaking down the door; and also introduced the testimony of a number of witnesses to prove an alibi.

The turning point in the case was whether the defendant was at the house of the prosecutrix at all on either of the occasions named. If the jury believed he was, there could be but little question of his guilt, because the testimony of the prosecutrix alone must be relied upon to establish the defendant's presence at her home; and, if it were credible on this point of contest and conflict, belief of the remainder of her story would follow as a matter of course. If, on the other hand, the defendant did not go to her house and her testimony as to that be false, the entire structure of all the charges is without foundation. When the prosecutrix had concluded her testimony as to the rape, the judge of his own motion withdrew the case of assault from the jury, and shortly afterwards proceeded to question the prosecutrix, eliciting from her evidence that she was pregnant at the time of the rape, and other facts and circumstances which it is contended were not material to the other accusations still remaining before the jury for their consideration, and which were highly prejudicial to the defendant's defense as to the other charges. In the first grounds of the motion, it is insisted that the court erred in withdrawing from the consideration of the jury the charge of assault and battery, and in using the following language in the presence of the jury: "I will withdraw from this jury the case of assault." These words were used by the court when the prosecutrix, Lucy Williams, was on the stand, and after she had testified as follows: "The first transaction took place December 3, 1905, on Sunday—I don't know what time of the day it was. I didn't have a clock. I think it was about 2 o'clock. He came in there, and asked me under my clothes. The Court: Asked you what? A. Asked me a question under my clothes. The Court: Asked you a question under your clothes? A. Yes, sir. I told him I wasn't going to do it, and I said to him that I was going to tell my husband; and he said he didn't care, he was going to take it, and he grabbed hold of me, and I snatched loose and ran in the crib, and he pointed his pistol in there and said he was going to kill me, and he said he would see me again. He pointed his pistol at me then, and said he believed he would kill me, he didn't care. The next time he come was on Tuesday, December 17, 1905. He come up there that time, and told me to open the door, and I wouldn't do it, and he broke it open and come in there, and snatched hold of me and said he was going to kill me. I couldn't do nothing. It was in the house then. He flung me across the bed, and took it, and said, if I owned it, he would kill me. He had a pistol then, and I reckon it was the same pistol. He had it concealed. The sun was about an hour high this time. The Sunday that John went there—after he left, I didn't do nothing but stay there until my husband came, and I told him about it." The plaintiff in error insists that the court had no legal right, after the issue had been joined and evidence submitted, to withdraw the case from the jury without the consent of the accused, and that the withdrawal of the case was prejudicial to the defendant in his trial on the two remaining cases, because it tended to create in the minds of the jury the impression that the court believed the testimony of the prosecutrix, and that the defendant was guilty of all the acts testified to by the prosecutrix. And these acts, of course, constituted the two offenses upon which the defendant was still on trial. The plaintiff in error, therefore, insists that the withdrawal of the case by the court amounted to an intimation of opinion on the part of the court as to the evidence. The court evidently intended to comply with that requirement of law which requires the judges of certain county and city courts, wherever the evidence developed on the trial of a criminal case shows the defendant, if guilty at all, to be guilty of a felony, to suspend the trial and commit or bind over the defendant to the superior court. This was the evident intention of the judge, and the jury might draw from his action the inference that he believed the defendant to be guilty of the graver offense of rape, of which his court had no jurisdiction. And, if they did so believe, the conclusion would be irresistible that the defendant was guilty of the remaining charges which were still on trial, for all of the offenses were included in one transaction, dependent solely on the credibility of the prosecutrix. The action of the court in withdrawing the case, even if proper, was accompanied by such questions and suggestions as did clearly amount to an expression of an opinion that the defendant was guilty of the other two offenses for which he was being tried, and therefore demand the grant of a new trial. The questions asked by the court appear to our mind to be the natural indications of the honest indignation of an upright magistrate, and yet they were wholly immaterial on the question of the defendant's guilt of the offense of carrying a concealed pistol, and of pointing that weapon at the prosecutrix; and likewise the fact elicited by the court that the injured female was at the time of the outrage pregnant could illustrate nothing in the pistol cases, but greatly tended to impress the jury with the idea that the court was deeply moved by the enormity of the outrage which had been committed without question upon the prosecutrix. And, of course, as the prosecutrix had been raped under the most aggravating circumstances, the more aggravating those circumstances appeared, the more odious the defendant became in the eyes of the jury, and the more strongly the truth of the prosecutrix's story was clinched in the minds of the jury. Without regard to any other error assigned, the intimation of opinion on the part of the court conveyed to the jury by these questions is controlled by section 4384 of the Civil Code of 1895, and requires a reversal of the judgment refusing a new trial.

As the complaints with reference to the charge of the court are dependent wholly upon the theory that the presentation to the jury of the prejudicial matters to which we have referred was erroneous, and as it is not possible for this view again to be presented, it is not necessary that they should be considered.

Judgment reversed.

GOLDEN et al. v. STATE (No. 606.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1907.)

1. RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS—ELEMENTS OF CRIME.

"The doctrine seems to be established that in those states in which, by statute or at common law, it is larceny to bring into the state goods stolen in another state or a foreign country, one who there receives goods with knowledge that they have been stolen in another state or country is liable to indictment for receiving the goods. This does not apply, however, in those states in which it is held that bringing into the state goods stolen in another state or foreign country does not constitute larceny; for the goods must have been stolen in the jurisdiction in which it is sought to punish for the receiving."

2. SAME—EVIDENCE.

"Though, after committing larceny in an adjoining state, the thief brings the stolen property into this state and here carries it from place to place in a county of Georgia, he does not commit larceny in this state." Lee v. State, 64 Ga. 203, 37 Am. Rep. 67. It is, therefore, not a crime for one to receive in this state goods stolen in a foreign jurisdiction. Legislation making such receiving criminal is suggested.

Simon Golden and others were convicted of receiving stolen goods, and bring error. Reversed.

E. H. Abrahams and Robt. L. Colding, for plaintiffs in error. W. W. Osborne, Sol. Gen., for the State.

POWELL, J. The defendants were accused of the offense of receiving stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen. It was alleged that the principal thief committed a burglary in Charleston, S. C., stole the goods there, and brought them to the county of Chatham, in this state, where the defendants received them with guilty knowledge. The case comes to us on demurrer to the indictment. "The doctrine seems to be established that in those states in which, by statute or at common law, it is larceny to bring into the state goods stolen in another state or a foreign country, one who there receives goods with knowledge that they have been stolen in another state or country is liable to indictment for receiving the goods. This does not apply, however, in those states in which it is held that bringing into the state goods stolen in another state or foreign country does not constitute larceny; for the goods must have been stolen in the jurisdiction in which it is sought to punish for the receiving." 12 Cyc. 210. By express statutory provisions in some states the offense includes a receiving in one state of property stolen in another. But, in the absence of such provision, proof of a foreign larceny, it is held, will not be sufficient to establish the offense. In a jurisdiction, however, where the bringing by the thief of goods stolen in another jurisdiction is regarded as new larceny in the former, a receiver in that jurisdiction will be liable to indictment. 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 46. See, also, Rorer on Interstate Law (2d Ed.) 309-320. By the decision of the Supreme Court in Lee v. State, 64 Ga. 203, 37 Am. Rep. 67, it is well settled that the bringing into this state of goods stolen in a sister state does not constitute a crime under the laws of this state. It follows, therefore, that a foreign larceny or burglary will not support a conviction of receiving stolen goods, although under the statutes of this state the latter offense is a distinct crime from the larceny. By our Penal Code of 1895 (section 171), "if any person shall buy or receive any goods, chattels, money, or other effects, that shall have been stolen or feloniously taken from another, knowing the same to be stolen or feloniously taken, such person shall be an accessory after the fact, and shall receive the same punishment as would be inflicted on the person convicted of having stolen or feloniously taken the property." The portion of this section which relates to the punishment strengthens the argument that only larcenies and felonious takings that occur in this state are contemplated as respects the principal offender. The courts of this state could not inflict any punishment against the principal felon for his crime committed beyond her borders; and the same punishment as to the accessory after the fact in this view would be no punishment at all. See Edwards v. State, 80 Ga. 127, 4 S. E. 268. We think that the law should be otherwise; but, upon a careful review of the authorities in this country and in England, we are sure that it is not. Many states, recognizing this rule as existing in the absence of express statute to the contrary, have enacted laws making criminal the receiving of goods stolen in another jurisdiction. Georgia should have such a statute, but, until such a law is passed, we must enforce the rule as we find it.

1. LARCENY — AFTER TRUST — EVIDENCE — PLEADING.

In a prosecution for larceny after trust, based on Pen. Code 1895, § 194, it is not necessary to allege or prove that any demand was made for the property alleged to have been fraudulently converted before the indictment was found. Under this section, it is only necessary to allege and prove the bailment, the purpose of the trust, and the fraudulent conversion.

J. B. Goodman was convicted of larceny, and brings error. Affirmed.

Robt. L. Colding and Ralford Falligant, for plaintiff in error. W. W. Osborne, Sol. Gen., for the State.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff in error was convicted of the offense of larceny after trust. The indictment was based on Pen. Code 1895, § 194, and charges that the defendant, "having been intrusted" by one Louise W. Brinkman as administratrix of the estate of C. J. Brinkman, deceased, with certain money, to wit, the sum of $310.97, of the value of $310.97, the property of said administratrix, for the purpose of applying the same for the use and benefit of said owner by safely keeping the same and delivering same over to said owner, did then and there fraudulently convert same to his own use." Other counts in the indictment charge the fraudulent conversion of separate sums of the aggregate amount embraced in the first count. The evidence clearly and fully sustained the allegations of the indictment. The bailment and the purpose of the trust were not denied. The plaintiff in error relied upon two grounds of defense: (1) That no legal demand was made upon him for the money; (2) that the money was intrusted by the prosecutor to the Commercial Collecting Agency, a corporation for whom he was acting in receiving it; and that, if any larceny was committed, it was from said corporation.

1. This indictment was probably based upon section 194 of the Penal Code. It does not allege that any demand was made, and, for a violation of this section, no demand is necessary. The offense is complete when the bailment and the fraudulent conversion are shown. Birt v. State, 1 Ga. App. 150, 57 S. E. 965; Keys v. State, 112 Ga. 392, 37 S. E. 762, 81 Am. St. Rep. 63. The charge of the court that a demand was necessary was more favorable to the defendant than he was entitled to under the statute. Even if a demand as a condition precedent to prosecution was required to be proved, the evidence clearly showed that it was repeatedly made.

2. The undisputed evidence showed that the defendant was carrying on a collection agency. He operated it under the name of the "Commercial Collection Agency." The entire business of the "Agency" was conducted by the defendant and his stenographer. While the receipts for the money were signed by the defendant and his stenographer in the name of the "Com. Col. Agency," the money was all paid to the defendant. There was no proof of any such corporation, nor does the name import corporate existence. Under the evidence, the jury were warranted in the conclusion that there was no such corporation, but that the defendant was, in fact, operating as an individual, under the term "Agency," for some occult purpose. He was intrusted with the money as an individual, he received every dollar of it into his personal possession, and he converted every dollar of it to his own use. It would be a failure of justice to allow him to escape responsibility for his individual fraudulent conversion because he perpetrated his criminal fraud in the name of a mythical corporation. The court properly excluded the oral statement of the stenographer that the "Commercial Collection Agency" was a corporation.

Judgment affirmed.

(2 Ga. App. 438)

JONES et al. v. STATE. (No. 511.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1907.)

1. INDICTMENT—JOINDER OF OFFENSES.

Offenses of the same nature may be joined in one indictment in separate counts.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Indictment and Information, § 420.]

2. SAME.

The offense of "keeping and maintaining a lewd house," and the offense of "keeping a common, ill governed, and disorderly house," may be joined in the same indictment in different counts.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Indictment and Information, §§ 414-418.]

3. DISORDERLY HOUSE—INDICTMENT.

A count in the indictment charging that the defendants "did keep and maintain a common, ill governed, and disorderly house, to the encouragement of idleness, drinking, and other misbehavior," is sufficiently specific, and is not demurrable because it does not definitely set out the acts constituting the "other misbehavior."

4. CRIMINAL LAW—CONFESSIONS.

The law does not favor convictions based upon confessions, and least of all upon implied confessions.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1222-1226.]

5. SAME—ADMISSIONS.

Before testifying tending to show an inference of guilt is admitted to the jury as an implied confession arising from silence when an incriminating statement is made, it should affirmatively appear that such statement was addressed to the defendant, or that he was physically near enough to hear and understand the statement, and that, at the time and place when and where made, it required from him an answer or denial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 898, 899.]

6. SAME.

The verbal statement of the witness alleged to have been made in presence of the defendants did not measure up to the requirements of the law necessary to show an implied confession by silence or acquiescence, and it was error to admit such statement in evidence.

7. DISORDERLY HOUSE—EVIDENCE.

"Reputation of a house being kept and maintained as a lewd house is admissible evidence." Such evidence alone, wholly uncorroborated, is not sufficient to establish the offense of keeping and maintaining a lewd house.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Disorderly House, § 29.]

8. SAME.

The evidence in this case as to the general reputation of the house for lewdness was fully met by proof of the good character of the only two inmates of the house, and the further fact that for 15 years no act or circumstance indicating lewdness or immorality was shown in connection with said house.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Disorderly House, §§ 28-29.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Franklin County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Annie Jones and others were convicted of keeping a disorderly house, and bring error. Reversed.

Jos. N. Worley, for plaintiff in error. S. J. Tribble, Sol. Gen., H. H. Chandler, Sol., and J. B. Jones, for the State.

HILL, C. J. 1. The indictment on which the defendants were tried contains two counts—one under Pen. Code 1895, § 391, "for keeping and maintaining a lewd house," and one under section 393, for "keeping a common, ill governed, and disorderly house." A demurrer was filed to the indictment, on the ground that it contained two separate and distinct counts charging separate and distinct crimes, not kindred in nature, and not committed in the same act and at the same time. It is well settled that different counts charging offenses of the same character may be joined in one indictment in separate counts. Williams v. State, 72 Ga. 180; Hoskins v. State, 11 Ga. 92. We think the two offenses of keeping and maintaining a lewd house, and keeping a common, ill governed, and disorderly house, are offenses of the same nature, and are properly joined in the same indictment under separate counts.

2. The demurrer to the second count on the ground that it charged the defendant with keeping said house for "the encouragement of drinking, idleness, and other misbehavior," without stating what the "other misbehavior" consisted in, was properly overruled. The words "other misbehavior" were surplusage. Brand v. State, 112 Ga. 25, 37 S. E. 100; Hubbard v. State, 123 Ga. 17, 51 S. E. 11. It would be sufficient to support a conviction under this count if the evidence showed that the defendant kept a common, ill governed, and disorderly house, to the encouragement of idleness or drinking.

3. It was shown by the evidence that the two defendants, who were sisters owning and living at said house, had on one occasion during the 15 years of their residence there in fled to a neighbor's for protection from the disorderly conduct of a drunken man who in that condition had entered their house. This witness was allowed to testify, over the objection of defendant's counsel, that this intoxicated man had made in their presence certain incriminating statements which they did not deny. It was shown that this man was very drunk and maudlin, and that the women were greatly frightened by his conduct. The maxim, "Qui tacet, consentire videtur," as held in Rolfe v. Rolfe, 10 Ga. 146, "is to be applied with careful discrimination," and admissions inferred from acquiescence in the verbal statements of others "should always be received with caution, and never ought to be received at all unless the evidence is of direct declarations of that kind which naturally calls for contradiction." We do not think that such testimony is admissible, unless it affirmatively appears that the incriminating statement or declaration was addressed to the defendants and they heard and understood such statement, or were physically near enough to the speaker to hear it, and that under the circumstances a denial was required and none was made. All of these essential facts were not shown; and, in any event, it would be carrying the rule very far to hold that the silence of a frightened woman to the maudlin statement of a drunken man was an implied admission of the truth of such statement. We think the admission of this verbal statement incriminating the defendants, and their failure to contradict it, was erroneous under the circumstances of the case.

4. The defendants were two sisters, living together in a house which they were charged with keeping and maintaining as a lewd house and a disorderly house. They had lived in this house for 15 years. The only testimony against them was as to the general reputation of the house. Several witnesses testified that the house had a bad reputation, and was generally reputed to be a lewd house. To meet this evidence, it was clearly shown that the defendants were women of some means, owned the house in which they lived, and had, besides, other property. It was also shown that the authorities of the town in which the house was located had had this house watched for 10 years, and not one act of lewdness or disorder was discovered in connection therewith, except that during this time on one occasion a woman was seen to kiss a man in the house. It was not shown who this man was, and it was further shown that the women had a brother and other relatives who visited them at their home. During the 15 years in which these women had lived in this house no act of immorality or improper conduct was shown against either one of them, or as taking place in said house. No evidence was offered to prove that the two women were themselves of lewd reputation; and during the entire 15 years only three men were seen to go to said house. The Solicitor General abandoned the count for keeping a disorderly house, but relied upon the count for keeping and maintaining a lewd house; and upon this count the defendants were convicted. The conviction rests alone upon the testimony as to the general reputation of the house for lewdness. There is not one circumstance or fact in corroboration of the testimony as to the general reputation of the house, and every specific fact and circumstance tends to prove that this general reputation was not justified by the real character of the house or of the conduct and character of the two inmates. The Supreme Court, in Hogan v. State, 76 Ga. 82, has held that the reputation of a house being kept and maintained as a lewd house is admissible evidence in the trial of a case for this offense. The Supreme Court did not hold in that case that such evidence alone and uncorroborated was sufficient to support a verdict of guilty; and in that particular case there was other corroborative evidence, such as the lewd character of the women who lived in the house, and that men visited the house for immoral purposes. Many courts in other states have held that evidence of general reputation of the house is inadmissible in support of the charge of keeping a lewd house. Henson v. State, 62 Md. 231, 50 Am. Rep. 204; United States v. Jouridine, 4 Cranch, 338, Fed. Cas. No. 15,499; Handy v. State, 63 Miss. 207, 56 Am. Rep. 803; State v. Plant, 67 Vt. 454, 32 Atl. 237, 48 Am. St. Rep. 821; Nelson v. Territory, 49 Pac. 920, 5 Okl. 512; Wooster v. State, 55 Ala. 217. But, as before stated, the Supreme Court of Georgia in Hogan v. State, supra, only decided that such testimony was admissible, but did not decide that such testimony, without any corroboration, was itself sufficient to prove the charge of keeping and maintaining a lewd house, and of supporting a conviction therefor. The testimony in this case even as to the general reputation of the house was by no means satisfactory as proving such general reputation. Such testimony seems to have been founded upon mere rumors, and not the opinion of character generally entertained by the community. "Mere rumors are, of course, not reputation. Reputation involves a notion of the general estimate of the community as a whole; not what a few persons say or what many say, but what the community generally believes." 1 Gr. Ev. (16th Ed.) 586.

After a careful analysis of the evidence in this record, we are clearly of the opinion that this verdict was without legal evidence to support it, and that a new trial should be granted.

Judgment reversed.

VIRGINIA POCAHONTAS COAL CO. v. LAMBERT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 12, 1907.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—ACTS CAPABLE OF RATIFICATION.

A grantee obtained a conveyance by falsely representing to the grantor that he was the agent of a third person. The conveyance was made to the grantee in his own name, for his own benefit, and the purchase price was paid by his own money. Held, that the third person was not entitled to the benefit of the conveyance on the ground that he had the right to, and did, ratify the purchase.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 40, Principal and Agent, § 622.]

2. TRUSTS—CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS—FRAUD IN PROCURING CONVEYANCE OF REAL ESTATE.

A grantee obtained a conveyance in his own name by falsely representing to the grantor that the conveyance was made for the benefit of a third person, who was in possession of the premises, and the grantor was induced to make the conveyance because of his belief that he was thereby curing defects in former conveyances to the third person. The grantee paid the purchase money out of his own funds. Held, that the grantee was a trustee ex maleficio for the benefit of the third person.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Roanoke County.

Suit by the Virginia Pocahontas Coal Company against George W. Lambert. From a decree for defendant, complainant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

A. A. Phlegar, for appellant. Robertson, Hall & Woods, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. This suit was instituted by the appellant for the purpose of compelling the appellee to convey to it the interests which he had acquired in two parcels of land lying in McDowell county, in the state of West Virginia, one containing 93 and the other 34 acres, by a conveyance from Susan J. Beavers and John Cline and wife, upon the ground that appellee had obtained said conveyance by falsely representing himself as the agent of the appellant.

The record shows that Samuel Lambert died in the year 1851, seised of several parcels of land and leaving seven children. In the partition of his real estate the 93 and 34 acre parcels involved in this suit were allotted to the decedent's daughters, Susan J. Beavers and Martha J. Cline, and his son, Thomas A. Lambert. The latter conveyed his interest to Bartley Rose, from whom by mesne conveyances the same passed to the appellant. In the year 1869 the interest of John Cline in these lands by virtue of his rights as the husband of Martha J. Cline was sold in a creditors' suit to Peter Cline. Afterwards Cline and wife, as they testify, executed a deed for her interest in the land to Alexander Beavers and Bartley Rose, who had acquired the interest sold in the creditors' suit; but this deed was not recorded and has never been found. The interest of Alexander Beavers and Bartley Rose passed by mesne conveyances to, and is now owned by, the appellant. In the year 1867 Susan J. Beavers and her husband, Andrew J. Beavers, undertook to convey their interest in the lands to Alexander Beavers; but, the acknowledgment of the wife being insufficient, as is claimed, her interest did not pass by the deed.

By deeds dated, respectively, February 3, 1902, and March 13, 1902, a tract of 1,969 acres, and by a deed dated October 1st of the same year a tract of a little over 200 acres, were conveyed to the appellant. These parcels of land adjoined each other, and embraced the 93 and the 34 acre parcels of land involved in this suit; but it appears that the appellant did not know that they were so embraced until in March, 1903, and was not informed as to the sources of title to the 93 and 34 acre parcels until August of that year, as the appellant's agents, in examining the title to the 1,969 and the 206 acre parcels, seem to have overlooked the interest of Mrs. Cline, and the defect, or alleged defect, in the deed by which Mrs. Beavers attempted to convey her interest.

By deed dated September 29, 1902, Mrs. Cline and her husband and Mrs. Beavers conveyed to the appellee all their interest in the lands of Samuel Lambert, deceased, consisting of the 93 and the 34 acre parcels and another small tract of land, which latter is not embraced in this litigation. In May, 1903, the appellee gave the appellant a 20-day option to purchase these lands at the price of $200 per acre, and after the option had expired the appellant sought without success to have the same extended. In August of that year the general counsel of the appellant interviewed Mrs. Beavers and Cline and wife, who informed him of their interest in and dealings with the land, and the circumstances under which they had conveyed to the appellee.

The question involved in the first error assigned is whether or not the conveyance made by Cline and wife and Mrs. Beavers was obtained under such circumstances as entitles the appellant to the benefit of the interests thus acquired by the appellee.

The appellant bases its contention that they were so acquired upon two grounds: First, that the appellee made the purchase as the avowed agent of the appellant; and, second, that he became a trustee ex maleficio because of the misrepresentations made to his grantors.

As to the first ground: The evidence satisfactorily shows that the appellee, in obtaining the conveyance of their interests from Mrs. Beavers and Cline and wife, represented that he was the agent of the appellant. This statement was false, and the purchase was made in the appellee's own name, for his own benefit, and the consideration was paid with his own money.

It is settled law that where a stranger holds himself out as the agent of another, and makes a contract or does an act for that other's use or for his benefit, the latter may ratify. But it is equally clear, we think, that where the contract made or the act done was not in that other's name, and was not intended for his use or benefit, there can be no ratification. This would seem to be necessarily so from the meaning of the word "ratify."

"Ratification," says Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, "is an agreement to adopt an act performed by another for us."

"A ratification," says a recent text-book, "by a principal of the acts of an agent can only be effectual between the parties when the act was done by the agent on account of the principal, not on his own account or on account of a third person. Where one buys in his own name for himself, another cannot adopt the act as a principal." 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 1188, 1189. It is said in a note to that work, where numerous authorities are cited, that the rule as stated in the text is that laid down in Year Book 7 Hen. IV, fol. 35, where it was held that if a bailiff take a heriot, claiming property in it himself, the subsequent assent of the lord would not amount to a ratification; but, if he take it as bailiff of the lord, the subsequent assent amounts to a ratification of the bailiff's act.

In the case of Forbes v. Hagman, 75 Va. 168, 178, Judge Burks, who delivered the opinion of the court, in discussing the question of ratification, after stating what had been done in that case (tort), says: "This was a virtual ratification and adoption of what had been done by the agent, on the principle 'omnis ratihabilitio retrotrahitur et mandato priori æquiparatur,' which applies as well to a tort, when done to the use or for the benefit of him who subsequently adopts it, as to a matter of contract. It was said by Lord Coke that 'he that agreeth to a trespass after it is done is no trespasser, unless the trespass was done to his use or for his benefit, and then his agreement subsequent amounteth to a commandment.' 4 Inst. 317. So that the test of liability in such a case is said to be the consideration whether the act was originally intended to be done to the use or for the benefit of the party who is afterwards said to have ratified it. Broom's Leg. Max. 873 (marg.)."

"Chief Justice Tindall," continues Judge Burks, "in Wilson v. Tumman, 6 Man. & G. (46 Eng. C. L. R.) 236, states the rule more fully thus: 'That an act done for another by a person not assuming to act for himself, but for such other person, though without any precedent authority whatever, becomes the act of the principal if subsequently ratified by him, is the known and well-established rule of law.'"

In the case of Garvey v. Jervis, 46 N. Y. 310, 318, 7 Am. Rep. 335, Chief Judge Church, in discussing this question, said:

"It is a familiar rule that the ratification of an unauthorized act of an agent is equal to an original authority. Dunlop's Paley's Agency, 171, note 'a.' But in this case the essential element is wanting, that the act must be done for another. Here it was not so done. The most that can be claimed is that the defendant said he was acting for the plaintiff, which was false. He paid his own money, and in fact acted for himself. He was a stranger to the plaintiff, and of course under no obligation to act for him, and, as we have seen, he deprived the plaintiff of nothing to which he was entitled. No authority has been cited, and I think it is safe to say that none exists, in which any court has ever held that a false declaration of agency for another enables the latter, as against the alleged agent, to receive the benefit of an act actually performed for the latter, unless it was performed under such circumstances as to create an estoppel, or unless the assumed principal has been deprived of some legal right, or otherwise injured." See, also, Phil. W. & B. R. R. Co. v. Cowell, 28 Pa. 329, 70 Am. Dec. 128, 130.

It is clear, as it seems to us, under the authorities and upon principle, that the appellant is not entitled to the benefit of the conveyance to the appellee upon the ground that it had the right to, and did, ratify the purchase of the lands acquired by him.

This brings us to the consideration of the question whether the purchase was made under such circumstances as to constitute the appellee a trustee ex maleficio for the benefit of the appellant.

While the evidence is conflicting as to the representations made by the appellee in obtaining the conveyance from Mrs. Beavers and Cline and wife, it clearly appears, from the whole testimony and from the circumstances surrounding the transaction, that he made the impression upon the grantors that he was not purchasing for himself, but for the coal company, which claimed to be the owner of the land and was in possession thereof, and that they were induced to make the conveyance because of their belief that in so conveying they were curing defects in former conveyances of the same land made by them. In other words, the record establishes the fact that the appellee secured the conveyance by causing his vendors to believe that it was made to cure defects in their former conveyances. Where a conveyance is procured under these circumstances, the grantee under settled equitable principles is held to be a mere trustee for the party really intended to be benefited by the grantor.

"In general," says Pomeroy on Eq. Jur. § 1053, "whenever the legal title to property, real or personal, has been obtained through actual fraud, misrepresentations, concealments, or through undue influence, duress, taking advantage of one's weakness or necessities, or through any other similar means, or under any other similar circumstances, which rendered it unconscientious for the holder of the legal title to retain and enjoy the beneficial interest, equity impresses a constructive trust on the property thus acquired in favor of the one who is truly and equitably entitled to the same, although he may never, perhaps, have had any legal estate therein. * * *

Perry on Trusts, § 181, says that "if a person by his promises, or by any fraudulent conduct, with a view to his own profit, prevents a deed or will from being made in favor of a third person, and the property intended for such third person afterwards comes to him who fraudulently prevented the execution of the will or deed, he will be held to be a trustee for the person defrauded to the extent of the interest intended for him."

In 15 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) p. 1188, it is said: "So, also, if one, though not in fact the agent of another, pretends to act as his agent and thereby secures title in his own name to property in which such other has an interest, he cannot deny that he was acting as agent and claim the benefit of the purchase, but will hold the title so acquired in trust."

In the case of Rollins v. Mitchell, 52 Minn. 41, 53 N. W. 1020, 38 Am. St. Rep. 519, it was held (Mitchell, J., delivering the opinion of the court) that one who obtains a conveyance of land from a former owner by fraudulently giving him to understand that it is for the purpose of supporting an earlier defective conveyance, and thus validating the title of one who claimed thereunder, is a trustee ex maleficio for the latter, and that in such case the rights of the cestui que trust do not depend upon the existence of a fiduciary relation in regard to the title between him and the fraudulent grantee, nor upon the fact that he has some legal claim to the land which he could have enforced against the original owner thereof.

In the case of Harold v. Bacon, 36 Mich. 1, it was held that a deed fraudulently obtained from one who had before conveyed to another by a deed not of record, by false representations that it was being procured by and for the protection of the party holding under such prior unrecorded deed, did not vest in the grantee any title as against the real party for whose benefit the grantor undertook and designed to make the grant, and that such fraudulent grantee was a mere trustee for the party really intended by the grantor to be benefited.

We are of opinion that the appellee holds the property or interests acquired from Mrs. Beavers and Oline and wife in trust for the benefit of the appellant, and that the circuit court erred in not so decreeing.

The decree complained of must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

CHILDRESS v. JORDAN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 12, 1907.)

SET-OFF—EQUITABLE SET-OFF.

W., having purchased his partner's interest and given his note therefor, with a deed of trust on the property, and assumed payment of a partnership liability to a third person, thereafter sold to such former partner horses and mules included in the deed of trust at an aggregate sum sufficient to have satisfied the secured debt, if all of it had been applied to its payment. W. having failed to pay the debt due the third person, and being admittedly insolvent, his former partner paid the same by applying a sufficient amount of his indebtedness to W. arising from the purchase of the horses and mules. Defendant in the meantime purchased of W. certain of the trust property, and, having refused to pay the trustee the purchase money, the latter brought suit to recover the property or its value. Held, that W.'s partner was entitled to set off in equity the firm debt, which, because of the insolvency of W., he was compelled to pay, against his indebtedness to W., leaving the property purchased by defendant subject to the trust deed.

Error to Circuit Court, Montgomery County.

Action by Robert L. Jordan, trustee, against James S. Childress. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

A. A. Phlegar, for appellant. Longley & Jordan, for appellee.

WHITTLE, J. The narrow question presented by this record for decision involves the correctness of the ruling of the circuit court in sustaining the application by Cowan of a certain payment in discharge of what we shall term the "Carper debt." The essential facts are as follows:

Wilson and Cowan were partners as liverymen, and the former purchased the latter's interest in the business for $800, giving his note therefor, with a deed of trust on the property as security, and also assuming payment (among other partnership liabilities) of the Carper debt, which amounted to $315. In February, 1906, Cowan purchased of Wilson horses and mules included in the deed of trust at the aggregate price of $870, a sum sufficient to have satisfied the secured debt, if all of it had been applied to its payment. Wilson, who was admittedly insolvent, failed to pay the Carper debt, and the firm note was protested, and subsequently paid by Cowan June 22, 1906. In April, 1906, the plaintiff in error, Childress, bought from Wilson the trust property described in the declaration, and, having refused to pay the defendant in error, Jordan, trustee, the purchase money, the latter brought suit to recover the property, or its alternate value.

Though the action was in detinue, the parties waived a jury and submitted their rights to the court to be determined, as if the proceeding had been a suit in equity. Thereupon the court sanctioned the dedication by Cowan of a sufficient amount of the money due on his indebtedness to Wilson to discharge the Carper debt, leaving a balance due from Wilson to Cowan of $403.59. The court also fixed the value of the property bought by Childress at $350, and rendered judgment in behalf of the plaintiff against him for that sum, to which judgment Childress brings error.

We are of opinion that, upon the foregoing facts, Cowan was entitled in equity to protection against the Carper debt out of his indebtedness to Wilson. Courts of equity always recognize the influence of insolvency on the rights of parties touching the matter of set-offs, and in adjusting transactions between them will regard the equities of the solvent party, and so accommodate their affairs as to minimize, as far as consistent with the rights of third persons, loss from that cause.

The principle is illustrated by text-writers and numerous adjudged cases. The decisions of this court on the subject will be found in notes to the case of Feazle v. Dillard, 5 Leigh (Va. Rep. Ann.) 21. In the principal case Feazle was permitted, in equity, to set off the amount of a bond on which he was surety for Dillard, who was insolvent, against his own bond to Dillard in the hands of an assignee, though not due, he having become surety before notice of the assignment.

So, in this case, Cowan's liability to pay the Carper debt having attached before the rights of Childress accrued, his superior equity must prevail.

We are of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

MORGAN v. HALEY.

1. PARTITION—ACTIONS FOR PARTITION—NATURE OF REMEDY.

Though a suit for partition, under Code 1887, § 2562 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1310], cannot be made a substitute for an action of ejectment, yet a court of equity has jurisdiction to partition land, though defendant claims title to the whole tract, where he or those under whom he claims title had joint ownership with complainant or those under whom he claims title.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 38, Partition, § 53.]

2. JUDGMENT—CONCLUSIVENESS—MATTERS CONCLUDED—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

A court of equity having the power to determine whether the case made by a bill for partition as authorized by Code 1887, § 2562 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1310], is within its jurisdiction or was in reality an action of ejectment, and having determined that question in favor of its right to exercise the jurisdiction invoked, its decree, even though erroneous, is not void, and hence cannot be collaterally attacked.

3. COVENANTS—BREACH—EVICTION.

Where, in an action of partition against a covenantor, it was decreed that complainant therein had a paramount title to an undivided one-sixth, that it was impracticable to partition the land, and that the same be sold, thereby compelling the covenantor to become the purchaser, as she did, or surrender the premises to another, who should become a purchaser, there was such an eviction as to constitute a breach of covenant of warranty.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Covenants, § 157.]

4. SAME—NOTICE TO MAINTAIN OR DEFEND TITLE.

Notice alone by a covenantor to a covenantor of a suit brought against said covenantor to recover the land is insufficient to make such suit conclusive on the covenantor when sued on his covenant of warranty, but said covenantor must also be requested to appear and defend.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Covenants, §§ 222, 223.]

5. SAME—ACTION FOR BREACH—DAMAGES—COUNSEL FEES.

Counsel fees incurred by a covenantor in defense of the suit for her eviction cannot be recovered in an action for breach of the covenant of warranty.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Covenants, § 261.]

Error from Circuit Court, Lee County.

Action by Frances Haley against John D. Morgan. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

Pennington Bros., for plaintiff in error. Orr & Noel and Duncan & Oridlin, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. John D. Morgan, the plaintiff in error, sold and conveyed a tract of land to Sanders Spurlock, with covenants of general warranty; and Spurlock sold and conveyed the same to Frances Haley, the defendant in error, who instituted this her action of covenant against Morgan to recover damages for the loss of a portion of the land by title paramount, as alleged in her declaration.

The first error assigned in the petition, and which raised the question as to the proper method of declaring on a lost deed, was waived in oral argument.

The second assignment of error is to the action of the court in admitting in evidence a copy of a deed, because it was not properly certified by the clerk of the court in whose office it was recorded.

The copy was attested as follows: "A copy. Teste: R. C. T. Ewing, Clerk."

If the certificate had stated that the person making it was clerk of the court in whose office the deed was recorded, or had used initials to show that fact, under the decisions of Gibson v. Commonwealth, 2 Va. Cas. 111, 120, Wynn v. Harman, 5 Grat. (Va.) 157, 165, 166, and Usher v. Pride, 15 Grat. 190, 195, 196, it would clearly have been prima facie sufficient. But whether in its present form it was admissible in evidence it is unnecessary to decide, as the judgment complained of will have to be reversed on other grounds and the case remanded for a new trial, when this question is not likely to arise again, as the defect in the certificate, if it be one, can easily be cured.

The trial court permitted the record in the chancery cause of Lula M. Postlewaite against the defendant in error to be introduced in evidence for the purpose of showing the latter's eviction from that portion of the land for the loss of which she seeks to recover damages in this case. That action of the court is assigned as error, upon the ground, first, that the court which tried that cause was without jurisdiction; and, second, that the record does not show such eviction.

The ground relied on to show that the court was without jurisdiction to hear and determine that cause (which was a suit for partition) is that the defendant in error, who was the defendant in that suit, claimed title to the whole tract of land sought to be partitioned, not as joint owner with the plaintiff in that suit, but by an independent adversary title.

It is quite true, as argued, that a suit for partition under the provisions of section 2562, Code 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 1310], cannot be made a substitute for an action of ejectment (Pillow v. Southwest, etc., Imp. Co., 92 Va. 144, 148, 23 S. E. 32, 53 Am. St. Rep. 804); but it is equally true that a court of equity has jurisdiction to partition land under some circumstances, although the defendant claims title to the whole tract, where he (or those under whom he claims title) was a joint owner with the complainant or those under whom he claims title. See Pillow v. Southwest, etc., Imp. Co., supra.

Whether or not such facts and circumstances were alleged and proved in the partition suit of Postlewaite v. Haley as gave the court the right to try the question of title in that suit, under section 2562 of the Code, was a question to be decided in that cause. The court which heard and decided it had the power to determine whether or not the case made by the bill was within the jurisdiction of a court of equity, and, having proceeded in the case to a final decree, must of necessity have determined that question in favor of its right to exercise the jurisdiction invoked. It may have erred in its decision, but such error would not make its action void. The decree would only be erroneous at most, but conclusive until reversed or vacated. In this case neither the circuit court nor this court could determine whether or not that case was one of equitable jurisdiction without an inquiry into the facts, and, where inquiry is necessary, the decree, however erroneous, is not void, and cannot, therefore, be collaterally assailed. Lemmon v. Herbert, 92 Va. 653, 655-658, 24 S. E. 249, and authorities cited.

The other ground of objection to the introduction of that record in evidence is that it did not show the eviction of the defendant in error from the land to which the court held that the complainant in that cause had the paramount title.

It appears from the record in that cause that the court decreed that the complainant had a paramount title to an undivided sixth interest in the land sought to be partitioned, that it was impracticable to partition the land in kind and lay off that interest, that the same was directed to be sold, that it was sold by a special commissioner to the defendant in error at public auction, and that the sale was reported to the court and confirmed. While there was no actual eviction of the defendant in error, she was compelled under the decree of the court to purchase that interest or surrender the possession thereof to such other person as might become the purchaser.

It is always necessary, in order to maintain an action for the breach of covenant of warranty, that there shall be an eviction, and generally there must be an actual eviction; but sometimes a constructive eviction is sufficient. One class of cases where constructive eviction is sufficient is where the premises are in the actual possession of a third party under a paramount title at the date of the conveyance. In such a case the covenantee can maintain his action, although he has never been in possession of and actually evicted from the land. Sheffey v. Gardiner, 79 Va. 313, and authorities cited.

Another class of cases, under "the head of constructive eviction," says Rawle on Covenants for Title (5th Ed.) § 142, "is that which holds that an eviction will be caused by the covenantee having compulsorily purchased or taken a lease under the paramount title, without any actual change of possession, both in cases where the validity of such title has been established by judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction and under certain circumstances where it has not been established."

While the cases are not in accord on this question, the weight of modern authority and the better reason is in favor of the rule as stated by Rawle at least to the extent that a covenantee may maintain an action for breach of covenant of warranty where he has been compelled to purchase the paramount title, when the validity of such title has been established by the judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction and ordered to be sold at public auction; for in such a case the covenantee has the right to presume that if he does not become the purchaser he will be evicted by or for the benefit of the person who does purchase at such sale. Whitney v. Dinsmore, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 124; Rawle on Covenants for Title, § 143; 11 Cyc. 1128, 1129; 8 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 108; Hafey's Heirs v. Birchetts, 11 Leigh (Va.) 83, 88, 89.

The next assignment of error is to the action of the court in instructing the jury as to the character of the notice required to be given to the covenantor when suit is brought against his covenantee to recover the land, in order that the proceedings in that suit shall be conclusive upon the covenantor when sued upon his covenant of warranty.

The trial court was of opinion, and so instructed the jury, that notice given to the plaintiff in error by the defendant in error, or her agent or attorney, of the pendency of the suit and of the claim asserted therein, in time to defend the same, was sufficient to render the proceedings in that case conclusive upon the plaintiff in error.

The question involved in this assignment of error has not been passed upon by this court in any reported case. In some jurisdictions it is held that where suit is brought on a paramount claim against one who is entitled to the benefit of any of the covenants for title, and especially, it would seem, of the covenant of warranty, he can, by giving proper notice of the action to the party bound by the covenants and requesting him to defend it, relieve himself from the burden of being compelled afterwards to prove, in an action on the covenants, the validity of the title of the adverse claimant. In other jurisdictions, in order to relieve himself of that burden, it is only necessary for the party sued to give proper notice of the pendency of such action, without calling upon the party bound to defend the suit.

Mr. Rawle, in his work on Covenants for Title (5th Ed., §§ 117 to 125), upon a review of the cases, reaches the conclusion that the weight of authority is in favor of the view that there must not only be a distinct and unequivocal notice of the suit given to the party bound by the covenants, but he must also be requested to appear and defend it. And this would seem to be the better doctrine, upon reason as well as upon authority. No one, it would seem, on familiar principles, ought to be bound by a proceeding to which he is not a party actually or constructively. The covenantor is not actually a party. If upon mere notice of the suit he would be authorized to come in and assume the conduct of the defense, so far as proof of his own title was concerned, there might be, as was said in Brown v. Taylor, 13 Vt. 631, 37 Am. Dec. 618, "some reason for holding him bound by such knowledge. But without the assent of the defendant in the suit he has no such authority. It is res inter alios acta, and, if he should apply to the court for permission to defend, the defendant not having voluntarily offered it, the answer would be that he had no occasion to do so, since his rights could not be affected by the judgment." If he appears and is permitted to make defense, he is, of course, bound by the proceedings, or if properly notified and requested by the defendant to make defense, and he fails to do so, there is no hardship in holding him bound by the proceedings in the suit. He had notice, and the right to appear and defend his title, and if he did not do so it was manifestly his own fault. 7 Rob. Pr. 150, 151.

The action of the court in holding that the defendant in error had the right to recover as part of her damages the fee ($50) she paid her attorneys in the partition suit is assigned as error.

Neither has this question been passed upon by this court, so far as the reported cases show. In other jurisdictions the decisions of the courts are not in accord. In some, it is held that counsel fees cannot be recovered as part of the damages for breach of covenant of warranty; in others, that they may, provided the covenantor has been required to defend and has failed to do so; and in still others, that they are recoverable whenever the covenantor does not employ counsel to defend, the fact of notice or want of notice to defend being immaterial. Rawle on Cov. for Title, §§ 197 to 200, and cases cited.

Since the decision in the case of Threlkeld v. Fitzhugh, 2 Leigh, 451, the settled doctrine in this state has been that the purchaser of land upon eviction is only entitled to the purchase price paid, with interest from the date of eviction and the costs expended by him in the action in which he was evicted. Click v. Green, 77 Va. 827, 835; Conrad v. Effinger, 87 Va. 59, 12 S. E. 2, 24 Am. St. Rep. 648. The term "costs" has a well-defined legal meaning, and means those expenses incurred by parties in prosecuting or defending a suit, action, or other proceeding at law or in equity, recognized and allowed by law, and taxed against the losing party. 5 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 106, and cases cited.

The law, as a general rule, measures the expenses incurred in the management of a suit by the taxable costs. The taxable costs are the costs contemplated by those decisions, as we understand them, and not the other expenses incurred in defending the action in which the covenantee was evicted, however great they may have been. There would seem to be no more reason for allowing expenses incurred in the employment of counsel as a part of the covenantee's damages for breach of covenant of warranty than expenses incurred in visiting and conferring with counsel, finding and interviewing witnesses, and in performing all the other duties necessary in preparing the case for trial.

In the case of Wisecarver v. Wisecarver, 97 Va. 452, 34 S. E. 56, it was held that in an action on an injunction bond, with condition "to pay all such costs as may be awarded against the plaintiff and all such damages as shall be incurred in case said injunction be dissolved," fees paid to counsel in the injunction suit could not be recovered as damages, although the bill was a pure bill of injunction. One of the reasons given for refusing to allow the fee as damages in that case was (quoting from the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Oelrichs v. Spain, 15 Wall. [U. S.] 211, 21 L. Ed. 43) that "there is no fixed standard by which the honorarium can be measured. Some counsel demand much more than others. Some clients are willing to pay more than others. More counsel may be employed than are necessary. When both client and counsel know that the fees are to be paid by the other party, there is danger of abuse. A reference to a master or an issue to a jury might be necessary to ascertain the proper amount, and this grafted litigation might possibly be more animated and protracted than that in the original cause. It would be an office of some delicacy on the part of the court to scale down the charges, as might sometimes be necessary. We think the principle of disallowance rests on a solid foundation, and that the opposite rule is forbidden by the analogies of the law and sound public policy."

That reasoning applies with equal force against the allowance of attorney's fees in this case. We are of opinion that the sound, simple, and more satisfactory rule is to deny the right to recover counsel fees as part of the damages and to confine the right of recovery to the fees allowed by statute and taxed in the costs of the action in which the covenantee is evicted.

It follows, from what has been said, that the judgment complained of must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial, to be had not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. v. JORDAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 12, 1907.)

1. COUNTIES — COUNTY TREASURER — BOND — LIABILITY OF SURETY — CONCLUSIVENESS OF SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNT.

A settlement made by a county treasurer under Code 1887, § 862 [Va. Code 1904, p. 408], requiring the treasurer at the July meeting of the board of supervisors, or as soon thereafter as may be, to settle with the board his accounts, is only prima facie evidence of the balance in his hands at the date of such settlement against a surety on his bond, conditioned that he should faithfully discharge the duties of his office, but not containing any contract of indemnity.

2. INJUNCTION — JURISDICTION — SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS — INADEQUATE REMEDY AT LAW.

Proceedings by notice and motion by a county treasurer to recover money alleged to be due the county from his predecessor may be enjoined by the surety of such predecessor, and the surety permitted to make his defense in a court of equity; the case being a proper one for equitable cognizance, though the surety might be able to make its defense at law.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County.
Bill by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company against E. O. Jordan, treasurer, and others. Decree for defendants, and complainant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

T. L. Massie, for appellant. Jno. S. Draper, S. W. Williams, D. S. Pollock, and Selden Longley, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. H. L. Stone was treasurer of Pulaski county from the year 1890 until the year 1900, during which time he executed six bonds, with different sets of sureties. The last of these bonds was executed July 5, 1899, with the appellant as his surety, for the remainder of the term commencing July 1st of that year, in lieu of a bond executed on the 5th day of June, 1899.

By section 862 of the Code of 1887 [Va. Code 1904, p. 408] it is provided that the treasurer shall receive the county levy in the manner required for the receipt of state revenues, and shall at the July meeting of the board of supervisors, or as soon thereafter as may be, settle with the board his accounts for that year.

Stone made settlements each year he was treasurer until November 3, 1899, when he made his last settlement with the supervisors. For the year beginning July 1, 1899, and ending June 30, 1900, and from July 1, 1900, until October of that year, when he resigned, being a defaulter, no settlement was made by him with the supervisors. These various settlements showed balances in his hands due the county on account of roads, schools, and county levies. According to the settlement of November 3, 1899, there was a large balance due on these several accounts.

To recover the moneys due the county from Stone when he resigned as treasurer, the appellee, Jordan, who succeeded him in office, was proceeding by notices and motions when the appellant instituted this suit, in which Jordan was enjoined from prosecuting the said motions. Upon a hearing of the cause the circuit court held that the settlement of November 3, 1899, showed the amount due from Stone to the county and in his hands as treasurer as of that date, and that such settlement was conclusive upon the appellant, his surety, at the time that settlement was made, and so decreed. That action of the court is assigned as error.

It is conceded that the settlement was prima facie evidence against the appellant, and it is further conceded, as we understand the argument of the appellant's counsel, that the ruling complained of is in accord with the decision of the Special Court of Appeals in Baker v. Preston, reported in Gilmer, 235. But it is insisted that that decision was wrong in principle and has been repeatedly discredited, and in fact overruled, by this court.

That case has been criticised by members of this court, but it has never been directly overruled, and the circuit court no doubt, as is argued, felt that it was its duty to follow it.

In that case, which was a motion by the Treasurer of the state against a former Treasurer who had defaulted and the sureties on his bond, it was held that the books kept by the Treasurer were conclusive evidence of the balance actually in the treasury at any time, both against the Treasurer and his sureties, so as to charge them with balances carried forward from year to year, as if those balances were actually in hand. The conclusion in that case was based upon the assumption that a judgment against the principal concludes his sureties, and for that reason the evidence on which such judgment was rendered ought also to conclude them.

In the case of Munford v. Overseers of Poor, 2 Rand. 313, Judge Green said that the question how far sureties are bound by a judgment or other evidence against their principal which estops or concludes him had never, so far as he was informed, been settled in this court, except in the case of Baker v. Preston and His Sureties, and that neither of the cases relied on in that case to show that a judgment against the principal was conclusive upon his sureties sustain that conclusion.

In the case of Jacobs v. Hill, 2 Leigh, 393, it was held that a judgment confessed by the sheriff with the assent of his deputy against the sheriff for the deputy's default, but without the knowledge of the latter's sureties, was ample evidence of the fact of the deputy's default, and charged his sureties, unless disproved by them. That decision was understood by Judge Tucker as holding that the judgment was only prima facie correct, and not conclusive against the sureties (Henrico Justices v. Turner, 6 Leigh, 116); but Judge Moncure, in Crawford v. Turk, 24 Grat. 176, 184, in construing what was decided in Jacobs v. Hill, said: "The proceeding was upon the official bond of a deputy sheriff, which was to some extent an indemnifying bond, and somewhat, though not precisely, like the bond in this case. It was not necessary to decide, and was not decided in that case, that the judgment against the sheriff was not conclusive against the sureties of the deputy; but it was sufficient to decide, as it was decided, that said judgment was prima facie evidence against them. The remark of Judge Carr, in delivering the opinion of the court, that 'this we think was ample evidence of the fact and charged his sureties, unless disproved by them,' was extrajudicial as to the concluding words 'unless disproved by them,' and seems in that respect to have been made without adverting to the distinction noticed by Judge Green as before mentioned" (in the case of Munford v. Overseers, etc., supra).

In the case of Henrico Justices v. Turner, supra, it was held that a verdict and judgment against an executor or administrator were not conclusive evidence against his surety. President Tucker, who dissented in part in that case, said, in discussing the decision in Baker v. Preston, that it turned upon the conclusiveness of the books of the treasurer, and not upon any previous verdict or judgment against the principal, though Judge Roane relied on the two cases just cited (Braxton v. Winslow, 1 Wash. 31, and Greensides v. Benson, 3 Atk. 248) to sustain his opinion. "That opinion," he continues, "has not been very acceptable to the profession. It was most ably combated at the time by one of the most distinguished judges of the General Court, then sitting as a member of the Special Court of Appeals which decided the cause." Judge Tucker's conclusion was that it was doubtful whether the decision in Baker v. Preston could be sustained upon any ground.

We have been cited to no other decision of this court, nor have we found one in our investigation, which refers to Baker v. Preston.

In Cox v. Thomas, 9 Grat. 312, 322, Board of Supervisors v. Dunn, 27 Grat. 608, and Carr v. Meade, 77 Va. 142, records showing the liability of the principal to which the sureties were not parties were held to be prima facie evidence against the sureties.

In the case of Crawford v. Turk, 24 Grat. 176, which was an action by a sheriff against his deputy and the latter's sureties for his default, a judgment rendered against the sheriff in an action for the deputy's default, at the trial of which the deputy was present and took part in the defense, was held conclusive, not only against the deputy, but his sureties, who had no notice of the proceeding in which the judgment was rendered. But the bond in that case provided, not only that the deputy should faithfully discharge the duties of his office, but should also indemnify and save harmless the sheriff and all other persons from all loss and damage arising from his conduct as deputy; and upon this latter provision or condition the conclusion reached in that case was largely, if not entirely, based.

A settlement made under the provisions of section 862 of the Code of 1887, ascertaining what balances due the county are in the hands of the treasurer at the date of the settlement, may be of equal, but is of no higher, dignity than a judgment rendered against the treasurer in a proceeding against him for the same indebtedness. The general rule is that judgments bind conclusively parties and privies, because privies, whether in blood, in estate, or in law, claim under the person against whom the judgment is so rendered, and, as they claim his rights, they are, of course, bound as he is. But as a general rule a judgment is not conclusive upon other persons, because it would be unjust to bind one by a proceeding in which he had no opportunity to make defense, and in which he could not appeal if dissatisfied with the judgment rendered therein. See Munford v. Overseers, etc., of Nottoway Co., 2 Rand.

313, 318; Stinchcomb v. Marsh, 15 Grat. 202, 204; Downer v. Morrison, 2 Grat. 250; note 2 Smith's Lead Cas. (5th Ed.) 683.

The true view of the law would seem to be, and the older decisions so hold, that sureties are not regarded in any sense as in privity with their principal. Munford v. Overseers, etc., supra; 2 Smith's Lead. Cas. 685; 7 Rob. Pr. 142 et seq. But in the later cases (our own, as well as those of other jurisdictions) it is held that an engagement by one man to be responsible for another creates such privity between them as to render a recovery against the latter prima facie evidence against the former. 2 Smith's Lead. Cas. 685, and cases cited; Cox v. Thomas, supra; Board of Sup. v. Dunn, supra; Carr v. Meade, supra.

While the general rule is, as stated, that none are conclusively bound by a judgment except those who were parties or standing in privity with those who were, there are exceptions to the rule as well settled as the rule itself. Baylor v. De Jarnette, 13 Grat. 152, 164.

Among the well-settled exceptions to the general rule, in which parties are conclusively bound by judgments in proceedings to which they are not parties, are cases of contracts of indemnity, or in the nature of contracts of indemnity, or in those cases in which a person, although not in form a party to the suit, is bound to assist in the prosecution or defense, and either does so in fact or, when called upon to prosecute or defend, as the case may be, fails to do so. See Munford v. Overseers, etc., supra; Crawford v. Turk, supra; 2 Smith's Lead Cas. 685, 686; 7 Rob. Pr. 150-152; Morgan v. Haley (decided at this term of the court) 58 S. E. 564.

None of the bonds executed by Stone were bonds of indemnity, nor in the nature of contracts of indemnity. The condition in each was that he should faithfully discharge the duties of his office or trust. We are of opinion, therefore, that the settlements made by Stone, treasurer, with the board of supervisors, were not conclusive, but only prima facie evidence of the balance in his hands at the date of said settlements, respectively.

Having reached the conclusion that the settlements made by Stone, treasurer, under the provisions of section 862 of the Code, were only prima facie evidence against the sureties on his bonds at the date of such settlements, respectively, we are of opinion that the appellant, under the allegations of its bill, had the right to have the proceedings at law enjoined, in order that it might make its defense in a court of equity.

It may be that the appellant might have been able to make its defense at law; but it seems plain that its remedy there would have been far less adequate and complete than in equity, where all necessary accounts could be taken and the rights of all concerned ascertained and determined in a single suit. See National L. Ass'n v. Hopkins, 97 Va. 167, 171, 33 S. E. 539; Va. Min. Co. v. Wilkinson, 92 Va. 98, 100, 22 S. E. 839.

Most of the questions raised in this case were not passed upon by the circuit court, because, in the view it took of the conclusiveness of the treasurer's settlements as to his sureties, it was unnecessary to do so. This court having reached a different conclusion as to the effect of his settlements, those questions become material; and as the oral and the written arguments here were, for the most part, devoted to the discussion of the effect of said settlements, and but comparatively little attention paid to the other questions, this court is of opinion that it would be better for all parties in interest for it not to pass upon any of the questions involved in this appeal, except the effect of such settlements and the jurisdiction of the court, but to leave all other questions open and remand the cause to the circuit court for further proceedings, where all the other questions, most of which depend largely upon matters of fact, can be carefully considered after full argument, and where, if error has been or be committed, there will be a better opportunity to have it corrected than there is in this court, whose decisions are final unless the error is discovered within the time allowed for a rehearing.

We are of opinion, therefore, to reverse the decree appealed from and remand the cause for further proceedings, to be had not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

LIQUID CARBONIC CO. v. NORFOLK & W. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 12, 1907.)

CARRIERS—LIMITING LIABILITY—CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES—NOTICE.

A stipulation in a bill of lading of a carrier that, unless claims for damages are made within 30 days, the carrier shall not be liable in any event, does not exonerate the carrier from negligence, in violation of Va. Code 1904, § 1294, providing that no contract shall exempt any carrier from liability, and is a reasonable regulation, and the failure to present a claim for damages within the time prescribed relieves the carrier from liability.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 670.]

Error to Circuit Court, Wise County.

Action by the Liquid Carbonic Company against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Vicars & Peery, for appellant. E. M. Fulton and C. T. Duncan, for appellee.

KEITH, P. This was an action brought in the circuit court of Wise county by the Liquid Carbonic Company, a corporation, to recover from the Norfolk & Western Railway Company for damage to certain goods which the defendant railway company, as a common carrier, undertook to transport from Pittsburgh, Pa., and to deliver to the plaintiff at Coeburn, one of its stations in Wise county, Va.

The bill of lading contained among other provisions the following condition: "Claims for loss or damage must be made in writing to the agent at point of delivery promptly after arrival of the property, and if delayed for more than 30 days after the delivery of the property, or after due time for the delivery thereof, no carrier hereunder shall be liable in any event."

Claim was not made in accordance with this stipulation, nor do we find in the record any evidence of waiver, or other cause why the defendant should not have relied upon it. The question fairly presented, then, is: Does it present a defense to this action?

There was a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff in the court below obtained a writ of error from this court; and its petition contains several assignments of error, but also states that "It is unnecessary to discuss in detail all of the foregoing assignments of error, because if the fourth assignment be well taken the judgment complained of must be reversed, and if it is not well taken the other assignments of error are immaterial." We shall, therefore, confine our consideration to this assignment, which brings up for review instruction A, given on behalf of defendant in error, as follows: "The court instructs the jury that unless they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, or some one for it, did within 30 days after the delivery of the goods in question to Dingus & Kelly make claim for its (plaintiff's) alleged damages, and deliver such claim in writing to the agent of the defendant railroad company at Coeburn, Va., they shall find for the defendant."

By section 12941 of the Code of 1904 it is provided: "Whenever any property is received by a common carrier to be transferred from one place to another, within or without this state, or when a railroad or other transportation company issues its receipt or bills of lading in this state, the common carrier, railroad or transportation company issuing such bill of lading shall be liable for any loss or damage or injury to such property caused by its negligence or the negligence of any common carrier, railroad or transportation company operating within any territory or state of the United States to which such property may be delivered, or over whose lines such property may pass; and the fact of loss or damage in such case shall itself be prima facie evidence of negligence, and the common carrier, railroad or transportation company issuing any such receipt or bill of lading shall be entitled to recover in a proper action the amount of any loss, damage or injury it may be required to pay to the owner of such property from the common carrier, railroad or transportation company aforesaid through whose negligence the loss, damage or injury may be sustained. No contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt any such common carrier, railroad or transportation company from the liability of a common carrier which would exist had no contract been made or entered into."

There is a class of cases which holds that such a provision as that under consideration, while generally valid in those states not having a statute or statutes prohibiting the limitation of the common-law liability, is of no avail as against a statute which prohibits any limitation of the common-law liability.

In 6 Cyc. pp. 505, 506, it is said: "It is usual to insert in bills of lading, or other contracts for shipment, a stipulation that written notice of a claim for loss of or damage to the goods shall be given to the agents of the carrier within some specified time, such as 30 or 90 days, and that unless such notice is given there will be no liability on the part of the carrier, and such stipulations are generally upheld so far as they are found to be reasonable. Cases holding such stipulations to be invalid are usually based on the ground that the terms thereof are unreasonable, rather than on the general invalidity of such conditions. But they are regarded as limitations of the carrier's liability, and therefore as ineffectual against a claim for loss or injury due to the carrier's negligence, and also as invalid where limitation of common-law liability is prohibited by statute." Cases are cited from several states in support of the text.

On the other hand, Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 442, says: "It is frequently the custom for the carrier to insert in the contract of shipment a condition that, in the event of loss, the owner shall give notice of his claim within a specified time. Such conditions are usually to the effect that the notice shall be in writing and presented to some officer or agent of the carrier, either before the goods are removed from the point of destination, or within a certain time thereafter, or within a designated time after the loss has occurred; and when such conditions are reasonable the owner will be precluded from the right to maintain an action against the carrier unless he has presented the notice within the time stated and in the manner provided. The object of conditions of this character, it is said, is to enable the carrier, while the occurrence is recent, to better inform himself of what the actual facts occasioning the loss or injury were, and thus protect himself against claims which might be made upon him after such a lapse of time as to frequently make it difficult, if not impossible, for him to ascertain their truth. It is just, therefore, that the owner, when a loss or injury has occurred, should be required, as a condition precedent to enforcing the carrier's liability, to give notice of his claim according to the reasonable conditions of the contract."

A great number of cases hold that a provision identical in terms, or in some cases less favorable to the shipper than the one under consideration, is reasonable and should be enforced—among them Simons v. Great Western Ry., 86 E. C. L. 804, where it was held by the Court of Common Pleas that a condition in a bill of lading was just and reasonable which provided that "no claim for damages will be allowed, unless made within three days after the delivery of the goods, nor for loss, unless made within three days of the time that they should be delivered"; and Lewis v. Railway Co., 5 Hurl. & N. 867, where a stipulation was held to be reasonable to the effect that "no claim for deficiency, damage, or detention will be allowed, unless made within three days after the delivery of the goods; nor for loss, unless made within seven days of the time they should have been delivered."

Express Company v. Harris, 51 Ind. 127, Capehart v. S. & R. R. Co., 77 N. C. 355, and Texas Cent. R. Co. v. Morris, 16 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 259, are to the same effect.

In Black v. Wabash R. Co., 111 Ill. 351, 53 Am. Rep. 628, a bill of lading requiring notice of claim in writing within five days was held valid; the court saying: "The manifest object of such a provision is to force those claiming to be damaged by the carrier's negligence to promptly present their claims for adjustment while the facts and circumstances upon which they are based are fresh in the memories of parties and witnesses, and to prevent being harassed or imposed upon by dishonest claimants." See, also, Sprague v. M. P. R. Co., 34 Kan. 347, 8 Pac. 465.

In Pavitt v. L. V. R. Co., 153 Pa. 302, 25 Atl. 1107, the court sustained as valid a stipulation, in a bill of lading for the transportation of horses, providing that the shipper must make claim in writing within five days from date of unloading; the court saying: "It is settled from all the authorities that such a provision as this, inserted in a contract by a common carrier, is reasonable and will be enforced. It is proper, because the demand promptly made gives warning and enables the carrier, while evidence is attainable and recollection clear, to institute inquiry into the merits of the claim, and thus guard against fraud or overvaluation." See, also, Armstrong v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 53 Minn. 183, 54 N. W. 1059; Selby v. Railroad, 113 N. C. 588, 18 S. E. 88, 37 Am. St. Rep. 635; C. C. C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Newlin, 74 Ill. App. 638; American Grocery Co. v. Staten Island R. T. Co., 51 N. Y. Supp. 307, 23 Misc. Rep. 356; St. Louis & San Francisco R. Co. v. Hurst, 67 Ark. 407, 55 S. W. 215.

Let us consider for a moment the authorities bearing upon the effect of the statute heretofore quoted upon this provision.

In Gulf & Santa Fé R. Co. v. Trawick, 68

Tex. 314, 4 S. W. 567, 2 Am. St. Rep. 494, treating of the effect of a statute of the state of Texas upon such a stipulation, it is said: "The statutes of this state only forbidding such contracts as would limit or restrict the common-law liability of carriers, we see no reason why contracts executed upon sufficient consideration and reasonable in character, looking only to the time within which such liability may be enforced, should not be held valid. There is no rule of the common law which forbids such contracts."

In Goggin v. Kansas Pac. Ry. Co., 12 Kan. 416, Chief Justice Kingman said: "It is undoubtedly settled that the common carrier may relieve himself from the strict liability imposed on him by the common law by a special contract; but it seems that he cannot relieve himself from liability for his own negligence. The contract pleaded does not pretend to relieve the defendant from the consequences of his own negligence. It only stipulates that the shipper shall on his part perform certain duties."

See, also, Southern Express Co. v. Hunnicutt, 54 Miss. 566, 28 Am. Rep. 385, and Sprague v. M. P. R. Co., supra, where the court said: "The stipulation requiring notice of any claim for damages to be given cannot be regarded as an attempt to exonerate the company from negligence or from the negligence or misfeasance of any of its servants. The company concede that such an agreement would be ineffectual for that purpose. It is to be regarded rather as a regulation for the protection of the company from fraud and imposition in the adjustment and payment of claims for damages, by giving the company a reasonable opportunity to ascertain the nature of the damage and its cause."

On this point see, also, Pavitt v. L. V. R. Co., supra; Case v. C. C. C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 11 Ind. App. 517, 39 N. E. 426; B. & O. S. W. Ry. Co. v. Ragsdale, 14 Ind. App. 406, 42 N. E. 1106.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in Southern Ex. Co. v. Caldwell, 21 Wall. 264, 22 L. Ed. 556, treats of this subject as follows:

"The stipulation is not a conventional limitation of the right of the carrier's employer to sue. He is left at liberty to sue at any time within the period fixed by the statute of limitations. He is only required to make his claim within 90 days, in season to enable the carrier to ascertain what the facts are, and, having made this claim, he may delay his suit.

"It may also be remarked that the contract is not a stipulation for exemption from responsibility for the defendants' negligence, or for that of their servants. It is freely conceded that, had it been such, it would have been against the policy of the law, and inoperative. * * * A common carrier is always responsible for his negligence, no matter what his stipulations may be. But an agreement that, in case of failure by the carrier to deliver the goods, a claim shall be made by the bailor, or by the consignee, within a specified period, if that period be a reasonable one, is altogether of a different character. It contravenes no public policy. It excuses no negligence. It is perfectly consistent with holding the carrier to the fullest measure of good faith, of diligence, and of capacity which the strictest rules of the common law ever required. And it is intrinsically just as applied to the present case. * * * If a bailor may delay giving notice to them of a loss, or making a claim indefinitely, they may not be able to trace the parcels bailed, and to recover them, if accidentally missent, or if they have in fact been properly delivered. With the bailor the bailment is a single transaction, of which he has full knowledge; with the bailee, it is one of a multitude. There is no hardship in requiring the bailor to give notice of the loss, if any, or make a claim for compensation, within a reasonable time after he has delivered the parcel to the carrier. There is great hardship in requiring the carrier to account for the parcel long after that time, when he has had no notice of any failure of duty on his part, and when the lapse of time has made it difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain the actual facts. For these reasons, such limitations have been held valid in similar contracts, even when they seem to be less reasonable than in the contracts of common carriers."

We are of opinion that there was no error in the instruction complained of, that it is decisive of this controversy, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

VIRGINIA & S. W. RY. CO. v. HOLLINGSWORTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 12, 1907.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR—REVIEW.

Va. Code 1904, § 3271, provides the form of demurrer, and declares that in civil cases the court on motion of any party shall, or of its own motion may, require the grounds of demurrer relied on to be stated, and that no grounds shall be considered other than those so stated. A demurrer to a plea by a railroad company in abatement to the jurisdiction of the court stated as a ground therefor that, the cause of action being a transitory one, it could be brought anywhere in the state where defendant could be found. Held that, that ground having been stated and relied on, plaintiff was limited thereto under section 3271, and a further ground that the plea was insufficient because, though denying that the residence of defendant's president or other chief officer was in the county where suit was brought, it failed to state the residence of such president or chief officer, could not be considered.

2. CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—ACTIONS—JURISDICTION.

Va. Code 1904, § 3214, provides that any action, except where otherwise especially provided, may be brought in any county or corporation wherein defendant may reside, or, if a corporation be a defendant, wherein its principal office is, or its president or other chief officer resides. Section 3215 provides that an action may be brought in any county or corporation wherein the cause of action arose, though none of the defendants reside therein. Section 3220 provides that process against a defendant to answer in any action brought under section 3215 shall not be directed to any county or corporation than that wherein the action is brought, unless it be an action against a railroad, express, etc., company. Held, in an action for injuries by a passenger, that a railroad company could not be sued in a county in which the cause of action did not arise, and in which it did not have its principal office, and in which its president or other chief officer did not reside, though such cause of action was transitory.

Error from Circuit Court, Scott County.

Action by Maggie Hollingsworth against the Virginia & Southwestern Railway Company for personal injuries sustained while a passenger. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, and action dismissed.

Bullitt & Kelly and D. D. Hull, Jr., for plaintiff in error. Duncan, Mathews & Maynor and Richmond & Bond, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. Maggie Hollingsworth filed her declaration in an action of trespass on the case in the circuit court of Scott county against the Virginia & Southwestern Railway Company, from which it appears that the defendant is a corporation organized and doing business under the laws of the state of Virginia. At the same rules to which the suit was brought the defendant filed a plea to the jurisdiction, which states that the circuit court of Scott county "ought not to have or take any further cognizance of the action aforesaid of the said plaintiff, because the defendant says that the supposed cause of the said action did not, nor did any part thereof, arise in the said Scott county, but that the supposed cause of said action, and every part thereof, did arise, if at all, within the county of Washington, and that at the time of the issuing of the said writ in this case the said defendant did not have its principal office in said county of Scott, and that it had no president or other chief officer residing in said county of Scott, and that its principal office then was, and has ever since been, in the city of Bristol, in the state of Virginia," and concludes with a verification.

The plaintiff demurred to this plea, and said "that the said plea to the jurisdiction is not sufficient in law, and for grounds for said demurrer says that this action is a transitory one, and can be brought anywhere in the state the defendant may be found."

The circuit court, being of opinion that the cause of action sued upon is a transitory one and that the defendant might be sued wherever found, sustained the demurrer and rejected the plea; and thereupon the defendant pleaded the general issue, and upon a trial before a jury there was a verdict for the defendant. This verdict was, upon motion of the plaintiff, set aside, and at a subsequent trial there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff; and the case is before us upon a writ of error awarded the defendant.

So much of section 3214 of the Code of 1904 as is pertinent to this case declares that:

"Any action at law or suit in equity, except where it is otherwise especially provided, may be brought in any county or corporation—

"First. Wherein any of the defendants may reside.

"Second. If a corporation be a defendant, wherein its principal office is, or wherein its mayor, rector, president, or other chief officer resides."

Section 3215 provides that "an action may be brought in any county or corporation wherein the cause of action, or any part thereof arose, although none of the defendants reside therein." But the effect of this latter section is qualified by section 3220, which declares that process against a defendant to answer in any action brought under section 3215 "shall not be directed to an officer of any other county or corporation than that wherein the action is brought, unless it be an action against a railroad, express, canal, navigation, turnpike, telegraph, or telephone company."

The plea in abatement to the jurisdiction in this case avers "that the supposed cause of the said action did not, nor did any part thereof, arise in the said Scott county, but that the supposed cause of said action, and every part thereof, did arise, if at all, within the county of Washington." It avers that the defendant did not have its principal office in said county of Scott, and that it had no president or other chief officer residing in said county, and that its principal office then was and ever since has been in the city of Bristol, in the state of Virginia. The plea is a complete negation of the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the county of Scott with respect to the residence of the defendant, as provided in the first subdivision of section 3214, and it is equally as complete with respect to the second subdivision which refers especially to corporations; for it appears that it had no president or other chief officer residing in Scott county, and that its principal office then was and ever since has been in the city of Bristol, Va. The denial of jurisdiction under section 3215 is equally complete; for it avers that the supposed cause of action did not arise in Scott county, but that it, and every part thereof, arose, if at all, within the county of Washington. There is no room for dispute that the plea denies the existence of every fact upon which the jurisdiction of the county of Scott could be asserted. It gives to the plaintiff a better writ with respect to the cause of action, which is averred to have arisen, if at all, within the county of Washington. It gives to the plaintiff a better writ with respect to the location of the principal office of the defendant company, which is averred to be in the city of Bristol, in the state of Virginia.

It is contended, however, upon the part of the defendant in error, that the plea is insufficient, in that, while it denies that the company had a president or other chief officer residing in the county of Scott, it does not show the place of residence of the president or other chief officer, and in that respect fails to give to the plaintiff a better writ. In reply to this contention it is pointed out by plaintiff in error that the terms of the rule upon this subject with respect to a plea in abatement is that the plea must give the plaintiff a better writ; that the plea does give the plaintiff a better writ—indeed, two better writs; and that therefore the letter of the rule invoked has been complied with. While defendant in error insists that the plea must inform the plaintiff with respect to every court within whose jurisdiction his suit might have been properly brought.

Conceding, for the sake of the argument, that such is the law, it would avail the defendant in error nothing in this case. In section 3271 of the Code it is provided that "the form of demurrer or joinder in demurrer may be as follows: 'The defendant says that the declaration is not sufficient in law.'" Provided that all demurrers shall be in writing, except in criminal cases, and in civil cases the court, on motion of any party thereto, shall, or of its own motion may, require the grounds of demurrer relied on to be stated specifically in the demurrer; and no grounds shall be considered other than those so stated, but either party may amend his demurrer by stating additional grounds, or otherwise, at any time before the trial."

The plaintiff, as we have seen, filed her demurrer in writing, in which she says that "the said plea to the jurisdiction is not sufficient in law, and for grounds for said demurrer says that this action is a transitory one, and can be brought anywhere in the state the defendant may be found." The only ground here stated—the only ground which the circuit court was called upon to consider, and, as appears from its order, the only ground which it in point of fact considered—is that the cause of action, being a transitory one, could be brought anywhere in the state where the defendant could be found. That ground having been stated and relied upon, the statute expressly declares that none other shall be considered.

To meet this contention the defendant in error insists that she was not required by the court to state her grounds of demurrer, but that she did so voluntarily, and that therefore the statute does not apply; but to this contention we are unable to give our sanction. By coming forward and stating in writing her grounds of demurrer, the court and the opposite party were disarmed. It would have been a superfluous and idle thing to require the plaintiff to do that which she had already done of her own accord, and counsel and the opposing party could safely rely upon the written statement of the plaintiff as constituting the sole ground of demurrer with respect to the defendant's plea in abatement.

Defendant in error relies upon sections 7424, 7425, of Thompson's Commentaries on the Law of Corporations, from which it appears that in some of the states a corporation is held to reside wherever it exercises its franchise, and upon section 7426, from which it appears that in some of the states a corporation, for the purposes of jurisdiction, is deemed to reside throughout the entire limits of the state, and especially in those counties where it carries on its business and exercises its franchises, and is hence suable in any county where it has an agent upon whom process against it may lawfully be served. "But," says the author, "It should be carefully kept in mind that this rule is not so much a theory of the courts as to the legal situs of a corporation for the purposes of jurisdiction as it is a rule in particular states, founded on the express language of statutes, and that, in so far as the states have the same rule, it is rather a rule depending upon a concurrence of judicial decisions."

Section 7427 of the same work says: "In the absence of special statutory provisions relating to the venue of civil actions by and against corporations, it is a sound conclusion that the same rules prevail which have been established by general statutes; in other words, that the same rules prevail in the case of corporations as in the case of natural persons. It has been so held in respect of actions by corporations. So a constitutional provision requiring all civil cases to be tried in the county in which the defendant resides is held to apply to corporations as well as to natural persons."

Section 7428 states the law very nearly in accordance with our statute. "Another rule, founded entirely, it may be assumed, on constitutional and statutory provisions, is to the effect that, a corporation being a resident of the state for jurisdictional purposes, an action against it may be brought in the county where the injury, which is the special matter of the action, was done, or where the contract, which is the subject of the action, was broken, or (at the pleasure of the plaintiff) in the county where the chief office or place of business of the corporation is situated."

1. Barton's Law Practice (2d Ed.) § 9, states the general rule to be that transitory actions "may be brought against a party wherever he may be found and served with process, no matter where he may reside, or where the cause of action arose. The statute declaratory of the jurisdiction, territorially, of the courts, provides that actions or suits, unless it be otherwise specially provided, shall be brought in any county or corporation wherein any of the defendants may reside; against a corporation wherein its principal office is, or chief officer resides; if upon a policy of insurance, wherein the property insured was situated, or the person whose life was insured resided at the date of the policy of insurance; if to recover land, or subject it to a debt, or be against a defendant who resides without, but has estate or debts due him within, this state; or be against a foreign corporation, in the county or corporation wherein such land, estate, or debts, or any part thereof, may be. * * * An action may also be brought in any county or corporation wherein the cause of action, or any part thereof, may arise, although none of the defendants reside therein. But this last provision is subject to the qualification, contained in section 3220 of the Code, that process issued against a defendant under section 3215, unless the defendant be a railroad, express, canal, navigation, turnpike, telegraph, or telephone company, and in certain other cases, to answer in any action, shall not be directed to an officer of any county or corporation other than that wherein the action is brought." Further on in this same section the author remarks that "by reading sections 3214, 3215, and 3220 together, we find that an action may be maintained against a railroad, canal, turnpike, express, navigation, telephone, or telegraph company in any county or corporation in which the cause of action or any part thereof, arose, whether said corporation was incorporated by the laws of this state, or any other state or county, provided it is transacting business in this state."

In section 84, speaking of "Direction and Service of the Writ," the learned author says: "Where the defendant resides or happens to be in the same county or city where the cause of action arose, there is no difficulty about the writ, nor is there any trouble in suing a defendant in a transitory action wherever he resides. Confusion has arisen, however, where suits have been brought in a county or city where the cause of action did not arise or the defendant reside, but where he happened to be at the time of the service of the writ. In such a case the action may be defeated by a plea in abatement. But, even if the suit be instituted in the county or city where the cause of action arose, the writ cannot, except in the cases hereafter mentioned, be sent to another county or city to be served. If it be so sent the action may be defeated without plea in abatement; for the service of such a writ is simply void, and an appearance to contest it will not be regarded as an appearance on the merits, or as a waiver of the question of jurisdiction."

We have no decision upon our statutes affecting this subject as they now stand in the Code, and we have therefore gone more fully into the subject than might otherwise have been necessary.

We are of opinion that the circuit court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the plea, and that for this error its judgment should be reversed, the plea to the jurisdiction sustained, and the suit of the plaintiff in the circuit court of Scott county dismissed.

ALBERT v. TIDEWATER RY. CO.

1. EVIDENCE—PAROL EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—VARYING TERMS OF CONTRACT.

In a suit for the specific performance of a contract binding an owner to convey to a railway company a right of way 50 feet wide on each side of the center line thereof as finally located at $100 per acre, evidence that the line of the railway had been located prior to the execution of the contract, that the owner knew thereof, and that a portion of the right of way included a part of a right of way previously conveyed by the owner to the company, was admissible to explain the ambiguity in the contract arising from the fact that the two rights of way covered part of the same land, and to show that the company should pay only for the land not previously conveyed.

2. RAILROADS—RIGHT OF WAY—CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION.

A railway company purchased a right of way and obtained a deed therefor. Subsequently the grantor and the company entered into a contract binding the owner to convey to the company a right of way 50 feet wide on each side of the center line thereof as finally located in consideration of $100 per acre, and binding the company to reconvey the right of way previously conveyed to it, and providing that it should receive a specified credit for such reconveyance. The parties knew at the time of the execution of the contract that the location of the right of way therein referred to covered about half of the right of way conveyed by the deed, and that the company would acquire about 10 acres of new land and would abandon about 8 acres of the right of way conveyed by the deed. Held, that the company was required to pay $100 per acre for the new land and reconvey that portion of the old right of way not used, for which it was entitled to the specified credit.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Montgomery County.

Suit by the Tidewater Railway Company against one Albert. From a decree for complaint, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Wysor, for appellant. Robertson, Hall & Woods, A. A. Phlegar, and Jno. R. Johnson, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. This suit was brought for the construction and specific performance of a contract for the sale of a strip of land, bought by the appellee railway company from the appellant as a right of way for its railroad.

It appears that in March, 1905, appellee bought and paid for a right of way for its railroad through the lands of appellant and received a deed therefor. This deed contains a provision that the appellee shall have the right thereunder to shift or change the center line of the right of way to either side a distance of not more than 20 feet at any point, and that, if any such change is made in the location of the center line, the railroad company shall, if the additional land taken be on the north side of the right of way, pay therefor at the rate of $25 per acre, and if on the south side, at the rate of $100 per acre. This provision shows that at the time the deed of March, 1905, was made some change in the location of the right of way therein provided for was regarded by the parties as probable.

The contract we are now asked to construe and enforce was an option contract, in writing, dated December 27, 1905, which provides that, in consideration of the appellee company adopting as a location for its railway a line crossing the lands of the appellant, he would convey to the company, upon demand, a right of way 100 feet wide—that is to say, 50 feet wide on each side of the center line of the right of way, as finally located—together with such additional land as should be required for slopes, etc.; and as an additional consideration the appellee agreed to pay the appellant $100 per acre for each acre, to reconvey the land theretofore conveyed to the company, and to receive a credit of $200 therefor. Under this contract the appellee had 30 days in which to elect and give notice that it would take the land, and a reasonable time thereafter to make the necessary surveys and examination of the title for an apt and proper deed, which the appellant was to execute and deliver on demand. It further appears that the appellee company, immediately after the execution of this option contract, entered upon the strip of land in question, and began the construction of its railroad, and gave notice that it required a deed therefor. The strip of land thus taken and now occupied by the appellee contains 18.76 acres, of which 8.46 acres is part of the original right of way which was conveyed to the appellee.

The contention of the appellant is that under the terms of the option contract of December, 1905, he is entitled to compensation at the rate of $100 per acre for the whole of the 18.76 acres contained in the finally established right of way, or $1,876, less the $200 which the contract provides he shall pay for a reconveyance of the right of way originally adopted; that according to the strict letter of the contract he might have the right to require the appellee to establish its right of way over altogether new land and reconvey to him the whole of the old right of way, but that, inasmuch as the company has retained for its right of way a portion of the land for which it already has a deed, he is willing to permit appellee to remain in undisturbed possession of the right of way it has taken upon the terms that it pay to him $100 per acre for the entire strip now covered by the right of way, notwithstanding the fact that appellee had bought and paid for and already had a deed to a large portion of such strip—the theory being that, when the railroad company closed the option contract of December, 1905, the old line became, in equity, the property of appellant, and that when the new line was located, which included part of the original line, it was in its entirety a taking of appellant's land, for which it was agreed that $100 per acre should be paid. The result of this contention would be that the railroad company would have to pay appellant $100 per acre for land it had already bought from appellant and paid for at the agreed price of $28 per acre.

This construction of the contract is vigorously contested by the appellee; it being insisted on its behalf that the correct interpretation of the contract and the understanding of the parties, as shown by the surrounding facts and circumstances, was that the railroad company was liable to the appellant for the 10.3 acres of new land taken by it at the rate of $100 per acre, or $1,030, less $200 which the appellant must pay for the 8.46 acres of the original strip not used by appellee, which it is ready and offers to reconvey to the appellant—in other words, that, in addition to the $448 paid for the original strip, appellant owes for the right of way last established $830 in money and a reconveyance to appellant of 8.46 acres of the land taken in the first instance.

It appears from the record that when the contract of December 27, 1905, was made, the line of the right of way contemplated by it had been finally located for nearly four months. It further satisfactorily appears that this location was known to the appellant when the contract was made. He saw a considerable portion of each line run. He saw that the stakes, put in the ground to mark out the line, crossed at various places the two locations; and he had made a deed for the first location, which described it with minuteness. With the agent of the company, who went to his house to get the contract of December 27, 1905, he went over a large part of the last line, and at the agent's request showed him the first line, which had been somewhat obscured by the removal of stakes. Under these circumstances it cannot be doubted that when the contract of December, 1905, was executed, appellant knew that the new location occupied a large portion of the old.

It is, however, earnestly urged that the testimony taken by the appellee was for the purpose of varying a plain and unambiguous written contract, and that the objection thereto of the appellant should have been sustained.

It is undoubtedly true that parol evidence is not admissible to alter or vary the terms of a plain, unambiguous contract. But it is equally true that the light enjoyed by the parties when the contract was made can be shed upon the transaction in aid of a proper construction, where the language of the contract is ambiguous and leaves its interpreter in doubt as to the meaning and purpose of the parties. Lowrey v. Hawaii, 206 U. S. 206, 27 Sup. Ct. 622, 51 L. Ed. 1026; Talbot v. R. & D. R. Co., 31 Gratt. 685, 689.

In the case last cited Judge Burks says: "To ascertain the intent of the parties is said to be the fundamental rule in the construction of agreements (Canal Co. v. Hill, 15 Wall. U. S. 94, 21 L. Ed. 64); and in such construction courts look to the language employed, the subject-matter, and surrounding circumstances. They are never shut out from the same light which the parties enjoyed when the contract was executed, and in that view they are entitled to place themselves in the same situation which the parties who made the contract occupied, so as to view the circumstances as they viewed them, and so to judge of the meaning of the words and of the correct application of the language to the things described"—citing Nash v. Towne, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 689, 699, 18 L. Ed. 527; Maryland v. Railroad Co., 22 Wall. (U. S.) 105, 22 L. Ed. 713; Moran v. Prather, 23 Wall. (U. S.) 492, 501, 23 L. Ed. 121.

In the case of Southern R. Co. v. Franklin, etc., R. Co., 96 Va. 693, 32 S. E. 485, 44 L. R. A. 297, Judge Riely says: "It is proper to observe that a court, in construing an agreement whose language leaves in doubt its meaning as to the particular matter in controversy, in order to ascertain the intention of the parties, should have regard to the occasion which gave rise to the contract, the obvious design of the parties, and the object to be attained, as well as the language of the instrument itself, and give the agreement that construction which will effectuate the real intent and meaning of the parties as thus ascertained from the entire instrument and by reference to the circumstances attending the making of it."

In the case at bar it does not appear on the face of the contract that the old and new locations touch at any point, and if they did not touch there would be no ambiguity or dispute about the contract. But, when it appears that the two lines cover much of the same land, an ambiguity arises at once, and the question must be answered: What land did the parties intend, by the language used, should be paid for at the rate of $100 per acre? When the court knows what the parties knew at the time the contract was made, the difficulty is easily solved. As already seen, the parties knew that the location of the new right of way covered about one-half of the old, and that the company would acquire about 10 acres of new land and abandon about 8 acres of the old, which at $200 in gross was less than the appellant had received for it.

We are of opinion that, when the contract is read in the light of the facts disclosed by the pleadings and the evidence adduced, it is very clear that the parties never contemplated that the railroad company was to be required to pay appellant $100 per acre for such of its own land as it might see fit to retain and use in locating the new right of way agreed upon; the only reasonable construction of the contract of December, 1907, being that the company should pay appellant $100 per acre for the 10.3 acres of new land acquired by it and embraced in the final location, and should reconvey to appellant that portion of the old line not used as part of the new right of way, for which reconveyance the railroad company was to have a credit of $200.

The circuit court having reached this conclusion, its decree must be affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 95, 132.]

2. EVIDENCE — PAROL EVIDENCE VARYING WRITING—DEEDS.

Evidence to rebut the presumption on a sale of real estate, where the quantity is referred to in the contract and the language does not plainly indicate that the parties intended a sale in gross, that such sale is by the acre, and to show that the same was in gross, does not contradict or vary the deed in any particular, but merely establishes an understanding collateral to the written contract, to be governed at all events by the estimated quantity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2032.]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER—SALE IN GROSS.

That the purchase money for land is not an equimultiple of the number of acres is at least persuasive evidence that the contract was not by the acre.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 95, 132-135.]

4. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action to recover for an excess of land conveyed, founded on a claim of mutual mistake as to the quantity thereof, the uncontradicted evidence of the grantee held sufficient to overcome the presumption that the sale was by the acre, and to show that the quantity did not influence the price paid for the land.

5. SAME—RECOVERY.

Where, on a sale of land by the acre, by mutual mistake in the estimated quantity more land is included than supposed, vendor's recovery must be, in the first instance, against his immediate vendee.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wise County.

Bill by F. A. Stratton against Albert E. Emerson and others. Judgment for complainant, and certain defendants appeal. Reversed and rendered.

Ayers & Fulton and T. E. Ellison, for appellants. Bond & Bruce and Vicars & Peery, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. This record shows that in April, 1887, J. F. Johnson and wife sold and conveyed to F. A. Stratton 83.50 acres of land, more or less, in Wise county, at $2 per acre. It further appears that in the same month and year E. M. Fulton, as commissioner of the circuit court of Wise county, conveyed to F. A. Stratton, at the request of Mrs. Johnson, the grantor in the deed first mentioned, two tracts of land in the same county, containing 1,064.50 acres, which she had purchased for $599.65 under a decree of the court in a chancery suit then pending. This conveyance described the land conveyed as 1,064.50 acres, more or less, and by metes and bounds, as shown by a survey thereof which Mrs. Johnson had caused to be made.

In July, 1888, F. A. Stratton and wife conveyed, by one deed, these lands to H. M. Herbert. In this deed the two tracts are described separately by the same metes and bounds already mentioned, and as containing 83.50 acres, more or less, in the one case, and 1,064.50 acres, more or less, in the other. The consideration stated on the face of this deed is the lump sum of $5,400 for the two tracts, aggregating 1,148 acres. In December, 1894, H. M. Herbert and wife conveyed the same two tracts of land by the same description to Albert E. Emerson; the consideration stated on the face of this deed being the lump sum of $5100, or $300 less than the grantor had given. In December, 1898, Albert E. Emerson and others sold and conveyed the same boundary of land to N. B. Dotson, the present owner.

The bill in this case was filed in August, 1903, by F. A. Stratton, the grantor in the deed made in 1888 to H. M. Herbert, against the appellant Albert E. Emerson and others, alleging that he had recently and within the preceding year learned that the lands conveyed by him to H. M. Herbert as 1,148 acres had since been accurately surveyed and found to contain 1,267.69 acres, or 119.69 acres more than he and his grantee supposed at the time he sold and conveyed the same; that he had sold the land at  $$4.70^{110/287}$  per acre, making the aggregate of $5,400, which was the lump sum stated on the face of the deed to be the consideration; that at the time of the execution of the deed both he and his grantee believed that the land conveyed was only 1,148 acres, and that the true acreage and consideration was omitted from the deed by the mutual mistake of both; that the excess of land at  $$4.70^{110/287}$  per acre would amount to $563, with interest thereon from the date of the deed—and the prayer is that the complainant may have a decree for $563 and interest thereon from July 2, 1888, and that the land, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be sold to satisfy the same.

The record shows that 20.37 acres of this land belonged by paramount title to O. M. Vicars and others, so that, if the complainant was entitled to recover at all, it could only be for an excess of 99.32 acres, instead of 119.69 acres.

The appellants, Albert E. Emerson and others, filed their answer to this bill, specifically denying that the lands were sold by the complainant, Stratton, to H. M. Herbert at the price of  $$4.70^{110}/_{287}$  per acre, that such sale was by the acre, that there was any mistake by which the true acreage and consideration were omitted from the deed, and that there was any mistake whatsoever in the deed for which the same should be reformed or corrected. They further aver that they are innocent purchasers of the land, without notice of the pretended claim of F. A. Stratton to a lien thereon, which neither of them ever heard of until the institution of this suit, long after they had purchased the land, paid in full therefor, and received and recorded a deed for the same from their vendor, H. M. Herbert.

At the December term of the circuit court Ellender M. Johnson, the vendor of the land to the complainant, F. A. Stratton, was allowed to file her petition in the cause, in which she alleges that her sale to the complainant, Stratton, was by the acre; that she sold the several tracts, described as containing 1,148 acres, to Stratton at $2 per acre—and alleging a mistake and recent discovery thereof substantially as claimed in the bill of Stratton, and claiming that by reason of the excess now shown to exist she is entitled to recover the value thereof at $2 per acre, with interest.

The appellants filed an answer to this petition, in which they admit that petitioner sold the 83.5 acres of land, described in the deed of April, 1887, to F. A. Stratton by the acre, but they deny that the 1,064.50 acres, which was conveyed to Stratton by the commissioner at the request of petitioner, was a sale by the acre, and insist that it was a sale by the boundary. They deny generally all equities alleged in the petition, and insist that they are innocent purchasers of the land in question for a valuable consideration, without notice or knowledge of the petitioner's pretended claim.

At the November term, 1906, the circuit court decreed that the sale by Stratton to Herbert was a sale by the acre, and not in gross; that the sale by Mrs. Johnson to Stratton was also a sale by the acre, and not in gross; that the excess in acreage was 119.69 acres, less 20.37 acres; that F. A. Stratton was entitled to compensation from H. M. Herbert at  $$4.70^{110}/_{287}$  per acre for such excess, and Ellender M. Johnson was entitled to compensation for the same at the rate of $2 per acre; that Stratton had a lien on the land, except the 20.37 acres, for $487.20, with interest thereon from July 2, 1888; and that

Mrs. Johnson was entitled to $198.64, with interest from April 8, 1887, to be paid out of the recovery in favor of her vendee, Stratton. The decree then appointed a commissioner to sell the lands, except the 20.37 acres, or so much thereof as should be necessary unless the lien thereby established should be paid within 30 days. From this decree the present appeal was allowed.

While contracts of hazard are not invalid, they are not regarded with favor by courts of equity. Every sale, therefore, of real estate, where the quantity is referred to in the contract, and when the language of the contract does not plainly indicate that the parties intended a sale in gross, must be presumed to be a sale by the acre. Berry v. Fishburne, 104 Va. 459, 51 S. E. 827; Hull v. Watts, 95 Va. 10, 27 S. E. 829. This presumption, however, may be met and overcome by proof that the parties agreed to be governed at all events by the estimated quantity. Such proof does not contradict or vary the deed in any particular. It merely establishes an understanding collateral to the written contract, and makes it clear that no such mistake was made as furnishes ground for relief in equity. Blessing v. Beatty, 1 Rob. 287; Caldwell v. Craig, 21 Grat. 182; Boschen v. Jurgens, 92 Va. 756, 24 S. E. 390.

In the case of Blessing v. Beatty, supra, Judge Baldwin says: "The principle upon which equity gives relief in such cases of deficiency or excess in the estimated quantity upon the sale of land I understand to be that of mistake—whether the mutual mistake of the parties, or the mistake of one of them occasioned by the fraud or culpable negligence of the other."

The mistake must be clearly proved, especially in a case like this, where there has been so great a lapse of time and such frequent alienations of the property, founded on the assumption that there was no mistake. Jones v. Tatum, 19 Grat. 736.

In the case at bar no fraud is alleged or proven. The complainant founds his case upon the ground that both he and his grantee were mistaken as to the number of acres the land contained. We are of opinion that the facts established satisfactorily show that the deed of July, 1888, from F. A. Stratton to H. M. Herbert, was not intended by the parties as a consummation of a sale by the acre of the land thereby conveyed. Under the case made by the bill, Stratton sold the land to Herbert at  $$4.70^{110}/_{287}$  per acre. To say the least, this is a most unusual, if not remarkable, price per acre to have been agreed upon for land. The price by the acre is not stated in the deed, but the round sum of $5,400 is given as the consideration for the land conveyed. When the purchase money for land is not an equimultiple of the number of acres, it is at least persuasive evidence that the contract was not by the acre. Keytons v. Brawfords, 5 Leigh, 41, 50; Jones v. Tatum, supra; Farrier v. Reynolds, 88 Va. 141, 147, 13 S. E. 393.

Every material allegation of the bill is denied by the answer. There is no proof to sustain the allegation of mutual mistake, upon which the complainant grounds his right to recover. On the contrary, the testimony of H. M. Herbert distinctly disproves such allegation, and shows clearly that the real transaction between the parties was an exchange of the land conveyed for Indiana property, consisting of land, town lots, and houses, in which exchange Herbert paid Stratton a difference of about $1,400 in money, and further shows that no mistake occurred between Stratton and Herbert as to the true acreage, that the sale was by the boundary, and that Stratton stated at the time that he did not know the correct acreage, but thought the land would run out more than 1,148 acres on an accurate survey. This evidence stands uncontradicted by any one. After more than 15 years of silent acquiescence in the sale that he made, Stratton is not put on the stand to question the truth of the statements made by his immediate grantee.

Without considering other strong corroborative circumstances, we think the uncontradicted testimony of Herbert alone is sufficiently clear and explicit to overcome the presumption that the sale in question was by the acre, and to show that the quantity did not influence the price paid for the land. The record justifies the conclusion that Stratton was willing to take in the Indiana property at about $4,000; that he wanted about $1,400 in money, and to get the matter closed was willing to reduce the price of his land from $5,500, the sum originally asked, to $5,400, the sum finally agreed upon as the value in gross of the tract of land he was selling.

If Mrs. Ellender M. Johnson, the vendor of F. A. Stratton, is entitled to recover anything, as to which we express no opinion, her recovery must be, in the first instance, against her vendee.

Having reached the conclusion that there can be no recovery in favor of the complainant, F. A. Stratton, the decree appealed from must be reversed, and this court will enter such decree as the circuit court should have entered, dismissing his bill, with costs.

NORFOLK & W. RY. CO. v. BELCHER'S ADM'X.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 12, 1907.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE.

In an action for injuries to a section hand in a railroad yard, held, that the employees in charge of a switching train were not negligent in failing to keep a lookout.

2. SAME.

In an action for injuries to a section hand by a switch engine, held that, irrespective of the question of the failure of the employees in charge of the switching train to keep a lookout, the evidence failed to show actionable negligence on their part.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 978-980.]

Error from Circuit Court, Wise County.

Action by the administratrix of O. E. Belcher, deceased, against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Ayers & Fulton and C. T. Duncan, for plaintiff in error. Bond & Bruce, J. F. Bullitt, and R. T. Irvine, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This action was brought by the administratrix of O. E. Belcher against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of the plaintiff's intestate. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for $2,000 in favor of the plaintiff, which we are asked by the defendant company to review.

The petition assigns as error the action of the circuit court in overruling the demurrer to the declaration, its action in refusing to strike out certain words in the declaration alleged to be objectionable, its action in giving and refusing certain instructions, and its action in overruling the motion of the defendant company to set the verdict aside as contrary to the law and the evidence. Each of these assignments of error involve but one proposition of law, which, in our view of the case, can be best considered in connection with the facts applicable thereto.

The plaintiff's intestate was an employé of the defendant railroad company, about 17 years of age, engaged as a section hand in the railroad yards at Norton, in Wise county. An approaching train made it necessary for the deceased and a co-laborer to leave the track upon which they were working for the train to pass. They stepped to a place of safety, clear of all tracks; but the deceased, for some unexplained reason, immediately left his position of safety, against the remonstrance of his fellow workman, crossed the track which he had just left in front of the approaching train, and took his stand in the center of a parallel track, with his back to an approaching switching engine, which was pushing six cars toward him and within 60 feet of the nearest car. The fireman on the passing local train saw the dangerous position of the deceased and called to him; but he paid no attention, seeming to be oblivious of his peril. The engineer of the backing switching train did not see the deceased, and his brakeman did not see him until within 15 feet of him, too late to save him, though he immediately notified the engineer, who stopped the train as promptly as possible.

The contention of the plaintiff is that it was the duty of those in charge of the backing switching train to keep a lookout to discover persons on the track at the place where the accident happened. In other words, the negligence of the deceased, in leaving his position of safety and putting himself in a place of danger, is, as it must be, conceded; but the doctrine of the last clear chance is invoked in order to fix liability upon the defendant. This theory of negligence on the part of the servants of the defendant, after they discovered, or by keeping a lookout might have discovered, the peril of the deceased, was maintained by the circuit court throughout its rulings on the trial. The fact is established in this case that the engineer in charge of the switching train did not see the plaintiff's intestate at all, and his brakeman did not see him until the car was within a few feet of him.

It is undoubtedly a well-settled general rule that it is the duty of a railroad company to keep a lookout at all places where passengers and strangers are to be expected upon the track, and that it is liable for injuries which by the use of ordinary care might have been averted, after the peril of the person injured was discovered, or by the use of ordinary care might have been discovered. But there is no sufficient reason for enforcing this rule without limitation in a railroad yard, where all of the employes have equal knowledge of the constant shifting of cars in making up trains, and equal facilities for looking out and protecting themselves from the dangers naturally incident to such work. If those in charge of a switching train see an employé in danger from which there is reason to believe he will not remove himself, they must do all that can be reasonably done to protect him. They cannot willfully injure him. But they are justified in presuming that the employés in a railroad yard, who are familiar with the constant movements of such trains, will look out for themselves, and will not fail to leave a place of danger in time to avoid injury, and especially that they will not leave a place of safety and take one of imminent danger without the slightest attention to their surroundings. In a railroad yard there are other things to engage the attention of those in charge of a switching train besides watching the track to see if another employé is going, contrary to the dictates of prudence and reason, to get on the track and stand with his back to cars moving toward him and in 60 feet of him.

At the time of the accident the engineer was backing the cars for the purpose of placing them upon the "house track." The brakeman had to give him a signal when that track was reached, and his attention was fixed upon the brakeman, watching for that signal. Under these circumstances, it would have been difficult for either the engineer or the brakeman to have had their eyes upon the track when the deceased placed himself upon it.

In the very similar case of Aerkfetz v. Humphreys, 145 U. S. 418, 12 Sup. Ct. 835, 36 L. Ed. 758, Mr. Justice Brewer, resting the opinion of the court upon the ground that, under the circumstances, there was no negligence on the part of the defendant, says: "The plaintiff was an employé, and therefore the measure of duty to him was not such as to a passenger or a stranger. As an employé of long experience in that yard, he was familiar with the moving of cars forward and backward by the switch engine. The cars were moved at a slow rate of speed, not greater than that which was customary, and that which was necessary in the making up of trains. For a quarter of a mile east of him there was no obstruction, and by ordinary attention he could have observed the approaching cars. He knew that the switch engine was busy moving cars and making up trains, and that at any minute cars were likely to be moved along the track upon which he was working. With that knowledge he places himself with his face away from the direction from which cars were to be expected, and continues his work without ever turning to look. Abundance of time elapsed between the moment the cars entered upon the track upon which he was working and the moment they struck him. There could have been no thought or expectation on the part of the engineer, or of any other employé, that he, thus at work in a place of danger, would pay no attention to his own safety. Under such circumstances, what negligence can be attributed to the parties in control of the train or the management of the yard? They could not have moved the cars at any slower rate of speed. They were not bound to assume that any employé, familiar with the manner of doing business, would be wholly indifferent to the going and coming of the cars. There were no strangers whose presence was to be guarded against. The ringing of bells and the sounding of whistles on trains going and coming, and switch engines moving forwards and backwards, would have simply tended to confusion. The person in direct charge had a right to act on the belief that the various employés in the yard, familiar with the continuously recurring movement of the cars, would take reasonable precaution against their approach. The engine was moving slowly, so slowly that any ordinary attention on the part of the plaintiff to that which he knew was a part of the constant business of the yard would have made him aware of the approach of the cars and enabled him to step to one side as they moved along the track. It cannot be that, under these circumstances, the defendants were compelled to send some man in front of the cars for the mere sake of giving notice to employés, who had all the time knowledge of what was to be expected. We see in the facts disclosed no negligence on the part of the defendants, and, if by any means negligence could be imputed to them, surely the plaintiff by his negligent inattention contributed directly to the injury." See, also, Wabash R. Co. v. Skiles, 60 N. E. 576, 64 Ohio, 133, 83 Am. St. Rep. 739; Pittard's Adm'r v. Southern Ry. Co., 107 Va. —, 57 S. E. 561, 1 Va. App. 281.

In the case last cited, Judge Keith, in discussing the correlative duties from employes to the railroad company, says:

"The yard of a railroad company is the scene of ceaseless activity, the shifting of cars, and the movement of engines; and in order to carry on their work, and promptly to discharge their duties, there must be a careful economy of time, and as far as possible every moment must be utilized. Under such conditions, those engaged within yard limits are exposed to more than ordinary peril, and should be on the alert and vigilant to guard against injury from the movement of engines and cars always to be expected. The sounding of whistles and ringing of bells, under such conditions, would not add to the safety of employes, but serve only to confound them by adding to the confusion.

"It is therefore said, in section 1253 of Elliott on Railroads, that 'as to employes the company is under no obligation to ring the bell or sound the whistle upon a switching engine engaged in making up trains in its yard, for the purpose of notifying such employes, who are familiar with the operation of the yard.' Aerkfetz v. Humphreys, 145 U. S. 418, 12 Sup. Ct. 835, 36 L. Ed. 758.

"As was said by this court in Darracott v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 83 Va. 294, 295, 2 S. E. 511, 514, 5 Am. St. Rep. 266: 'There are certain correlative duties on the part of the employe to the company. One of those is to use ordinary care to avoid injuries to himself; for the company is under no greater obligation to care for his safety than he is himself, and he must inform himself, so far as he reasonably can, respecting the dangers as well as the duties incident to the service. And, in general, any negligence of an employe amounting to the want of ordinary care, which is the proximate cause of the injury, will defeat an action against the company.'

Under the facts and circumstances of this case, and in the light of the authorities cited, we are of opinion that the servants of the defendant company were not negligent in failing to keep a constant lookout in anticipation that the deceased would be guilty of the reckless act which alone cost him his life. It may be added that, if those in charge of the switching train had been under obligation to keep such a lookout and had discovered the deceased as soon as he stepped on the track, the theory that the accident might have been avoided is a matter of the merest conjecture and speculation. When the deceased left his place of safety and stepped on the track where he met his death, he was not more than 60 feet from the nearest car of the switching train that was backing toward him. At the rate of speed the train was moving, that distance would have been covered in seven seconds. The evidence shows that the train could not be stopped in less than 51 feet. So that, to stop the train before it struck the deceased, the engineer would have had about one second in which to discover the danger, and to determine that, contrary to the dictates of reason, the deceased was going to remain in his position of peril without making the slightest effort to protect himself.

We are of opinion that, upon the facts disclosed by the record, the defendant company was guilty of no negligence, and that the accident occurred solely from a lack of proper attention on the part of the deceased. The judgment must therefore be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial, not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

DAVIS et al. v. OWEN.

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION—HOSTILE CHARACTER.

An owner of land conveyed to certain school trustees a portion thereof, definitely described by metes and bounds, to be used for the erection of a public school for colored people. Before the schoolhouse was built the colored people of the community offered to contribute to its erection if they could hold religious services therein, which was agreed to. After the erection of the schoolhouse a rail fence was built on the remainder of the land, which cut it off from not only the schoolhouse lot, but also a piece of land, containing  $1\frac{1}{4}$  acres, between it and the fence. Subsequently such religious organization, with the consent of the school district trustees, erected a church building and located a graveyard, part of each of which was on the  $1\frac{1}{4}$  acres; the trustees of both the school district and the religious organization believing that the same were entirely on the schoolhouse lot. Held, in an action by the trustees of the religious organization to quiet title, that such encroachment on the  $1\frac{1}{4}$  acres could not ripen into a title by adverse possession, since, their right being subordinate to the right of the school trustees, who claimed nothing except the schoolhouse lot, they could not obtain a greater right.

2. SAME—ENTRY AND POSSESSION BY MISTAKE.

The erection of a part of a church building and the location of a graveyard on another's land under the mistaken belief that the same was part of land of one who had authorized such erection and location, and without any claim of right by those performing such acts or by those authorizing the same, cannot ripen into title by adverse possession.

3. ESTOPPEL—KNOWLEDGE OF FACTS.

Where the owner of land made no objection to the erection of a part of a church and the location of a part of a graveyard on his land, under the mistaken belief that they were entirely on the land of an adjoining owner, he is not thereby estopped from asserting his title on discovery that the same are on his land.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bedford County.

Bill by Alex Davis and others against C. H. Owen. Decree for defendant, and complainants appeal. Affirmed.

N. T. Goldsberry, for appellants. Lowry & Lowry, for appellee.

CARDWELL, J. The facts out of which this appeal arises are as follows:

In the year 1873, Thomas T. Munford was seised and possessed of a boundary of real estate in the county of Bedford, Va., near Forest, containing several hundred acres, and on the 3d day of June of that year Munford and wife executed a deed conveying to Edward S. Hutter and two others, as school trustees of Forest district, a portion of said tract of land for the purpose of building a public free school for the benefit of the colored people of that district. The deed conveyed to the trustees named a specified piece of ground definitely described by metes and bounds, beginning at a definite point and running thence in certain directions, and as containing 3 roods 35 poles.

After that deed was made and recorded, Munford and wife conveyed to one Murrell all the residue of the tract of land from which the "schoolhouse lot" had been cut off. Subsequently C. H. Owen became the successor in title to the land conveyed to Murrell, containing 224 acres 3 roods 12 poles, by virtue of a deed dated August 2, 1898, from a commissioner of the circuit court of Bedford county in a chancery cause therein pending. This 224 acres 3 roods 12 poles, thus conveyed to Owen, is described as lying contiguous to and adjoining the schoolhouse lot, which had theretofore been conveyed to the school trustees of Forest district.

The deed to the trustees for the schoolhouse lot, after setting out that the conveyance was for the purpose of building on the lot a public free schoolhouse for the benefit of the colored children of the district, under the supervision and control of the school trustees, contains this clause: "Provided, however, and the condition of the foregoing deed is, that if said granted premises are occupied for any purpose, excepting for a school or church for the improvement and free education of the colored people of said school district, then this deed shall become void, and said premises revert to said parties of the first part, their heirs and assigns."

The school trustees took possession of the lot of land conveyed to them, and built thereon a house to be used for a school for colored children in Forest district. Before the schoolhouse was built, however, the colored people in the community approached the school board and offered to contribute to the erection and maintenance of the house, provided the school board would permit the colored people to hold religious services therein, which was agreed to, and the organization under the name of "Altha Grove Baptist Church" apparently controlled the religious services conducted thereafter on these premises.

It further appears that, after the erection of the schoolhouse, a rail fence was built on the residue of the Munford farm, which cut off from the remainder of the farm not only this schoolhouse property of 3 roods 35 poles, but in addition thereto and adjoining the schoolhouse lot, and between it and the rail fence, a piece of land containing  $1\frac{1}{4}$  acres. At the time Owen acquired title to the Munford farm he employed a surveyor to survey its boundaries and locate the line between it and the schoolhouse lot, and when making the survey, instead of running around the schoolhouse lot according to the metes and bounds in the Munford deed, the surveyor "faced" the schoolhouse lot and deducted the acreage of the lot (3 roods 35 poles) from the land he surveyed for Owen. Subsequently, a controversy having arisen between Owen and the trustees of Altha Grove Baptist Church (not the trustees of Forest school district) as to the boundary line between the school property and that of Owen, the latter employed a surveyor to ascertain exactly the location of the line. This survey was made in May, 1904, and shortly thereafter Alex. Davis and others, appellants here, styling themselves "trustees of Altha Grove Baptist Church and colored school of Bedford county," filed their original bill, enjoining Owen from interfering with or trespassing upon the schoolhouse property, or the parcel of land lying between it and the rail fence—in other words, to quiet the title claimed by appellants to the land lying outside the rail fence and including the schoolhouse lot—alleging that Owen was threatening to cut and remove all the standing timber upon this land, claimed by appellants by virtue of the deed from Munford and wife to the trustees of Forest school district, and by adverse possession. Thereafter, they filed an amended bill, and still later an amended and supplemental bill, to which they made not only Owen, but F. W. Nelson and two others, the then school trustees of Forest district under the general free school system of the state of Virginia, parties defendant, and repeating the charges of the original bill that Owen was trespassing or threatening to trespass on the disputed property, whereby it would be irreparably injured, etc.

To each of these bills Owen filed his demurrer and answer, and Nelson and others, school trustees of Forest school district, also demurred and answered. In his answer Owen disclaims any right, title, or interest in the schoolhouse lot, and denies having trespassed thereon or interfered with its peaceful and quiet enjoyment for the purposes for which the lot was originally conveyed to the school trustees of Forest school district, but does claim the  $1\frac{1}{4}$  acres of land between the schoolhouse lot and the rail fence. Nelson and others in their answer, while claiming title to the schoolhouse lot, the schoolhouse thereon, and the possession thereof, by virtue of the deed from Munford and wife to their predecessors in office, particularly disclaim any right to the parcel of land lying between the schoolhouse lot and the rail fence, or to the possession thereof, and deny that Owen has in any way trespassed upon or injured the schoolhouse lot, or has ever threatened to do so, as charged in appellants' bills. They further deny that the schoolhouse lot was conveyed for any purpose other than for erecting a schoolhouse thereon for educating the colored children, and deny the right of appellants to any control whatsoever over the property.

The demurrers to the several bills having been overruled, the cause was heard upon the bills, the answers thereto, and the evidence taken on behalf of both parties. Whereupon the circuit court dissolved the injunction theretofore awarded in the cause, and dismissed the bills, and from that decree the case is brought here on appeal.

It is needless to review the numerous assignments of error in the petition for the appeal, elaborately argued, as appellants utterly fail to show that they are entitled to the relief they ask.

They claim, not only the schoolhouse lot of 3 roods 35 poles, but the parcel of land lying between that lot and the rail fence, containing  $1\frac{1}{4}$  acres. They claim title to the schoolhouse lot by virtue of the deed from Munford and wife to the school trustees of Forest school district, that the paramount object of the conveyance was for religious purposes, and that they have had possession of the whole property—not only the part conveyed, but the  $1\frac{1}{4}$  acres between it and the rail fence—for a period of over 30 years, which possession has been exclusive, open, notorious, and hostile, and under color of title.

In the first place, the appellants' right, if any, to this schoolhouse property, or the possession thereof, is, and has all along been, dependent upon and subordinate to the rights of the school trustees. The legal title to the property is in the school trustees, the right to the possession of the property is in them, and this was recognized by all parties in interest, as shown conclusively by the admitted fact that when the colored people desired to hold religious services upon the property they sought and obtained permission of the school trustees for that purpose, and when they desired to erect a church on the property they sought and obtained permission from the school trustees; and appellants have not shown a shadow of legal title to the  $1\frac{1}{4}$  acres of land between the schoolhouse property and the rail fence, or any sort of possession thereof which could have ripened into title by adversary possession.

From the pleadings and the proof in the cause it clearly appears that it was only some eight or nine years prior to the institution of this litigation when permission was granted to the Altha Grove Baptist congregation to erect a church on the lot conveyed to the school trustees and to remove the schoolhouse to another point on the property. This they did, but erected the church partly on the land claimed by Owen in this suit, which was not conveyed to the school trustees by Munford and wife. About the same time the members of Altha Grove Baptist Church commenced to bury their dead on what was supposed to be the schoolhouse lot, and this graveyard likewise encroaches upon the land claimed by Owen.

It further appears that when a survey of the schoolhouse lot was made in May, 1904, in running the dividing line between it and the land of Owen, it was found that a part of the church building and a part of the graveyard were located on Owen's land, whereupon he directed the surveyor to "drop back" and run the line in such a way as to put the whole of the building on the schoolhouse lot, and offered in his answer filed to the original bill in this cause to release all claim he had to that part of the graveyard which is on his land; but these offers of settlement of the controversy were declined by appellants, and they assert, as stated, a claim to the whole of the land lying outside of the rail fence, and including, not only the schoolhouse lot, but the  $1\frac{1}{4}$  acres, notwithstanding the fact that the school trustees of Forest school district do not claim title to or right of possession in any land except the 3 roods 35 poles conveyed to their predecessors in office by Munford and wife, but, on the contrary, disclaim any right to more of the land than was so conveyed.

The claim of appellants, that they have had exclusive, notorious, and hostile possession for a period of time sufficient to bar appellee from setting up a claim to any of the land outside of the rail fence, is absolutely discredited by the admissions made in the pleadings and proof in the cause. The boundaries of the schoolhouse lot were not marked on the land, further than was shown by a public road; and the fact that the colored people have for some time encroached upon the land of appellee could not ripen into a title by adverse possession: First. Because their right of possession is subordinate to and dependent upon the right of possession of the school trustees. The school trustees claiming nothing except what was conveyed to them by the deed of Munford and wife, the colored people could never obtain any greater right. Second. Because neither the building of the church, which was built partly upon appellee Owen's property, nor the encroachment of the graveyard thereon, began more than eight or nine years prior to the institution of this suit, a period far short of the period of limitation. Appellants claiming in their bills under the deed from Munford and wife, and under that deed alone through the school trustees, the erection of a part of the church building on appellee's land, and the mere encroachment of a part of the graveyard thereon, has not and never can ripen into a good title, from the fact that it had its origin in a mistake, and not a claim of right from the beginning. The colored people who built the church thought that they were putting it entirely upon the schoolhouse property, as conveyed to the school trustees by Munford and wife. They thought that the graveyard was on that land, and did not for a moment think that they had a right to more land than was conveyed by that deed to the school trustees. The school trustees undertook to give them the right to occupy no land except what was conveyed by that deed. So that the fact that appellee, Owen, thought that the church and graveyard were on the schoolhouse lot, and for that reason made no objection to the erection of the church or the burial of the dead, does not estop him now from asserting his rights, when he has ascertained for the first time that there has been such encroachment, and for the first time has learned exactly where the line between the schoolhouse property and his property is located.

In the amended bill filed by appellants is an allegation which of itself, if more than what has been stated were needed, is conclusive that the relief they seek in this litigation was properly denied, viz., that "very soon after said land [the schoolhouse lot] was conveyed as aforesaid the colored people of Forest district, near the property in the bill mentioned, organized a church or religious congregation by the name of 'Altha Grove Baptist Church,' and said congregation with the consent and co-operation of the trustees mentioned in said deed [i. e., the trustees of Forest school district], jointly built a house on said land for the purpose of holding religious services therein and teaching public school." In other words, by appellants' own showing, they have no title whatsoever to the land which is the subject of this controversy, but the title thereto is in the trustees of Forest school district as to the schoolhouse lot, and outside of that they make no sort of claim to any part of the land of appellee Owen; and it is through these trustees and subordinate to their rights that the colored people of Forest school district obtained permission to build a church on the schoolhouse lot for the purpose of holding religious services therein and teaching a public school.

As was held in Clarke v. McClure, 10 Grat. (Va.) 305: "Where one is in under the owner of the legal title, a privity exists which precludes the idea of a hostile, tortious possession, which could silently ripen into title by adverse possession under the statute of limitations."

"Where one went into possession of land with the verbal consent of the owner, his possession could not ripen into a title, in the absence of a clear, positive, and continued disavowal of the owner's title, brought home to his knowledge." Thompson v. Camper, 106 Va. 315, 55 S. E. 674, and authorities there cited.

Again, appellants put themselves in an inconsistent position when they claim in the argument here that they are the legal successors to the trustees mentioned in the deed from Munford and wife, while in their pleadings they admit that the successors to the school trustees named in Exhibit A, filed with their amended bill (deed from Munford and wife to the school trustees of Forest district) are E. N. Nelson and two others named, being the same persons who were the school trustees of Forest district at the time this suit was brought, made parties to the amended bills, and have answered as stated.

The decree appealed from is without error, and will therefore be affirmed.

WISE TERMINAL CO. v. McCORMICK.

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—COMMENCEMENT OF ACTION—AMENDMENT OF PLEADING.

Where the cause and form of action are the same in both the original and amended declarations in an action by a brakeman for injuries sustained in attempting to board the tender of an engine, the amended declaration will not be regarded as stating a new cause of action, so as to bar the right of recovery, the amendment being made after the statute of limitations has run, merely because it charges the negligence complained of in varying form to meet different phases of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Limitation of Actions, §§ 543-547.]

2. EVIDENCE—OPINION EVIDENCE—SUBJECT OF EXPERT TESTIMONY.

In an action by a brakeman for injuries sustained in attempting to board the tender of an engine, witnesses shown to be competent may give their opinions with respect to the distance within which the engine could have been stopped.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2323.]

3. EVIDENCE—TESTIMONY ON FORMER TRIAL.

Evidence held insufficient to excuse the failure to produce a witness or take his deposition, so as to warrant the introduction of his testimony on a former trial.

Error to Circuit Court, Wise County.

Action by W. B. McCormick, a brakeman, against the Wise Terminal Company, for personal injuries sustained in attempting to board the tender of an engine. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

Ayers & Fulton and Bullitt & Kelly, for plaintiff in error. Wm. H. Werth, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. The evidence in this case, which is before us the second time, was exhaustively reviewed on the former hearing and held not to establish actionable negligence on the part of the plaintiff in error, the Wise Terminal Company. Wise Terminal Co. v. McCormick, 104 Va. 400, 51 S. E. 781. It is now alleged that the second recovery is founded on substantially the same evidence, and must therefore be controlled by the former decision. On the other hand, the defendant in error contends that the evidence at the second trial, set out in the stenographic report, is not sufficiently identified to constitute part of the record, and the original record was brought up on a subpoena duces tecum to substantiate that assertion.

As a new trial must be granted on another ground, it is unnecessary to pass upon that question; but, before dismissing the subject, the objections to inadequate certification of evidence with which we are repeatedly confronted justify our again calling the attention of the profession to the importance of paying more regard to this essential feature in making up a record. Jeremy Improvement Co. v. Commonwealth, 106 Va. 482, 58 S. E. 224.

The first assignment of error which claims our attention is to the action of the trial court in rejecting the plea of the act of limitations. The assignment proceeds upon the theory that the amended declaration makes a new case.

In this the plaintiff in error is mistaken, as an inspection of the pleading plainly shows. The cause and form of action are the same in both declarations, and the amended declaration merely charges the negligence complained of in varying form to meet different phases of the evidence.

The principle is clearly stated in New River Min. Co. v. Painter, 100 Va. 507, 42 S. E. 300, as follows: "If an amended declaration assert rights or claims arising out of the same transaction, act, agreement, or obligation as that upon which the original declaration is founded, it will not be regarded as a new cause of action, however great may be the difference in the form of liability asserted in the two declarations."

That the case falls within the rule thus laid down will be seen from the statement, in the petition for a writ of error, that "the evidence on the last trial was confined mainly to the issue presented by the amended declaration; but the same issue was raised by the former declaration, and substantially the same evidence was introduced and * * * held insufficient to support a verdict."

Several assignments involve objections to the admission of opinions of witnesses with respect to the distance within which the engine could have been stopped. Subject to proper restrictions, based on the knowledge and experience of the witnesses, such evidence is admissible, and is usually relied on to prove that fact.

The next assignment is founded on the alleged effort of the plaintiff to discredit one of his own witnesses; but the record does not sustain the objection. The purpose of the examination, which is made the ground of exception, was to refresh the memory of the witness by reference to his testimony at the former trial, and not to impeach him.

Another error assigned is to the action of the court in allowing the testimony of the witness Campbell on the former trial to be read to the jury. The rule of practice, which, in civil actions at least, under certain circumstances, permits proof of what a witness stated at a previous trial between the same parties and upon the same issues, is conceded.

In 16 Cyc. 1088, the rule is stated thus: "The court must be satisfied (1) that the party against whom the evidence is offered, or his privy, was a party on the former trial; (2) that the issue is substantially the same in the two cases; (3) that the witness who proposes to testify to the former evidence is able to state it with satisfactory correctness; and (4) that a sufficient reason is shown why the original witness is not produced. The first three of these conditions render the reported evidence relevant. The fourth is necessary to justify the court in receiving it."

In the same work, at pages 1095, 1096, after declaring that such testimony is substitutionary, it is said: "The court will therefore insist upon being satisfied, not only that the situation of the case promises some advantage from its use, but also that a sufficient reason be shown why the original witness is not produced, and that it is impossible, fairly speaking, for the person offering the evidence to produce the living witness or to take his deposition." In note 24, on the quantum of proof necessary, it is declared that, "inasmuch as this species of testimony is admitted as a sort of judicial necessity, the proof of the facts which constitute the necessity for the departure from general rules ought to be clearly established before the testimony is admitted, as that the witness is dead, that diligent inquiry has been made for him where it is most likely he would be found, or that the defendant has caused his absence. The proof on this subject should be complete and satisfactory, as the question of the sufficiency of this proof would necessarily be confided largely to the discretion of the judge, and not be reviewable on appeal when properly exercised"—citing Sullivan v. State, 6 Tex. App. 319, 32 Am. Rep. 530.

Illustrations of what constitutes due diligence in such cases are given at page 1098, note 32: "To ascertain by writing to the postmaster of a certain town in a distant state that a former witness is not in the postmaster's town, but in another town of the postmaster's state (the Texas case, supra), or to show that the witness is reputed to be out of the state (Baldwin v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 68 Iowa, 37, 25 N. W. 918), or for an officer charged with the service of a subpoena to report that he has made diligent search for a witness at the supposed residence and been informed by persons unknown to him that they had heard that the witness was dead (Augusta, etc., R. Co. v. Randall, 85 Ga. 297, 11 S. E. 706), have been held under the facts of these particular cases not to be sufficient. Alleged absence from the jurisdiction must be established by the testimony of some one who knows the fact, or can testify to circumstances within his knowledge which will justify the inference of such fact. Baldwin v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 68 Iowa, 37, 25 N. W. 918; Reynolds v. Fitzpatrick, 28 Mont. 170, 72 Pac. 510. Statements by persons with peculiar means of knowledge may, together with lack of further opportunity for inquiry, suffice to admit the evidence. Thus, in case of an attesting witness, the reply of his parents that he was in America was considered by Mr. Justice Erie as 'reasonable evidence that the witness is out of the jurisdiction of the court.' Austin v. Rumsey, 2 C. & K. 738. The mere fact that a party who could have summoned a witness has preferred to rely on his promise to attend voluntarily is no reason for admitting the witness' former evidence. Provo City v. Shurtliff, 4 Utah, 15, 5 Pac. 302. The action of the court in deciding what search is sufficient will not be revised, in the absence of evidence of gross abuse of discretion. Vaughan v. State, 58 Ark. 353, 371, 24 S. W. 885; Clinton v. Estes, 20 Ark. 216."

In further discussion of the subject in the text, it is observed: "The more modern tendency is not only to require that the absence offered as a basis for admitting the former evidence should be permanent, but to require further that the party offering the evidence should show to the satisfaction of the court that he could not by the use of reasonable diligence have procured the deposition of the absent witness. Mere absence from the jurisdiction at the time of trial is a disability by no means equivalent to death, without affirmative evidence that a fruitless search has been conducted in good faith and with due diligence, and that, from ignorance of the witness' whereabouts or other reason, his deposition could not have been given."

The Virginia statute (Va. Code 1904, § 3365) provides that in a civil case at law a deposition taken on proper notice may be read, if, when offered, the witness be dead or out of the state. But it has been held that hearsay evidence that the deponent has left the country and has not returned is not sufficient to authorize the reading of his deposition. Collins v. Lowry, 2 Wash. 75 (2d Ed. 97). See, also, Powell v. Manson, 22 Grat. 177, 187, and cases cited.

Campbell resided at Pulaski, Va., and the foundation laid for admitting his former testimony was the statement of the sheriff of Wise county that he sought him at Blackwood and heard that he had left. The defendant in error also testified that in response to his inquiries he learned that Campbell had left Blackwood, and he believes he heard that he had gone to Knoxville. He says that at Norton a young man from Pulaski told him he did not think Campbell was at home. He likewise made inquiry of a man at Tom's Creek, who said that if Campbell was at Pulaski he did not know it, but that he had been absent from that place for several weeks, perhaps for one or two months. Witness admitted that he had neither written to Pulaski concerning Campbell's whereabouts, nor otherwise inquired for him at his home. It is true a subpoena, directed to the sheriff of Wise county, was returned "Not found"; but manifestly the return of an officer of a bailiwick other than that in which the witness usually resides affords but scant evidence of the fact that he is beyond the process of the court.

The preliminary evidence relied on in this instance is obviously insufficient to have warranted the introduction of Campbell's testimony at the first trial.

Errors are assigned to the action of the court in giving and refusing certain prayers; but they are dependent on evidence, and, as we cannot anticipate that the precise questions involved will likely arise at the next trial, it is unnecessary to notice these exceptions.

For the error of the trial court in the particular indicated, we are of opinion to reverse the judgment complained of, to set aside the verdict of the jury, and remand the case for a new trial.

CLEAR CREEK WATER CO., Inc., v.
GLADEVILLE IMP. CO.*

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 12, 1907.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN—EXTENT OF POWER—ACQUISITION OF WATER RIGHTS—STATUTES.

Under Va. Code 1904, § 1105c, cl. 2 (f), authorizing public service corporations to condemn "sand, earth, gravel, water or other material," and sections 1105f (4) and 1105f (5), prescribing the procedure for condemning any "land or other property or any interest or estate therein," and section 1105f (9), as amended by Acts 1906, p. 452, c. 257, providing that, on the payment of the compensation awarded and the confirmation of the report of the commissioners in proceedings to condemn property, the title shall vest in the petitioner, and declaring that nothing in the act shall authorize the condemnation of a less estate in the property taken than is owned by the party against whom the proceeding is instituted, which revises the law on the subject as embodied in Code 1873, c. 56, § 11, and Code 1887, c. 46, § 1079, a public service corporation may condemn a partial interest in land when a partial interest only is needed, and a public service water company may condemn the water rights of an inferior riparian proprietor, by condemning the right to divert water without condemning the land over which it flows.

2. SAME.

A public service water company sought to condemn the water rights of an inferior riparian owner without invading the land of the latter, and only desired to divert the water of a stream flowing through his land. The riparian owner owned the estate in fee simple, and his riparian rights were appurtenant to and coextensive with the estate. Held, that the company must participate in the water of the stream on the basis that the riparian owner's rights in the water were appurtenant to his estate, and must appropriate the perpetual easement of the owner therein.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wise County.

Proceedings by the Clear Creek Water Company, Incorporated, to condemn a water right of the Gladeville Improvement Company. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the petition and dismissing the proceeding, the petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Bullitt & Kelly and Jno. W. Chalkley, for appellant. Vicars & Peery, for appellee.

WHITTLE, J. The plaintiff in error, the Clear Creek Water Company, Incorporated, a public service corporation having authority to condemn lands, water, water rights, or any other property, and any estate or interest therein, for its uses and purposes, filed its petition in the circuit court of Wise county against the defendant in error, the Gladeville Improvement Company, an inferior riparian proprietor, under chapter 46b, Va. Code 1904, for the purpose of condemning certain riparian rights of the defendant in error in Clear creek, by intercepting and diverting all the waters in said creek and the two main forks thereof (or as much as would flow through a 12-inch pipe) into and through the plaintiff in error's pipe line at the point of its proposed intake, dams, and reservoir, above the lands of the defendant in error, to supply the inhabitants of the town of Norton with water for domestic purposes.

There was a demurrer to the petition, and the circuit court, "being of opinion that the law does not authorize a water company to condemn a water right only, but that it must, if it condemns at all, condemn the whole interest owned by the defendant, that is, the land itself," sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition.

That this ruling is a correct exposition of the law as it was under the Codes of 1873 (chapter 56, § 11) and 1887 (chapter 46, § 1079) is admitted. Indeed, the provisions referred to (which are identical) were so construed by this court in the cases of City of Roanoke v. Berkowitz, 80 Va. 616, and City of Charlottesville v. Maury, 96 Va. 383, 31 S. E. 520. In the latter case the court observes: "It may be true, as counsel for the city earnestly contend, that it is a great hardship upon the city to be compelled to condemn and pay for property which it does not need in order to get what is necessary for its purposes. This is an argument more properly addressed to the Legislature than the courts."

It is suggested that these decisions accentuated the necessity for a more liberal policy and induced the Legislature to revise the law and adopt the rule which at present obtains. However that may be, the statutes now in force manifest a legislative purpose to confer upon public service corporations the power to condemn interests in land other than the entire interest, when a partial and not the entire interest is needed for the purposes of the corporation.

Thus Va. Code 1904, § 1105c, cl. 2 (f), authorizes such corporations, "in the manner and subject to the limitations provided by the general statutes * * * for the condemnation of land," to condemn for their purposes "sand, earth, gravel, water, or other material"; and sections 1105f (4) and 1105f (5) prescribe the procedure for condemning any "land or other property, or any interest or estate therein." This phraseology characterizes the various provisions of chapter 46b, and differentiates them from the statutes construed in the cases cited.

Section 1079 of the Code of 1887 declares that upon the payment to the parties entitled thereto, or into court, of the sum ascertained by the commissioners as a just compensation for the land taken and for damages to the residue of the tract, "the title to that part of the land for which compensation is allowed shall be absolutely vested in the company * * * in fee simple, except in the case of a turnpike company, when a sufficient right of way only for the purposes of said company shall be vested"; while the corresponding provision of the present statute (section 1105f (9), as amended Acts 1906, p. 452, c. 257), is as follows: "Upon such payment, either to the person entitled thereto or into court, and confirmation of the report, the title to the part of the land, and to the other property for which compensation is allowed, shall be absolutely vested in the company, in fee simple, except in the case of a turnpike company, when a sufficient right of way only for the purpose of such company shall be used, and except also the case of any other company, when, if the notice of the application to the court shall so specify or describe, and the petition shall so pray, the interest or estate as shall be so specified and prayed for shall be vested. Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed as authorizing the condemnation of a less estate in the property taken than is owned by the party against whom the proceeding is." The italicized words constitute the limitation imposed by the amendment in Acts 1906, p. 452, c. 257.

Among other definitions, Bouvier observes that "estate" "signifies that quantity of interest which a person has, from absolute ownership down to naked possession." It is in this sense that the term is employed in the amended act of 1906. It denotes the quantity of interest of the owner in the subject sought to be condemned. Prior thereto it might have been competent to carve an inferior estate (e. g., an estate for life or years) out of the fee simple, and to have condemned the lesser estate, leaving the reversion in the owner. The purpose of the amendment was to abolish a provision so obviously unjust to the owner, and to require the condemnation of the entire estate in the property proposed to be taken.

It will be noticed that the word "interest" does not occur in the amendment. So far as the "interest" which may be condemned is concerned, the statute is left intact. The amendment deals only with the "estate." Authority to condemn interests in "any land, sand, earth, gravel, water, or other material" is left unimpaired; but the entire estate in such parts of these various subjects as is proposed to be taken, whatever that estate may be, must be condemned.

In this instance the plaintiff in error's water mains are to connect with a reservoir above, and will not invade the land of the inferior riparian owner. The company needs to intercept and divert the water of the stream for its purposes, but has no occasion to use the bed of the creek, and may not, therefore, be required to condemn the land over which the water flows. But the defendant in error owns an estate in fee simple in the lower premises, and its riparian rights in the water are appurtenant to and coextensive with that estate. The condemning company must therefore participate in the water of the stream on that basis, and expropriate the perpetual easement of the defendant in error therein.

Interests in water, as well as in land, are subject to the law of eminent domain. Hamor v. Bar Harbor Water Co., 78 Me. 127, 3 Atl. 40. Such interests are indispensable to water companies, and when the waters of a stream are diverted, the inferior riparian proprietor is entitled to compensation for the use of the water of which he is deprived. This principle is illustrated by numerous decisions. The following have more or less pertinency to the case in judgment: Cooper v. Williams, 5 Ohio, 391, 24 Am. Dec. 299; Glizinger v. Saugerties Water Co., 66 Hun, 173, 21 N. Y. Supp. 121; Smith v. City of Rochester, 92 N. Y. 463, 44 Am. Rep. 393; Heilman v. Union Canal Co., 50 Pa. 268; Stein v. Burden, 24 Ala. 130, 60 Am. Dec. 453; Burden v. Stein, 27 Ala. 104, 62 Am. Dec. 758; Trenton Water Power Co. v. Raff, 36 N. J. Law, 335; Avery v. Fox, Fed. Cas. No. 674, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 246.

The remaining ground of demurrer, based on the alleged insufficiency of the plat which the statute requires shall accompany the petition, is not sustained by the record, and was properly overruled.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the law on the demurrer to the petition is with the plaintiff in error, and it must, consequently, be overruled, and the case remanded for further proceedings.

Reversed.

BATTERSHALL et al. v. ROBERTS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 12, 1907.)

EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF—TIME FOR PRESENTATION, ALLOWANCE, AND FILING.

Va. Code 1904, § 3385, provides that a bill of exceptions may be signed by the judge, either during the term at which the opinion of the court is announced, or in vacation within 30 days after the end of such term, or at such other time as the parties, by consent entered of record, may agree on, and that any bill so signed shall be a part of the record. Held, where a final judgment was entered for plaintiff at the term at which the verdict was returned, and defendants allowed until the next term to file a bill of exceptions, and at the next term, not by consent of record, but on motion of defendants, they were allowed until the next term, and by similar orders the matter of authenticating and filing the bill was kept open and carried from term to term until the same was filed, that the bill so signed and copied into the record was not properly authenticated and could not be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 21, Exceptions, Bill of, § 72½.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Carroll County.

Ejectment by Catherine Roberts against M. E. Battershall and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Bolen & Tipton, for appellants. N. P. Oglesby and M. M. Caldwell, for appellee.

CARDWELL, J. This is an action of ejectment, brought in the circuit court of Carroll county, in which the jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff in fee simple the land in the declaration mentioned." And the final order in the case, entered at the term at which the verdict was returned, is as follows:

"Whereupon the defendants moved the court to set aside the verdict of the jury and grant them a new trial, which motion the court overruled. The defendants then moved the court in arrest of judgment, which latter motion the court likewise overruled. Therefore it is considered by the court that the plaintiff recover against the defendant the land in the declaration mentioned in fee simple, as therein claimed and specified, and her costs by her about her suit in this behalf expended. To which ruling of the court in refusing to set aside the said verdict and to arrest the judgment the defendants excepted, and they are allowed to the next term to file their bill of exceptions and spread the facts."

On the 9th day of May, 1905, at a subsequent term of the court, this order was entered: "On motion of the defendants they are allowed until the next term of this court to file their bills of exceptions and spread the facts in the case." A similar order was made at a still subsequent term, September 14, 1905, and again on the 12th day of December, 1905; and finally, at a term of the court held on the 10th day of March, 1906, an order was entered in the cause as follows: "The defendants this day presented their four bills of exceptions, in which are contained the facts proven on the trial of the case, which bills are signed, sealed, and made a part of the record." Then follow the four bills of exceptions referred to, to which a memorandum, signed by counsel for plaintiff and defendants, is annexed, in the following words: "The foregoing four bills of exceptions have been examined and agreed to."

The first question presented for our consideration is: Are the bills of exceptions copied into the record properly authenticated?

If the memorandum annexed to the four bills of exceptions could be construed as an agreement between counsel that the bills of exceptions might be then signed and made a part of the record, the question still remains whether or not they could by such an agreement be ingrafted upon the record for consideration by this court.

In the case of Virginia Development Co. v. Rich Patch Iron Co., 98 Va. 700, 37 S. E. 280, the final order entered in the circuit court contained the following language: "By agreement of counsel, and for reasons appearing to the court, leave is hereby given the plaintiff to file bills of exception within 60 days from the rising of the court, such bills to have the same effect as if signed, sealed, enrolled, and filed during the present term." And this court held that there was no authority under the statute for the circuit court to sign bills of exceptions after the term at which the final judgment was entered, and that bills of exceptions so signed and copied into the record were not properly authenticated and could not be considered.

Following the decision in that case, the statute in force since the adoption of the Code of 1849—which provided that bills of exceptions could be signed during the term at which the final judgment was entered (Hudgins v. Simon, 94 Va. 659, 27 S. E. 606)—was amended by an act approved February 15, 1901 (Acts 1901, p. 186, c. 172), so that any bill of exceptions might be tendered to the judge and signed by him, either during the term at which the opinion of the court was announced to which exception was taken, or in vacation within 30 days after such term, or at such other time as the parties by consent entered of record might agree upon, and that any bill of exceptions so tendered shall be part of the record of the case. Va. Code 1904, § 3385.

It is clear, upon reading the statute as thus amended, that in order to clothe the judge of the trial court with authority after the court is adjourned for the term to authenticate and make part of the record bills of exceptions to rulings of the court noted during the trial, as was attempted in this instance, the consent of the parties that this may be done must be entered of record as a part of the final order of the court in the cause.

As was said in Lynchburg Cotton Mills v. Stanley, 102 Va. 590, 46 S. E. 908, the object of the act was to extend the time within which bills of exceptions might be taken; but, in order to perfect bills of exceptions duly taken to rulings during the trial, they must be presented in vacation within 30 days after final judgment, or within such time as the parties shall agree of record.

In Hoover v. Saunders, 104 Va. 783, 52 S. E. 657, it was held that, in the absence of any agreement between the parties, bills of exceptions can only be signed during the term at which the opinion of the court is announced to which exception is taken, or in the immediately succeeding vacation, within 30 days after the end of that term. They cannot be signed during a succeeding term, nor during any other vacation than that immediately succeeding the term at which the opinion was announced. The beginning of a new term, although within 30 days, puts an end to the court's jurisdiction to sign such bill.

It appears in this case, not only that a final judgment was entered at the March term, 1905, of the circuit court, but that the court, by its order entered at its subsequent May term, 1905—not by consent of the parties entered of record, as the statute requires, but on the motion of the defendants—allowed the defendants until the next term of the court to file their bills of exceptions, etc., and by similar orders the matter of authenticating and filing the bills of exceptions was kept open until the March term of the court, 1906, which was wholly without any authority conferred by the statute.

In Va. Devel. Co. v. Rich Patch I. Co., supra, it is shown that the power to authenticate bills of exceptions and make them a part of the record in the trial of a case at law in which a writ of error or supersedeas lies to a higher court is of statutory origin, and that by the terms of our statute then in force it could not be exercised after the end of the term at which the final judgment was rendered; that, in order to give the court at a subsequent term authority to add to the record by signing a bill of exception, some control must be reserved by the court over the case, as by failure to enter a judgment, by entering a motion for a new trial and continuing it until the next term, or by leave reserved to sign a bill of exception on or before a particular day of the next term, and the presentation of the bill of exception for signature in accordance with the terms of the leave reserved. In other words, the statute conferring authority upon the trial court to add to the record by signing a bill of exception must be strictly observed; the signing of bills of exceptions so as to make them part of the record being a judicial act, and such a judicial act as the court itself was powerless at common law to perform, even during the term at which the judgment was rendered, or at any time.

In the case at bar the statute has not been observed. Therefore, though with regret, we have to reach the conclusion that the bills of exceptions copied into the record are not properly authenticated and cannot be considered.

It is, perhaps, well to call attention to the fact that more miscarriages, in the effort to bring the rulings of trial courts under review in this court, have occurred in the six years since the amended statute, supra, has been in force than in all the years prior to its passage. And why? Simply because the statute has not, in the cases where the miscarriages have occurred, been strictly followed, as is absolutely necessary in order to confer authority upon the judges of trial courts to sign a bill of exceptions and make it a part of the record after the adjournment of the term at which the final judgment in the cause is entered.

The bills of exceptions copied into this record, not being properly authenticated, for that reason cannot be considered, and therefore, no error appearing in the judgment of the circuit court, it has to be affirmed.

HART et al. v. DARTER et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 12, 1907.)

WILLS — EQUITY — JURISDICTION — CONSTRUCTION OF WILLS.

Testator devised all his lands to his six living children, and provided that "if one sells, sell it to one of six, and if one dies with esue, its part shall go to the other children." Held, that a court of equity was without jurisdiction of a bill to construe such clause of his will, and to have it adjudged that the words "with esue" meant "without issue," and determine whether devisees could sell to persons other than devisees; devisees under such clause of the will obtaining purely legal titles, and the construction of wills not being of itself a ground of equity jurisdiction, but only an incident to the court's jurisdiction on some one of the recognized grounds of equity jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, § 1666.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Scott County.

Bill by W. H. Hart and others against M. L. Darter and others. Decree for defendants, and complainants appeal. Affirmed.

Richmond & Bond, for appellants. W. S. Cox, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. In the year 1882 the will of Eyre Hart, deceased, was admitted to probate. The object of this suit, which was instituted by certain of the devisees under the sixth clause of the will, was to have that clause, which is as follows, construed:

"I will all my lands to my 6 living children, Elizabeth Hobbs has received her full portion of all I possess, my living children W. H. Hart, B. F. Hart, M. Donihio, M. S. Darter, J. B. Hellon, Virginia Hart, and if one sells, sell it to one of six, and if one dies with esue, its part shall go to the other children."

The trial court, upon a hearing of the cause, dismissed the bill without prejudice to the rights of any party, upon the ground that the case was not in such a condition as to permit a decision of the matter in issue.

It appears from the record that the devisees under the sixth clause of the will partitioned the land devised them and took possession of their respective shares; that all the devisees are living, some having children and others none; that some have aliened their interest in the land devised to persons other than devisees. The bill alleges that doubt and uncertainty exist as to the exact rights of the parties in the land devised, which greatly incumber and hamper the complainants in dealing with their interest in the same, and that the complainants are advised that it is necessary, in order to ascertain the respective interests of the devisees, to have the will judicially construed. The prayer for relief is that the court will construe the sixth clause of the will and adjudge that the words "with esue" therein be held to mean "without issue," and determine whether the devisees who have attempted to alien their interest had a legal right to sell to persons other than the devisees under that clause, to determine any other matter deemed pertinent by the court or required by any party in interest, and for general relief.

While the bill prays for general relief, it is clear from its allegations that the suit was brought solely for the purpose of having the sixth clause of the will construed by the court, and that no case is made for further relief. The first question, therefore, to be determined, is whether or not a court of equity has jurisdiction of the case made.

The courts are not, in accord as to the ground of the jurisdiction of a court of equity to interpret and enforce the provisions of a will. Some hold that such jurisdiction is merely an incident to its general jurisdiction over trusts, and that it will not exercise its powers to construe a will which only deals with and disposes of purely legal estates or interests in land, and makes no attempt to create any trust relation in respect to the property devised. Others hold that its jurisdiction arises from the complicated character of the provisions of the will, from the difficulty of understanding their meaning, and from the doubt and uncertainty as to the rights of the parties claiming under them. Sec. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1155 to 1157, and cases cited; note to Crosson v. Dwyer, 2 Am. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 687-690, and cases cited. But the prevailing doctrine in this country is that, in order to give a court of equity jurisdiction to take cognizance of and construe or interpret a will, there must be an actual litigation in respect to a matter which is the proper subject of jurisdiction of a court of equity as distinguished from a court of law.

Pomeroy, in discussing this question, says (section 1156) that "the doctrine which seems to be both in harmony with principle and sustained by the weight of authority is that the special jurisdiction to construe wills is simply an incident of the general jurisdiction over trusts; that a court of equity will never entertain a suit brought solely for the purpose of interpreting the provisions of a will, without any further relief, and will never exercise a power to interpret a will which only deals with and disposes of purely legal estates or interests, and which makes no attempt to create any trust relations with respect to the property donated."

In the case of Chipman v. Montgomery, 63 N. Y. 221, 230, it is said: "The rule is that to put a court of equity in motion there must be an actual litigation in respect to matters which are the proper subjects of the jurisdiction of that court, as distinguished from a court of law. It is by reason of the jurisdiction of courts of chancery over trusts that courts having equitable powers as an incident to that jurisdiction take cognizance of and pass upon the interpretation of wills. They do not take jurisdiction of actions brought solely for the construction of instruments of that character, nor when only legal rights are in controversy." 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1155.

In this state, as in England, courts of equity have jurisdiction over the administration and settlement of decedents' estates, whether the deceased die with or without a will, and in the exercise of and as incident to that jurisdiction they construe and enforce wills of personal property. See Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1155; Adair v. Shaw, 1 Sch. & Lef. 243, 262; Nelson v. Cornwell, 11 Grat. (Va.) 724, 737.

The English courts of chancery, under their general jurisdiction over trusts, had the power to construe and enforce wills of real as well as of personal property, so far as they create or their disposition involves the creation of trusts; but "so far," says Pomeroy, "as a will of real property bequeaths purely legal titles, and the devisees therein obtain purely legal titles to the land given, the enforcement thereof belongs to the courts of law by means of the action of ejectment, the courts of law having full power to construe and interpret the instrument and to determine the rights of the devisees. There is no necessity, and therefore no power, of resorting to a court of equity in order to obtain a construction of such wills." Section 1155; Bowers v. Smith, 10 Paige (N. Y.) 193; 16 Cyc. 54-101.

No case involving the precise question now under consideration has been before this court; but in the case of Snyder v. Grandstaff, 96 Va. 482, 31 S. E. 647, 70 Am. St. Rep. 863, it was treated as settled law by the learned circuit judge who decided the case, and whose opinion was approved and adopted by this court, that the construction or interpretation of wills and deeds was not of itself a ground of equity jurisdiction, but that the power to construe such writings was simply an incident to the court's jurisdiction over a case on some one of the recognized grounds of equity jurisdiction. This view, as we have seen, is in accord with correct principles, is sustained by the weight of authority, and should be adhered to, although perhaps not necessary to a decision of that case.

The clause of the will which this suit was brought to have interpreted, whatever the interest given be, it is clear, disposes of purely legal estates or interests and makes no attempt to create any trust relation in respect to the land devised. There being no trust relation involved in the devise, and no other ground of equity jurisdiction shown, the bill was properly dismissed by the circuit court, and its decree must be affirmed.

ISAAC EBERLY CO. v. GIBSON et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept 12, 1907.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—RIGHTS ACQUIRED.

A maker of a note, who, on receiving notice of the assignment thereof, promises the assignee to pay it and assures him that it is all right, cannot by any transaction with the payee render it void and uncollectible in the hands of the assignee.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 7, Bills and Notes, § 767.]

2. SAME.

A merchant sold his stock in bulk, without complying with Va. Code 1904, § 2460a, prohibiting a merchant from selling his stock without making an inventory thereof and a schedule of his creditors, etc. The buyer bought in good faith and in ignorance of the law. He executed notes for a part of the purchase price. The merchant assigned them to a creditor. The buyer assured the creditor that the notes were all right and promised to pay them at maturity. The creditor, on the faith of the assurance, took no action to enforce his claim against the merchant. The buyer thereafter resold the stock to the merchant. Held, that the buyer was liable on the notes, for to permit him to repudiate the promise would operate as a fraud on the creditor.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Buchanan County.

Suit by the Isaac Eberly Company against

B. G. Gibson and others. From a decree granting insufficient relief, complainant appeals. Reversed in part, and remanded.

Routh & Routh, for appellant. Finney & Stinson, for appellees.

CARDWELL, J. It appears that Paris Charles was, on June 3, 1904, and prior thereto, engaged in the retail mercantile business, buying his stock from wholesale merchants in the usual manner; that on the date named he sold his stock of merchandise in bulk, invoicing at $1,700.44, to B. G. Gibson; that Charles was indebted to the Isaac Eberly Company, complainant in the court below and appellant here, a wholesale company, in the sum of $995.35 for goods sold him; that Charles was indebted to other merchants in various sums for goods equal in value to the stock sold to Gibson; that the sale to Gibson was not in the ordinary course of trade, but with the intent on the part of Charles to quit the mercantile business; that Charles and Gibson made no inventory of the goods at the time of the sale, as required by the statute (now section 2460a, Va. Code 1904), nor complied with any of the other provisions of the statute; that Gibson paid Charles on the stock of goods that day taken possession of by Gibson $400 in cash, two mules at the value of $400, and executed notes for the balance of the purchase money to Charles, two of which notes (one for $300, due 8 months after date, June 3, 1904, with interest from date, and another for $300, bearing the same date, due 12 months after date, with interest from date) were on July 14, 1904, duly assigned by Charles to appellant for a valuable consideration, and when collected were to go as a credit on the debt of Charles to appellant, above mentioned; that after the assignment of these notes, and on the same day, Gibson was notified by appellant of the assignment, and he assured appellant that the notes were all right and promised that he would pay them at maturity, even going to the extent of saying that he would pay them before maturity if a discount would be allowed upon them, but refused to give any security for their payment. At this interview between appellant's agent and Gibson, the latter's attention was called to the statute above referred to, which provides that it shall be unlawful for any merchant buying and selling merchandise, while he is indebted to any person, to sell his entire stock of merchandise in bulk, or to sell the major portion thereof otherwise than in the ordinary course of trade, in the regular and usual prosecution of the seller's business, etc., and that if the terms of the statute prescribing in what manner and under what conditions a merchant engaged in buying and selling merchandise may sell his entire stock in bulk, or the major portion thereof otherwise than in the ordinary course of business, etc., were not complied with, the sale would prima facie be presumed to be void and fraudulent as against the creditors of such seller, and the merchandise, or such other part thereof as might be found in the hands of the purchaser, should be liable to the creditors of the seller, and in the event that the same, or any part thereof, be withdrawn by the purchaser, then the purchaser himself should be liable to the creditors of such seller for the merchandise so received by him and thus withdrawn. Upon obtaining this information from appellant's agent, Gibson declared that he did not know of the statute, and that he was sorry that he did not know of it sooner, as he had paid off one of the notes executed by him to Charles; the note so paid off being held by an assignee of Charles other than appellant or Charles himself. On the following day, namely, the 15th of June, 1904, Gibson executed, delivered, and had recorded in the clerk's office of Buchanan county a deed to his wife, conveying to her, in consideration of $800, said to have been in hand paid, a tract of land situated in that county, containing 203 acres; and on July 30, 1904, notwithstanding declarations on his part to the agent of appellant that he still had the stock of goods in question in possession and intended to hold on to them, he made a pretended resale of what remained back to Charles, without any pretense of complying with the provisions of the statute, supra; whereupon Charles, on the same date, executed to one C. W. McCoy, trustee, a deed of trust on this stock of goods to secure to the creditors of Charles, other than appellant, the one $1,100 and the other $466. It further appears that from the time Gibson obtained this stock of goods from Charles, on the 3d day of June, 1904, to the date of his pretended resale of the same to Charles, on July 30, 1904, he had sold of the goods the amount of $235.77, so that the invoice price of the goods at the pretended resale to Charles was $1,464.67.

At the second August rules, 1904, appellant filed its original bill in this cause (which is the only bill copied in this record), setting out the foregoing facts, and relying upon them as showing that the deed from Gibson to his wife, as well as the pretended resale of the stock of goods by Gibson to Charles, were fraudulent transactions, made and had for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of Charles, especially appellant, and charging that Gibson was liable to appellant, not only for the $235.77 realized by him from the sale of a part of the goods while in his possession, but for the two notes of $300 each, above mentioned, and that appellant was entitled to a lien therefor upon the tract of land which Gibson had fraudulently conveyed to his wife.

Upon the hearing of the cause upon the bill, the answer of Gibson, and depositions of witnesses, the circuit court held that appellant was not entitled to recover of Gibson the amount of the two notes of $300 each, executed by Gibson to Charles and by the latter assigned to appellant and sued on, but that Gibson was liable to the creditors of Charles for the difference between the amount of the goods turned over to him by Charles and the amount of the goods returned to Charles by Gibson, namely, the difference between $1,700.44 and $1,464.67, and interest thereon, and that the same should be paid to appellant, the first and only creditor attacking that transaction; and it was adjudged, ordered, and decreed that appellant recover of Gibson the sum of $235.77, with interest thereon from the 30th day of July, 1904, until paid, and costs of its suit, and that as to this recovery the deed executed on the 15th day of July, 1904, by Gibson to his wife, Cordella Gibson, conveying certain lands therein described, was not made for consideration deemed valuable in law, but was made with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud appellant, as a creditor of B. G. Gibson, and therefore was fraudulent and void as to its debt against Gibson, and that this decree be a lien upon the lands in question, to be enforced by proper decree to be thereafter entered in the cause.

From this decree the appeal under consideration is taken, and we are asked to reverse it only in so far as it holds that the two notes executed by Gibson to Charles for $300 each, and assigned by the latter to appellant, are void and uncollectible because of failure of the consideration for which they were executed; the effect of the decree being that, the sale of the stock of goods from Charles to Gibson having been made without a compliance with the provisions of the statute, supra, the transaction was void, and therefore the consideration for which the notes in question were executed failed.

Besides the fact, already mentioned, that after the assignment of these notes to appellant Gibson not only recognized them as valid obligations which he was bound in law to meet, but expressly promised appellant that he would pay the notes, the statute does not declare that the sale of the goods was fraudulent and void as to Gibson, the buyer, but only that the sale was prima facie presumed to be fraudulent and void as to the creditors of the seller, and, further, that the merchandise in the hands of the purchaser, or any part thereof, if it be found in his hands, should be liable to such creditors, and in the event that the same or any part thereof be withdrawn by the purchaser then the purchaser himself personally shall also be liable to said creditors of such seller to the extent of the merchandise so received by him and thus withdrawn.

The contention of appellant is that after notice to appellee, Gibson, of the assignment of the notes to appellant, Gibson and Charles could by no subsequent transaction invalidate the notes in the hands of the assignee; and this contention is clearly sound. The notes in the hands of appellant were only subject to any equities between Charles and Gibson prior to notice of the assignment, and it is not pretended by Gibson or any one else that any such equity existed at the time of the assignment and notice to him on July 14, 1904; and, had there been, his express promise to pay and assurances to the representative of appellant that the notes were all right would have destroyed even such prior equities, much more any arising after notice of the assignment. This principle is rightly carried in such a case so far as to work an estoppel against the debtor and the assignor. The express promise of Gibson to appellant to pay these notes, and his assurances that they were all right, meant, of course, that he had no prior equities to set up against them, and concluded him as to any right by a transaction with Charles to render the notes void and uncollectible. Had he not attempted to do this, as he gave assurances that he would not do, the goods would have remained in his possession and been liable to appellant for the payment and satisfaction of the notes in question, by virtue of section 2460a of the Code of 1904, relied on by the circuit court as giving appellant a lien upon the money received by Gibson from a sale of a part of the goods while they were in his possession.

According to the answer of Gibson there was no fraud or dishonesty in his purchase of the stock of goods in question from Charles, and hence it was an innocent and valid purchase. Therefore the prima facie fraud was eliminated, and Gibson was the owner of the goods free from any consequences and results imposed by the statute, supra, under no obligations to the creditors of Charles, and was clothed with the right to hold the goods by payment, either directly to Charles or to his assignee, of the invoice price thereof evidenced by the notes he had given, so that the notes were for a legal and valid consideration, and Gibson could not by his own act relieve himself of the express promise to pay them to appellant.

In Stebbins v. Bruce, 80 Va. 389, while it is held to be settled law in this state that the assignee of nonnegotiable paper stands in the shoes of his assignor and takes subject to all defenses of the debtor against the assignor existing before notice of assignment, it is further held that where, after notice of assignment, the debtor expressly or impliedly promises to pay the debt, he is estopped from setting up any defense he had against the assignor. The opinion in that case recognizes the correctness of the statement of the law in the authorities cited, to the effect that while no acknowledgment made after an assignment will prevent the debtor from proving, if he can, any equity against the assignor before he had notice of the assignment, he will be estopped from setting up any equity or defense, however well founded originally, if by his assurance made beforehand he has induced the assignee to acquire the debt, and that the assignee in general only holds an equitable interest in the assigned instrument. This statement of the law is declared to be subject to the qualification that where, after notice of the assignment, the debtor expressly or impliedly promises the assignee to pay the debt, he will be concluded thereby, if the retraction of such promise would operate as a fraud upon the assignee. "In this and other like cases," says the opinion, "where the assignee has been influenced to act, or to refrain from taking action, by the representations of the debtor, to permit the latter to repudiate those representations to the injury of the former would be contrary no less to the well-settled rule of the common law than to the plainest principles of natural justice. And the same principle prevails in equity."

This qualification of the rule of law in that case applies with full force to the case at bar, for it plainly appears from the facts already stated that the effort on the part of appellee, Gibson, to retract his promise to appellant to pay the two notes in question, operated as a fraud upon the appellant. Relying upon the promises and assurances given by Gibson that the notes were all right and that he would pay them, appellant took no action to enforce its indebtedness against Charles, and without any notice whatever to appellant Gibson permitted the stock of goods to be withdrawn by Charles, so that the latter could and did put them beyond the reach of appellant by conveying title there to and transferring the possession thereof to a trustee for the benefit of the creditors of Charles other than appellant.

Ignorance of the law could not avail Gibson, and to permit him, under the facts and circumstances appearing in the record, to retract his assurances to appellant with reference to the two notes in question, or to repudiate his express promise to pay them, would operate, in our opinion, as a fraud upon the rights of appellant, and be, not only contrary to the established law, but to the "plainest principles of natural justice." Stebbins v. Bruce, supra; 2 Min. Inst. 326; 1 Greenleaf on Ev. (15th Ed.) § 207; 2 Pom. Eq. (3d Ed.) § 812.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the decree of the circuit court, in so far as it holds that the appellant is not entitled to recover of the appellee, B. G. Gibson, the two notes, of $300 each, executed by Gibson to Paris Charles and by the latter assigned to appellant, is erroneous; and we are further of opinion that appellant is entitled to a lien on the tract of land conveyed by Gibson to his wife by deed of July 15, 1904, for the amount of said notes, with interest thereon from their maturity, as well as the lien for the sum of $235.77, with interest thereon from the 30th day of July, 1904, until paid, with the costs of this suit, as decreed by the circuit court. Therefore the said decree, to the extent that it denies appellant the right to recover of Gibson the amount of said notes and a lien upon said land as security for their payment, will be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded to the circuit court to be further proceeded with in accordance with this opinion.

Reversed in part.

BARNES v. TIDEWATER RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 12, 1907.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN—DETERMINATION OF COMPENSATION—JUDICIAL REVIEW.

The determination of commissioners appointed to ascertain the compensation for land sought to be taken in proceedings to condemn land and to award damages to property not taken will not be disturbed, unless the award is clearly excessive or inadequate.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Eminent Domain, § 685.]

2. SAME.

In proceedings by a railway company to condemn land, the commissioners, after viewing the premises and hearing the testimony, decided that a tract not taken would not be injured. On the hearing of the exceptions to the report the owner showed by eight witnesses that the commissioners erred in not giving damages, and the company showed by six witnesses that the property would not be damaged. There was no showing of prejudice or corruption on the part of the commissioners. Held, that the court properly confirmed the report of the commissioners.

Error to Corporation Court of Roanoke.

Proceedings by the Tidewater Railway Company to condemn land owned by H. C. Barnes. There was a judgment confirming the report of the commissioners appointed to award the compensation and damages, and H. C. Barnes brings error. Affirmed.

Robertson & Wingfield, for plaintiff in error. Robertson, Hall & Woods, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This proceeding was instituted by the Tidewater Railway Company for the purpose of condemning and acquiring title to a portion of certain land owned by H. C. Barnes, the plaintiff in error.

It appears that the plaintiff in error owned two parcels of land, one located on the south side of Ferdinand avenue, in the city of Roanoke, through which the railroad passes, and the other on the north side of the same avenue, no part of which is taken for railroad purposes. Commissioners were appointed by the court to ascertain a just compensation for the land taken, and to award the damages to the adjacent or other property of the defendant, Barnes, or to the property of any other person, beyond the peculiar benefits that would accrue to such properties, respectively, from the construction and operation of the works of the railroad company.

The commissioners found the aggregate of land taken to be 3.31 acres, more or less, and assessed the compensation therefor at $1,250.

They further ascertained that the damages to the adjacent and other property of the plaintiff in error, by reason of the construction and operation of the works of the company, beyond the peculiar benefits that would accrue to such properties, respectively, was $2,650, making an aggregate finding for land and damages in favor of H. C. Barnes of $3,900. They further found and reported that no damage was done to the property of any person other than the plaintiff in error.

This report was excepted to by the plaintiff in error, upon the ground that the compensation and damages awarded were inadequate, and because no damage was allowed for the property on the north side of Ferdinand avenue. The commissioners made no separate finding as to the property on the north side of Ferdinand avenue; but the testimony taken in the case shows that upon due consideration thereof they reached the conclusion that the land on the north side of the avenue would not be damaged by the construction and operation of the railroad. It was agreed at the hearing that the $3,900 awarded by the commissioners should be accepted in full satisfaction of all compensation and damage to which the plaintiff in error was entitled, except that which it was contended would be sustained by the land on the north side of the avenue from the construction and operation of the railroad, as to which the commissioners concluded no damage accrued.

On the hearing of the exception, which was under the agreement limited in the manner already indicated, both parties introduced evidence on the question as to whether or not the property on the north side of Ferdinand avenue would be depreciated in value by the construction and operation of the railroad. After hearing the evidence the court entered the judgment complained of, overruling the exception of the plaintiff in error, and confirming the report of the commissioners.

The only error assigned by the petitioner is that the report of the commissioners should have been set aside because it allowed no damages for the land on the north side of Ferdinand avenue, no part of which was taken. In support of this assignment the plaintiff in error discusses the act concerning the exercise of the power of eminent domain, the damages thereby contemplated for injury done to land lying adjacent to that taken by the construction and operation of a railroad, and elaborately considers the elements of injury that should be regarded in such a case; it being insisted that the evidence before the commissioners and before the court shows that the land on the north side of the avenue will be injuriously affected by the operation and construction of the proposed railroad.

In disposing of this case it is unnecessary for us to follow the consideration and discussion given by counsel for plaintiff in error to the "eminent domain act"; for, if his view as to the proper construction of the statute be sound (as to which we express no opinion), it could not affect the result in this case, there being nothing in the record to show that there has been any failure on the part of the court or the commissioners to consider all the elements of injury which it is insisted should be considered. The court was not asked to instruct the commissioners as to the elements of injury they should consider, nor does any issue touching that matter appear of record to have been presented in any other form. The order appointing the commissioners follows, substantially, the language of the statute, and explicitly directs that they go upon the premises and view the land or other property, or such interest or estate therein, wanted by the railroad for its purposes, and, after viewing the same and hearing such proper evidence as either party may offer, ascertain a just compensation therefor, and award the damages, if any, resulting to the adjacent or other property of the defendant, or the property of any other person, beyond the peculiar benefits that will accrue to such properties, respectively, from the construction and operation of the works of said company. The report of the commissioners also follows the language of the statute, and shows that, after ascertaining a just compensation for the land taken, they estimated the damages resulting to the adjacent and other property of the owner, by reason of the construction and operation of the railroad, beyond the peculiar benefits, etc.; and the evidence shows that the commissioners duly considered the land north of Ferdinand avenue, viewed the premises, and, after hearing the testimony of witnesses introduced by the parties, reached the conclusion that the land north of Ferdinand avenue was not injured by the construction and operation of the railroad.

The sole question presented for our determination is whether or not the lower court erred in overruling the exception taken to the conclusion and finding of the commissioners and in confirming their report.

The doctrine is well established that the findings of a commission in a case like this are entitled to great weight, and are not to be disturbed by the courts, except in instances where excessive or inadequate estimates on their part is shown by very clear evidence. For error of judgment of the commissioners in arriving at the amount of damages, if any, there can be no correction, especially where the evidence is conflicting, unless the damages allowed are so excessive or inadequate as to show prejudice or corruption.

As said by Judge Keith, in Railroad Co. v. Chamblin, 100 Va. 401, 406, 41 S. E. 750, 752: "The best that can be done is to appoint capable and upright commissioners to go upon the land, examine it, hear testimony, and consider all the facts and circumstances surrounding the situation and likely to enter into the value of the subject, and thus ascertain what is the value of the land to be taken, and the effect of such taking upon the residue of the tract." Cranford Paving Co. v. Baum, 97 Va. 501, 24 S. E. 906; R. & P. R. Co. v. Seaboard, etc., Co., 103 Va. 399, 49 S. E. 512; Tidewater Ry. Co. v. Cowan, 106 Va. 817, 56 S. E. 819, 1 Va. App. 177; Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S. 282, 13 Sup. Ct. 361, 37 L. Ed. 170.

In the case last cited the court, at page 306 of 147 U. S., page 393 of 13 Sup. Ct., 37 L. Ed. 170, says: "The rule on this subject is so well settled that we shall content ourselves with repeating an apt quotation from Mills on Eminent Domain, 246, made in the opinion of the court below: 'An appellate court will not interfere with the report of commissioners to correct the amount of damages, except in cases of gross error, showing prejudice or corruption. The commissioners hear the evidence and frequently make their principal evidence out of a view of the premises, and this evidence cannot be carried up, so as to correct the report as being against the weight of evidence. Hence for an error in the judgment of commissioners in arriving at the amount of damages there can be no correction, especially where the evidence is conflicting. Commissioners are not bound by the opinions of experts or by the apparent weight of evidence, but may give their own conclusions.'"

In the case at bar there is no suggestion of prejudice or corruption on the part of the commissioners. It appears that, after viewing the premises and hearing the testimony of the witnesses introduced by the parties, the commissioners reached the conclusion that the adjacent or other land of plaintiff in error, lying on the north side of Ferdinand avenue, would suffer no injury from the construction and operation of the railroad, and therefore no damage was reported on that account. It further appears that upon the hearing of the exception taken to the report of the commissioners the evidence was very conflicting; the plaintiff in error introducing eight witnesses, who testified that the commission committed error in arriving at the conclusion that the property in question would not be damaged, and the defendant in error six witnesses, who sustain the judgment of the commissioners by testifying that in their opinion the property would not be damaged. After hearing this evidence the learned judge of the lower court, who had the opportunity of seeing the witnesses and of observing their manner of testifying, was of opinion that the exception to the commissioners' report should be overruled.

Upon well-settled principles the lower court could not, under the circumstances of this case, have done otherwise than overrule the exception to the report; and its judgment must be affirmed.

ROGERSON et al. v. LEGGETT.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 11, 1907.)

1. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT—FAILURE TO SUE OUT SUMMONS.

Where defendant dies after being served with summons, the case, as to subsequent service of summons, is not within Revisal 1905, §§ 437, 438, providing that, when defendant is not served with summons within the time the summons is returnable, plaintiff may sue out an alias or pluries summons, returnable in the same manner as the original summons, and a failure to keep up the chain of summons issued against a party, but not served, by means of an alias or pluries summons, is a discontinuance; but is within sections 415, 417, providing that no action shall abate by death of a party, but the court, on motion at any time within a year thereafter, or afterwards on a supplemental complaint, may allow the action to be continued by or against his representative, and, when the suggestion of the death of a party has been made before a clerk, it shall be his duty to issue a summons to the party succeeding to the rights or liabilities of the decedent.

2. PAYMENT—PRIMA FACIE EVIDENCE—RECITAL IN DEED.

The attorney in fact being authorized by his power to deed land and to receive payment, his deed acknowledging payment is at least prima facie evidence of payment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Payment, § 228.]

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—ACTING IN PRINCIPAL'S NAME—NECESSITY—EXECUTION OF DEED.

It is a good equitable defense to an action for land that defendant bought it of one having a power of attorney to sell and convey it, and paid him therefor, recorded his deed and entered and remained in possession thereunder, though the deed was executed in the name of the attorney, as attorney, instead of in the name of the principal, by the agent as attorney.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 40, Principal and Agent, § 433.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Action by G. C. Rogerson and others against Council Leggett. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The title to the land in controversy was on and prior to August 12, 1856, in Patsy Dudley, for life, remainder to J. C. Rogerson and W. O. Rogerson. On said day J. C. Rogerson executed to Hosea Dudley a power of attorney, under seal, authorizing him to sell and convey his interest in the land. Said power of attorney was duly registered. W. O. Rogerson prior thereto had conveyed to said Hosea his one-half interest. On the same day, to wit, August 12, 1856, the said Hosea Dudley, together with his wife, the life tenant, executed a deed describing the said land to Noah Leggett, which contained appropriate words of conveyance. The premises of said deed is as follows: "This indenture made * * * by and between Hosea Dudley in his own right as assignee of W. O. Rogerson, of Hosea Dudley as attorney for Josephus Rogerson and of Hosea Dudley and wife Patsy, of the first part," etc. The said deed was signed and sealed by Hosea Dudley and his wife, and by "Hosea Dudley, Attorney for Josephus Rogerson," and duly proven and registered November 17, 1856, in the office of the register of deeds of Beaufort county. Noah Leggett, the grantee, entered immediately into possession of the land, and remained therein until his death during the year 1898, whereupon his son and heir at law, Council Leggett, entered, and has at all times since remained, in possession thereof. Patsy Dudley, the life tenant, died July 26, 1877. Josephus Rogerson died intestate during the year 1888. Summons was issued herein July 6, 1897, and served upon Noah Leggett July 13, 1897. At the Fall term, 1898, of the superior court, the following docket entries appear: "Complaint filed Dec. 1, 1897. Death of defendant suggested and notice ordered to issue to personal representative and heirs at law to come forward and defend suit. Continued." At the Fall term, 1899, the same entries appeared, together with the word "Issued." The same entries appear at each term, with the exception of two terms—1900, 1901—until, and including the October term, 1902. At the October term, 1905, an order was passed making Council Leggett and his wife, heirs at law of Noah Leggett, parties defendant and directing alias summons to issue. Time was allowed plaintiffs to file amended complaint. Summons was duly issued and served on them November 17, 1905. At the February term, 1906, plaintiffs filed a complaint, setting forth the title to one half undivided interest in Josephus Rogerson at the time of his death, and alleging ownership in themselves, as his heirs at law, of said interest, that defendants were the owners of the other half and in possession of the whole tract wrongfully, withholding same from plaintiffs. Defendants answered, denying plaintiffs' title, pleading the statute of limitations, and, for further defense, setting up the facts herein stated. They insist that, if the paper writing executed by Hosea Dudley as attorney for Josephus Rogerson did not operate to convey the legal title to said Rogerson's interest, it was a valid contract to convey, supported by a valuable executed consideration, and vested in their ancestor a perfect equity to call for the legal title. His honor instructed the jury, upon the entire evidence, that plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. Plaintiffs excepted. Verdict and judgment. Plaintiffs appealed.

Ward & Grimes and A. R. Dunning, for appellants. Small & MacLean and Nicholson & Daniel, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the case as above). In the view which we take of this appeal, the failure, on the part of the plaintiffs, to cause notice to issue and be served upon defendant, Council Leggett, within one year after the death of his ancestor, becomes immaterial. We concur with the plaintiffs' counsel that, upon the record, there could be no discontinuance. This occurs only when the summons has not been served. Revisal 1905, §§ 437, 438, provide for such cases. This case is controlled by section 415 (1). While, as held in Burnett v. Lyman, 141 N. C. 500, 54 S. E. 412, the statute is not "automatic," and a judgment of the court is necessary to abate the action, it would seem that unless the plaintiff, within a reasonable time, which the statute fixes at one year, proceeds to prosecute his action against the "representative or successor in interest" of the original defendant, the court should ex mero motu enter judgment of abatement. It will be noted that by section 417 it is made the duty of the clerk, upon suggestion of the death of defendant, to issue summons to the representative, or person, who succeeds to the rights or liabilities of the deceased plaintiff or defendant. The wisdom of this requirement is illustrated by the record before us. Noah Leggett died within a few months after the action was brought, July 6, 1897. His death was called to the attention of the court at the next term. So far as the record informs us, his heir had no notice or knowledge that any action was pending involving the title to his land until November 13, 1905. Certainly the law does not contemplate that the plaintiff may keep his action in a semi-dormant condition for seven years, and then, when it suits his pleasure or possibly his interest, call the heir at law into court to find that by a legal fiction he has been deprived of his defenses, and called to answer, when, by the lapse of time, he has become disabled to make good his defense or that which his ancestor may have made. The liberal provisions of the statute permitting the continuation of the action after the death of the defendant should not be permitted to work out such results. Fortunately, under our reformed procedure, which permits the defendant to avail himself of equitable defenses, the court is enabled to administer justice upon the facts as they appear in the record. While it is true as contended by the plaintiffs, "that, where any one has authority as attorney to do any act, he ought to do it in his name who gives the authority," it is also true that, where the attorney has the authority and pursuant thereto executes the instrument in his own name, as attorney, for his principal, and receives the consideration, though the deed be inoperative for want of formal execution in the name of the principal, it is binding in equity; hence, a deed executed by an agent, though defective and inoperative to convey the property, will be enforced as an agreement to convey in equity. 1 Am. & Eng. 1084. This statement of the law is abundantly sustained upon principal and authority. It appearing that Hosea Dudley had a power of attorney, under seal, to convey the interest of Josephus Rogerson, and that he attempted to execute the power, and, by his act intended to do so, a perfected equity was created in Noah Leggett to call for the legal title. He entered into possession under and pursuant to this right, and remained therein until his death during the year 1898. Josephus Rogerson, with notice of the action of his attorney, by the registration of the deed November 17, 1856, lived until 1888, asserting no claim to the land nor doing any act repudiating his deed. While it is true that until July 26, 1877, the life estate of Patsy Dudley prevented him from demanding possession or maintaining a possessory action, this did not prevent him from disaffirming the act of his attorney. From July 26, 1877, the time of the death of Patsy Dudley, until the death of Josephus Rogerson in 1888, Noah Leggett was in the possession of the land and subject to a possessory action. The possession of Leggett, pursuant to his equity, precludes the suggestion of abandonment of his right to call for the legal title. The status of the defendant, with its effect upon his rights, is well stated by Dillard, J., in Farmer v. Daniel, 82 N. C. 152, 160: "The defendant has now and had, at the institution of the action, the possession of the land * * * consistent with the equitable title ever since it arose. * * * Under these circumstances, no presumption of abandonment, satisfaction, or release of the equity can arise against the purchaser or his assigns. No presumption of abandonment or release can arise from lapse of time against parties who, all the time, stand upon their equitable right and possess and use the property as their own." The learned counsel contended that, to perfect his equity, the representatives of Noah Leggett should show that Rogerson received the purchase money. The power of attorney authorized Hosea Dudley to receive it. His deed acknowledges its receipt, which is at least prima facie evidence of the fact. It has never been held in this state that a party paying money to an agent, or trustee, was required to see to its application. Hauser v. Shore, 40 N. C. 357.

Much of the discussion before us was directed to the question of ouster and the operation of the statute of limitations between tenants in common. The defendant's title is not based upon an ouster perfected by adverse possession. The entry of Noah Leggett was under Josephus Rogerson in respect to his equity. As we have seen, the ancestor of the defendants was at all times since November 17, 1856, until his death, in the rightful possession of the land. His equity passed to the defendants, and their possession is therefore in accordance with this equity. As all of the parties in interest were before the court, defendants would have been, if requested, entitled to a decree that plaintiffs convey to them the legal title, and that such decree operate to vest it in them pursuant to the provisions of the statute. Revisal 1905, §§ 566, 567. It would be a strange result if the defendants, whose ancestor paid for the land, took title from a duly empowered attorney, recorded his deed in 1856, remained in possession until his death in 1898, should now be ejected by reason of a technical defect in the execution of the deed by the attorney.

We concur with his honor, and the judgment must be affirmed.

SAWYER v. ROANOKE R. & LUMBER CO.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 11, 1907.)

1. RAILROADS—INJURY TO PERSON ON TRACK—NEGLIGENCE.

A company, operating a railroad for the purpose of hauling logs, has the duty of keeping a lookout in the direction its train is going for the purpose of avoiding injury to persons on the track apparently unconscious, though it is a remote place, with no one there, or likely to be there, except its own employés, some of whom are engaged in cutting out the way, and some in laying track.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, §§ 1257-1263.]

2. SAME—INJURY AVOIDABLE NOTWITHSTANDING CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Even if one was negligent in going on the track of a logging railroad, yet there was no contributory negligence on his part; he having been struck by lightning and rendered unconscious, and the train which ran over him having been far enough away and going slow enough to have allowed him to be seen and train to be stopped in time to avoid the accident, had a lookout been kept.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, § 1325.]

3. EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS IN ANSWER.

Plaintiff may put in evidence an admission in the answer, it being an admission of a distinct and separate fact relevant to the issue, though it is only part of a paragraph; the rest in no way modifying or altering the fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Action by J. L. Sawyer against the Roanoke Railroad & Lumber Company for personal injury alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See 55 S. E. 84.

There was evidence tending to show: That in May 1904, plaintiff was run over and seriously injured by a logging train of defendant company, while he was in the employment of the defendant and engaged in cutting out its right of way. That defendant had constructed a railroad track of iron rails from Slatersville, a station on the Norfolk & Southern, to a tract of timber about five miles out, and at the time of the injury was engaged in operating a logging train, by which the logs, as they were cut and loaded, were hauled over the spur track to Slatersville, and thence over the line of the Norfolk & Southern to Plymouth, where defendant's mill was situated. That the plaintiff was with a gang of hands engaged in cutting out.

a right of way through this timber, and as this was done another gang would lay the track, when the train—consisting on this day of a locomotive and several logging cars—would be moved backwards down the track, and the timber logs that had been cut from and on either side of the track were loaded onto the train. That this loading was done chiefly by a skidder, a machine which was placed on the rear car, being in front as the train was moving—a large machine consisting of an engine, cable, etc., which was inclosed in a building or large box several feet wider than the car on which it was placed, and 8 or 10 feet high. This box, inclosing and protecting the machinery, had a door and perhaps a window at the rear, from which those who were engaged in operating the skidder could, when required, look down the track, and there was a door and steps for entrance at the front of the skidder. That several hands were required to operate the skidder when the loading was being done, and some were on the car at the time of the injury. That when the track was laid the engine would back the train along the same, and the skidder would draw in and load the logs from either side of the track onto the logging cars. That some of the hands were engaged in the woods, some cutting the right of way, some were engaged with another machine at the end of the track, and plaintiff himself, with one Billie Boyd, was engaged in grinding plaintiff's ax some 10 or 12 feet from the track, when a thunder and rain storm came up, and plaintiff and Boyd started along the track toward the skidder, with the intention of going into the same for shelter. The train and the skidder on the front car was at this time being backed down the track toward plaintiff at the rate of about 2 miles an hour, and could have been stopped within a distance of 15 feet. That as plaintiff and Billie Boyd were so moving down the track to take protection in the skidder they were struck by a bolt of lightning; Boyd being instantly killed and plaintiff knocked down and rendered unconscious, remaining so until he was run over by the train. The place where the plaintiff fell and remained upon the track was 75 yards ahead of the moving train, on a straight track, and in view of the hands and employes in the train, if any had been looking. Three issues were submitted: (1) As to defendant's negligence; (2) contributory negligence on part of plaintiff; (3) damages. Under the charge of the court there was verdict for the plaintiff. Upon judgment thereon, defendant excepted and appealed.

Small & MacLean, for appellant. Bragaw & Harding, Nicholson & Daniel, and Ward & Grimes, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the case as above). The judge below imposed upon the defendant the duty of keeping an outlook along the track in the direction in which the train was moving, and in this connection charged the jury that, if they found the facts to be that the defendant company was operating a railroad for the purpose of hauling logs, and operating an engine and cars, the law imposed upon it the duty to keep a lookout for the purpose of avoiding injury to persons on the track apparently unconscious, and if it failed in this duty it was negligent, and if such failure was the real and proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury they would answer the first issue "Yes," etc.

It is urged for error that, on account of the remote placing of this occurrence, with no one ahead along the track, or likely to be there, except its own employes, whom they had every reason to believe were there alive and in health and in proper possession of their faculties, the judge should have charged the jury that upon the entire testimony, if believed, there was no negligence shown on the part of the company, and the jury should answer the first issue "No." But we are of opinion, and so hold, that the charge of the court correctly expresses the law applicable to the case, and that this assignment of error cannot be sustained. These logging roads, in various instances, and in different decisions, have been described and treated as railroads, and held to the same measure of responsibility and the same standard of duty. Hemphill v. Lumber Company, 141 N. C. 487, 54 S. E. 420; Simpson v. Lumber Co., 133 N. C. 96, 45 S. E. 469; Craft v. Lumber Co., 132 N. C. 156, 43 S. E. 597. And it is well established that the employes of a railroad company engaged in operating its trains are required to keep a careful and continuous outlook along the track, and the company is responsible for injuries resulting as the proximate consequence of their negligence in the performance of this duty. Bullock's Case, 105 N. C. 180, 10 S. E. 988; Dean's Case, 107 N. C. 686, 12 S. E. 77, 22 Am. St. Rep. 902; Pickett's Case, 117 N. C. 616, 23 S. E. 204, 30 L. R. A. 257, 53 Am. St. Rep. 611. This particular duty arises, not so much from the fact that railroad companies are common carriers, or quasi public corporations, as from the high degree of care imposed upon them on account of the dangerous agencies and implements employed and the great probability that serious, and in many instances fatal, injuries are almost certain to result in case of collision. As said by Burwell, J., in Haynes v. Gas Company, 19 S. E. 346, 114 N. C. 211, 26 L. R. A. 810, 41 Am. St. Rep. 786: "The utmost degree of care, so far as skill and human foresight can go, is required, for the reason that a neglect of duty is likely to result in great bodily harm, and sometimes death, to those who are compelled to use that means of conveyance." And quoting from Ray on Negligence, p. 53: "As a result of the least negligence may be of so fatal a nature, the duty of vigilance on the part of the carrier requires the exercise of that amount of care and skill in order to prevent accidents." These reasons apply with equal force to logging roads, when their trains are operated by steam or other mechanical power, and are of such exigent nature as to impose this requirement of keeping an outlook as an arbitrary duty, whether in remote or more populous localities. Certainly, on the facts disclosed by this testimony, there should be no relaxation of the rule. Some of the employes were ahead engaged in cutting out the way, others in laying down the track, and yet others were at work at the end of the track with another machine of the same kind. They were engaged in rough work, and not unlikely to be in and upon the track at different places, and at times and in different ways to be down and helpless upon it; and it was a negligent act to back a train in their direction without keeping an outlook. The duty is imposed because some injury, and serious injury, was likely to follow from its neglect, and when such injury does follow it is no answer that the injured party was down and helpless from some unusual or unexpected cause. Drum v. Miller, 135 N. C. 204, 47 S. E. 421, 65 L. R. A. 890, 102 Am. St. Rep. 523; Hudson v. Railway, 142 N. C. 198, 55 S. E. 108; Horne v. Power Co., 144 N. C. 375, 57 S. E. 19. As stated in Hudson v. Railway, 55 S. E. 105, 142 N. C. 198, the correct doctrine is as follows: "In order that a party may be liable for negligence, it is not necessary that he could have contemplated, or even been able to anticipate, the particular consequences which ensued, or the precise injuries sustained by the plaintiff. It is sufficient if by the exercise of reasonable care the defendant might have foreseen that some injury would result from his act or omission, or that consequences of a generally injurious nature might have been expected."

Defendant further contends that on the entire evidence the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and objects to the following part of the charge on that question: "If you find from the evidence that defendant was backing its train down its track, that the plaintiff fell on the track in an apparently unconscious condition, that when he so fell he was far enough from the train for it to have been stopped in time to have avoided the injury, that the defendant failed to keep a lookout, and that if a lookout had been kept the defendant, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have discovered that plaintiff was on the track, in an apparently unconscious condition, in time to stop its train and avoid the injury, then the plaintiff's negligence, if any, would not be contributory; and if you so find you will answer the second issue 'No.'" We think this position is also correct, and clearly states the law applicable to the issue. A negligent act of the plaintiff does not become contributory unless the proximate cause of the injury, and although the plaintiff in going on the track may have been negligent, when he was struck down and rendered unconscious by a bolt of lightning his conduct as to what transpired after that time was no longer a factor in the occurrence; and, as all the negligence imputed to defendant on the first issue arose after plaintiff was down and helpless, the responsibility of defendant attached because it negligently failed to avail itself of the last clear chance to avoid the injury, its negligence became the sole proximate cause of the injury, and the act of the plaintiff in going on the track, even though negligent in the first instance, became only the remote, and not the proximate or concurrent, cause. This responsibility of a defendant by reason of a negligent failure to avail itself of the last clear chance to avoid an injury is sometimes submitted to a jury under a separate issue, and, while it is sometimes desirable, it is not always necessary, so to present it, and the trial judge in his discretion, as he did in this instance, may submit the proposition and have same determined by his charge on the issue as to contributory negligence. The same course was pursued by the judge and approved on appeal in Pickett's Case, 117 N. C. 616, 23 S. E. 264, 30 L. R. A. 257, 53 Am. St. Rep. 611. The defendant in the present case has been fixed with responsibility because of its negligent failure to avail itself of the last chance to avoid injury, and for that alone, and the judge below properly told the jury in effect that, if this were true, the act of the plaintiff in going on the track in the first instance, even if negligent, would not bar a recovery, because only the remote cause of the injury, and therefore not contributory.

The court below also correctly ruled that plaintiff could put in, as an admission on the part of the defendant, a section of the answer, as follows: "And said machine ran upon plaintiff, injuring his arm so that same had to be amputated." This is an admission of a distinct and separate fact relevant to the inquiry, and, though it was only a part of an entire paragraph, plaintiff was not required to put in qualifying or explanatory matter inserted by way of defense, and which in no way modified or altered the fact. Hedrick v. Railroad, 136 N. C. 510, 48 S. E. 830; Lewis v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 382, 43 S. E. 919.

There is no error, and the judgment is affirmed.

No error.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—LEASES—ASSIGNMENT.

After death of one to whom a lease was assigned with provision that it should revert to the lessee in case of death of the assignee before its expiration, the lessee, by her general agent, at a time when the unexpired term was so short that it could be assigned by parol, wrote on the back of the assignment, which referred to and fully described the lease and property, "We hereby transfer all our right and title and interest in this lease to M." Held that, the original lease being meant by the words "this lease," there was a valid assignment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Landlord and Tenant, § 237.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Tyrrell County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Action by Dora S. Alexander against Lula Morris to recover possession of a leasehold. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Alexander and M. Majette, for appellant. W. M. Bond, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The property in controversy was leased for eight years, beginning on January 2, 1900, to Mrs. F. E. Cahoon, wife of E. P. Cahoon. On July 30, 1903, F. E. Cahoon and husband duly assigned the lease to Abner Alexander, with a proviso that, if Alexander should die before the expiration of the lease, the property shall return to Mrs. Cahoon for the remainder of the lease. Alexander died April 8, 1904, and on August 30, 1904, Dora S. Alexander, the plaintiff, took from Mrs. Cahoon a verbal assignment of the unexpired term. On July 23, 1906, F. E. Cahoon and her husband executed to the plaintiff a written assignment of the lease. It appears, however, that on May 21, 1906, F. E. Cahoon delivered to the defendant the written assignment of the lease which had been made to Abner Alexander on July 30, 1903, with the following indorsement: "We hereby transfer all our right and title and interest in this lease to Lula Morris." This is dated May 21, 1906, and is signed: "F. E. Cahoon, per E. P. Cahoon, Agent." It is admitted that the latter was the general agent for his wife, and that by virtue of such assignment defendant was in possession of the property.

The verbal assignment of the lease made to plaintiff was absolutely void because at the date thereof, August 30, 1904, the lease had more than three years to run, and therefore such an interest in land could only have been assigned in writing. Revisal 1905, § 976. At the time of the written conveyance dated July 23, 1906, made by Mrs. Cahoon and husband to plaintiff, they had on May 21, 1906, assigned the unexpired term to defendant. As there was then only about 19 months of the term remaining, it required no deed under seal or privy examination to effect a conveyance thereof. It could be assigned by parol. It is admitted that E. P. Cahoon was the general agent of his wife in the management of her property, and his authority to act for his wife is not contested. Under and by virtue of this assignment defendant has remained in possession of the leasehold estate up to this time. We cannot agree that the assignment is invalid, because not written on the original lease. The paper upon which it was written referred to and fully described the lease and the property, and in using the words "this lease" in the assignment the assignors plainly meant the original lease executed to Mrs. Cahoon by Winston Sikes. Upon the facts agreed we concur with his honor that plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

Affirmed.

DANIEL v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 17, 1907.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—RAILROADS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Plaintiff testified that while engaged in the line of his duties, in accordance with the custom prevailing among defendant's employes, he attempted to board one of defendant's cars, and while so doing, as the train was moving slowly and in the immediate view of the engineer, the latter suddenly opened the throttle and accelerated the speed of the train with a jerk, by which plaintiff was thrown under the car and injured. Evidence held insufficient to show that plaintiff was negligent as a matter of law.

2. SAME—ACTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that if defendant's engineer saw plaintiff when he attempted to board the car, and knew or had reason to believe that plaintiff would attempt to get on the car, or could by ordinary prudence have seen that plaintiff would make such attempt, and while plaintiff was getting on the car the engineer pulled the throttle, causing the train to jerk suddenly forward and throw plaintiff under the wheels, and that a reasonably prudent man would not have pulled the throttle under the circumstances, they should find the issue concerning defendant's negligence in the affirmative, was proper.

3. APPEAL—NECESSITY OF EXCEPTIONS.

A ruling on the admissibility of evidence, to which defendant took no exception and with which the record showed defendant appeared to be content, could not be urged as reversible error on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal an Error, § 1503.]

4. EVIDENCE—OPINIONS—COMPETENCY—KNOWLEDGE OF SUBJECT.

Where defendant had been employed a month at the time he was injured while attempting to board one of defendant's cars, it was not error to permit him to testify that it was customary for defendant's servants to ride on the cars as he was attempting to do at the time of his injury.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CUSTOM.

Where, after seeing plaintiff, a servant of defendant railroad company, attempting to board a car, as testified by him, the engineer opened the throttle of the engine, causing the train to jerk suddenly and throw plaintiff under a car, which ran over his leg, it was not material to defendant's liability whether plaintiff attempted to get on the car in accordance with a custom of the railroad's employes or not.

6. APPEAL—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—PREJUDICE.

Where plaintiff, a young man, was awarded only $1,000 for the loss of a leg while working as defendant's servant, defendant was not prejudiced by the admission of evidence that he had been promised promotion, to show his reasonable expectation of earning wages.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 4153.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by Andrew Daniel against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Day, Bell & Dunn and Murray Allen, for appellant. E. L. Travis and Geo. C. Green, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. Although the record contains 41 exceptions, the merits of the controversy are presented upon defendant's motion for judgment of nonsuit, and involve but few facts. Plaintiff alleges, and in support of his allegations testifies, that he was employed by defendant company to work on and about its yards at Weldon, N. C.; that on the day of the accident he was directed by a fellow servant to go to the coal chute and deliver a message to one Reed, another employé, in regard to moving an engine and some coal cars; that in the discharge of the duty imposed upon him he met an engine to which two coal cars were attached. He thus describes the manner in which he sustained the injury for which he seeks to recover damages: "Mr. Owens was the engineer, and he was looking at me when I was meeting the engine. When the engine was passing, Mr. Owens was laying out of his window watching when I was meeting the engine, and was looking back at me after I passed the engine, and the second that I went to catch the car Mr. Owens opened the throttle and made a jerk, about the time I went to catch the car, and had my foot on the stirrup, and that jerk threw me under the car, and the whole run over me, and broke my leg all to pieces. The engineer could see me when I went to take hold of the car. I was going back downtown on the car about three-quarters of a mile. There were two cars attached to the engine. According to the best of my knowledge the engine was moving at about the rate of three miles an hour. I could catch it in a fast walk. There was nothing between me and the engineer to prevent him from seeing me as I went to get on the train. I attempted to board the car next to the engine." He was cross-examined at much length, but the foregoing is the substance of his testimony regarding the manner in which he was injured. He further testified that he and other railroad employes were in the habit, or that it was customary for them, to get and ride on the cars as they moved slowly along the track in the yard. Plaintiff was contradicted in his account of the transaction, custom, etc.

Defendant does not deny that the testimony, if believed, shows negligence on the part of its engineer. It contends that the same testimony which establishes negligence shows, as matter of law, contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and upon that ground bases its motion for judgment of nonsuit. Conceding the truth of plaintiff's testimony, as must be done in disposing of the motion, we do not perceive how his honor could have rendered judgment of nonsuit. There is in it but slight, if any, evidence of contributory negligence. Plaintiff says that while engaged in the line of his duty, in accordance with the custom prevailing among defendant's employes, he attempted to board the car under the circumstances narrated, and was by the act of the engineer injured. This testimony falls far short of establishing contributory negligence as a matter of law. The jury having found, under the instruction of the court, that the injury was sustained as testified to by plaintiff, the conduct of the engineer was manifestly negligent. It is but just to him to say that he denied the statement made by plaintiff, giving an entirely different account of the matter, and that his testimony was strongly corroborated by others who saw the accident, but was rejected by the jury. We are compelled to take the testimony as true, and from that point of view his honor correctly denied the motion.

His honor instructed the jury, after stating the general contentions of the parties, as follows: "And [if] you further find that the engineer saw him [plaintiff] at the time he made the attempt to get on the car, or saw him immediately before he made the attempt, and that the engineer knew or had reason to believe that plaintiff would make the attempt to get on the car, or could by the exercise of ordinary prudence have seen that the plaintiff would attempt to get on the car, and if you further find by the weight of the evidence that, when the plaintiff attempted to and was in the act of getting on the car in the manner testified to, the engineer pulled the throttle, thereby causing the train to suddenly jerk forward, and that the sudden jerking of the train caused the plaintiff to lose his hold and fall under the wheels of the car, crushing one of his legs, and further find that a reasonably prudent man would ordinarily not have pulled the throttle at the time and under the circumstances as you may find them to be, then you will answer the issue 'Yes.' If you do not so find, you will answer the issue 'No.' " This instruction, to which defendant excepts, is clearly correct, and fairly presents the question of fact to the jury. They found against defendant, and after doing so, logically, found that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence. They could not, after finding the first issue, come to any other conclusion. His honor correctly charged the jury in regard to the measure or standard of duty imposed upon the plaintiff in at tempting to get on the car. We have examined the prayers for instruction submitted by defendant, and his honor's ruling upon them. We find no error in this respect.

Defendant excepts to several rulings made by his honor regarding the admissibility of testimony. The one most strongly urged upon us is thus presented upon the record: "Plaintiff was asked: Did he see you when you went to get on? Answer: Yes, sir. Defendant objected to his saying whether he could see him or not. The Court: Yes; I reckon that is a matter for the jury. Q. Was there anything between you and the engineer when you went to get on the train to prevent him seeing you? A. No. Defendant objected. Overruled, and exception by defendant." Defendant insists that the court erred in permitting the answer to the first question. Without expressing an opinion upon the admissibility of the question and answer, the record shows that defendant was content with his honor's action and made no exception thereto. It is a fair construction of the language that his honor excluded the answer, saying that whether the engineer saw plaintiff or not was an inference to be drawn by the jury from the evidence as to position of the parties, etc. This is manifest from the form of the next question, which was clearly competent. His honor would have made his language more explicit if defendant had indicated that it was not content. The witness had, without objection, testified that the engineer could see him. The difference is rather slight, in view of the condition of the record, to base a finding of reversible error.

The exception to the admission of plaintiff's testimony that it was customary for defendant's servants to ride upon the cars, as he was attempting to do, is without merit. It is true that plaintiff had been in defendant's employment but one month. He may, within that time, have become acquainted with a custom respecting his own employment and the discharge of his duties. He was cross-examined at much length, and the jury given ample opportunity to properly weigh and value his testimony. In the aspect of the case found by the jury, it was not material whether he attempted to get upon the car in accordance with a custom or not. If, after seeing plaintiff attempting to get on the car in the manner testified to by him, the engineer opened the throttle to his engine, thereby causing him to be thrown under the car and injured, the defendant would be liable for negligence upon well-settled principles and adjudged cases. Deans v. Railroad, 107 N. C. 686, 12 S. E. 77, 22 Am. St. Rep. 902, and many other cases.

Defendant excepts because plaintiff was permitted to say that he was promised promotion. His honor admitted this evidence as tending to show his reasonable expectation of making wages. We do not find any reversible error in this. In view of the fact that the jury gave plaintiff, a young man, only $1,000 for the loss of his leg, we do not think it probable that his expectation of increased wages made much impression upon their minds. The cause was fairly submitted to the triors of the fact. We find no valid exceptions to his honor's rulings.

The judgment must be affirmed.

HAWK v. PINE LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 17, 1907.)

ACTIONS—JOINDER—CONTRACT OR TORT.

Where plaintiff contracted to log certain land for a specified price and to furnish equipment for a tram road, part of which was to be constructed by defendant, plaintiff was entitled to join an action for damages for defendant's breach of the contract with an action for defendant's conversion of plaintiff's property placed on the land for the purpose of doing the work under the contract, under Revisal 1905, § 489, providing that any causes of action may be united where they arise out of the same transaction or a transaction connected with the same subject of action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Action, §§ 490-510.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Neal, Judge.

Action by G. E. Hawk against the Pine Lumber Company. From an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff alleged in his complaint: That the defendant owned a large tract of land in said county and employed him to log the same at $3 per 1,000 feet, there being 150,000,000 feet of timber on the land at the time. In order to cut and deliver the timber as required by the contract, it was necessary to lay a tramway, part of which was constructed by the plaintiff and the other part by the defendant; the plaintiff having agreed to furnish trucks and certain other equipment and supplies for carrying on the work, which he did, and the defendant having agreed to furnish other equipment and materials necessary for the said purpose, which it failed to do. That the defendant in other respects refused to perform its contract. While the plaintiff was engaged in the performance of his part of the contract, the defendant unlawfully seized and took possession of the tramway, and converted to his own use certain property which the plaintiff had furnished and placed on the premises for the purpose of doing the work required of him by the contract, and thereby prevented him from performing the same. He prays judgment for $100,000 for the breach of the contract, for $3,470 for seizing the tramway which was built by the plaintiff at his own expense, and for $2,174 for the conversion of the personal property, making in all $105,644. The defendant demurred for misjoinder, because the plaintiff had united a cause of action for unliquidated damages, which arose out of a contract with one for the conversion of personal property, which arose out of a tort. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant appealed.

W. W. Clark and Simmons, Ward & Allen, for appellant. D. L. Ward and W. D. McIver, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is true, as argued by the learned counsel for the defendant, that at common law the causes of action stated in the complaint could not have been joined. 23 Cyc. 392; Logan v. Wallis, 76 N. C. 416; Doughty v. Railroad, 78 N. C. 22. But this rule has been changed by the reformed procedure, and now any causes of action may be united "where they arise out of the same transaction or a transaction connected with the same subject of action." Whether they be for the breach of a contract and for a tort, or legal or equitable, or both, will make no difference. Revisal 1905, § 469. The courts have not attempted to state any general rule by which all cases may be tested under that statute, as it has been found impossible to do so. The language, no doubt, was chosen because of the very wide scope of its meaning, enabling the courts to construe it as will be found most convenient and best calculated to promote the ends of justice. 1 Enc. of Pl. & Pr. 185. Having no very definite principle to guide us, it is safer for courts to pass upon the question as each case is presented, except when it comes directly and clearly within some established precedent.

We think the causes of action were properly joined in this case, and that the court was right in overruling the demurrer and requiring the defendant to answer. In Hamlin v. Tucker, 72 N. C. 502, the court held that the plaintiff had properly united causes of action for harboring his wife, for the conversion of personal property belonging to the plaintiff jure mariti, for inducing the wife to execute a deed for land to the defendant while so harbored, and for converting certain personal property, the subject of a marriage settlement. It would seem that the case just cited is more than a good precedent for the ruling of the court in this one. The causes of action are not so nearly related to or connected with each other as are those in this case; the only difference being that in Hamlin v. Tucker they were legal and equitable, while here they are in contract and in tort. But this is merely a nominal distinction. By clear analogy many cases sustain the ruling of the court. Young v. Young, 81 N. C. 92; King v. Farmer, 88 N. C. 22; Benton v. Collins, 118 N. C. 196, 24 N. E. 122; Cook v. Smith, 119 N. C. 350, 25 S. E. 958; Daniels v. Fowler, 120 N. C. 14, 26 S. E. 635; Fisher v. Trust Co., 138 N. C. 224, 50 S. E. 659; Oyster v. Mining

Co., 140 N. C. 135, 52 S. E. 198; McGowan v. Insurance Co., 141 N. C. 387, 54 S. E. 287. "The result of the decisions is that, if the causes of action be not entirely distinct and unconnected; if they arise out of one and the same transaction, or a series of transactions forming one course of dealing and all tending to one end; if one connected story can be told of the whole—the objection of multifariousness does not arise." Young v. Young, 81 N. C. 91; Bedsole v. Monroe, 40 N. C. 313.

But Badger v. Benedict, 1 Hilton (N. Y.) 414, seems to be directly in point. In that case there were separate causes of action, arising out of the breach of a contract and injuries to property, the subject of the contract, which was in the possession of the plaintiff for the purpose of enabling her to perform it and by the conversion of which she was prevented from doing so. The court held that they were properly united under a statute of that state identical in language with ours, as they arose out of one and the same transaction. That decision is not a binding precedent with us, but it must be regarded as very persuasive authority. If the causes of action stated in the plaintiff's complaint in this case did not arise out of the same transaction, and we think they did, they surely are connected with the same subject of action. We do not see how the defendant can possibly be prejudiced in his defense by the joinder.

We conclude that the ruling of the court was right. The defendant will be allowed to answer.

No error.

DIXON v. DIXON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 17, 1907.)

TRUSTS—EXPRESSED TRUSTS—ENFORCEMENT—LIMITATIONS.

Where a wife purchased certain real estate with money furnished her by her husband, and later, knowing that title was taken in her name, consented to transfer the property to him, but afterwards refused to do so, her acknowledgment operated to create an express trust in favor of her husband, so that limitations did not begin to run against the husband's suit to enforce the trust until her subsequent disavowal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Ferguson, Judge.

Suit by John Dixon against Melissa A. Dixon. From a decree in favor of complainant, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Clark, for appellant. Moore & Dunn, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This is an action by the husband to have his wife declared trustee for him of the property described in the complaint, which alleges that all said property was bought by the defendant with money furnished her by the plaintiff under instructions to take title in his name, but that instead she took the title in her own name. The jury found the facts to be as thus alleged.

The deeds to the wife for the property were dated July 14, 1880, October 24, 1889, January 26, 1889, and January 15, 1892. This action was begun January 19, 1904. The defendant pleaded the 10-year statute of limitations. By consent, the facts as to this plea were found by the judge, which, in addition to what is above stated, are that while plaintiff and defendant were living together as man and wife, "knowing title had been taken in her, he, by and with her consent, took the deeds to a lawyer to have the title perfected in him, but was called off by a telegram, and the transfer was never made." It does not appear when this occurred; but the judge further finds that there was no evidence of any contest or friction about the title or possession of the property until the defendant instituted an action for divorce November 2, 1903. It is therefore unnecessary to discuss the interesting question whether the statute could run between husband and wife; for, the trust being acknowledged, it became an express trust, of which there was no disavowal or adversary holding until November 2, 1903. Till then the statute did not run, and the court properly held that the plaintiff's action is not barred by the statute of limitation.

Affirmed.

JACKSON v. SOUTHERN RY., CAROLINA DIVISION, et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 13, 1907.)

1. RAILROADS—COMPANIES LIABLE FOR INJURIES—LESSORS AND LESSEES.

Where both a lessor railroad and a lessee are sued for the negligence of the lessee, a nonsuit should not be granted to the lessor, unless it should also be granted to the lessee.

Gary, A. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; J. C. Klugh, Judge.

Action by W. F. Jackson, Jr., against the Southern Railway, Carolina Division, and the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

See 54 S. E. 231.

J. E. McDonald, for appellants. Wm. B. McCaw, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. This is the second appeal in this case. 73 S. O. 557, 54 S. E. 231. The facts are as follows: On the night of October 9, 1903, a large fire took place in Tirzah, a station on defendant's road in York county. The fire had done much damage and was threatening to destroy several freight cars standing on a side track between the fire and defendants' depot. In order to save the cars and the station, which would necessarily have caught had the cars been burned, S. M. Carothers, defendants' agent at Tirzah, sought to roll the cars down the track. In pursuance of this plan he called to Will Roach and George Wilson to help him, and he himself got upon the cars to work the brakes. Will Roach having failed to respond to his request and George Wilson being unable to move the cars, Carothers called one or more persons to his aid, among whom was the plaintiff, W. F. Jackson, Jr. To facilitate moving the cars he ordered George Wilson to uncouple them. Jackson, according to his own testimony, believing that Wilson had carried out the order, got between the cars and was pushing, when the car behind caught his right foot, crushed his ankle, and bruised his right leg considerably. Plaintiff alleged negligence on the part of the defendants in not furnishing him, through their representative, S. M. Carothers, a safe place to work, reasonably safe and suitable appliances with which to work, a competent servant to uncouple the cars, and a sufficient and competent force to move them. The defendants deny any negligence on their part, and allege that plaintiff's injury was due to an unavoidable accident and that the injuries were caused by the acts of fellow servants, and therefore they are not liable. The case came on for trial at the May, 1906, term of court for York county. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony defendants moved for a nonsuit. Judge J. C. Klugh, the presiding judge, refused the motion and allowed the case to go to the jury. The result was a verdict of $8,000 for the plaintiff. The motion for a new trial having been refused, defendants appeal to this court.

1. The first exception raises the point that the motion for a nonsuit should have been granted as to the defendant Southern Railway, Carolina Division, as there was a total failure of proof tending to show negligence on its part. It was admitted on all sides that the defendants occupied the relation to each other of lessor and lessee. Under our law the defendant Southern Railway is agent of its lessor, and the lessor is responsible for all acts of negligence on the part of the Southern Railway's officers and agents. Smalley v. Railway, 73 S. C. 572, 53 S. E. 1000; Franklin v. Railway, 74 S. C. 332, 54 S. E. 578; Reed v. Railway, 75 S. C. 170, 55 S. E. 218. Therefore, unless the nonsuit could have been granted as to the Southern Railway, no error was committed in refusing it as to the Southern Railway, Carolina Division. Let us consider, then, if the motion should have been granted as to the lessee. The motion was made on the grounds that there was no evidence tending to show negligence on the part of the defendants, and that plaintiff's injuries, if he were injured, were due solely to the acts of fellow servants. These grounds resolve themselves into the question whether Carothers was the representative of the master and a superior servant having a right to control and direct the services of the plaintiff. On the former appeal it was held that there was testimony going to establish this relation and the nonsuit was properly refused. On this trial the evidence is equally strong, if not stronger. Carothers himself testified that he had control of defendants' property at Tirzah. Several witnesses testified to the same effect. The property being in danger, he called upon the plaintiff to aid in protecting it, and the plaintiff responded. Under these circumstances we think the question was properly submitted to the jury to say whether he was a superior or a fellow servant. The nonsuit, therefore, was properly refused.

2. The next question raised by the defendants' exceptions is that the circuit judge charged the jury that, in order to constitute the relation of fellow servants, there must be equality in the matter of doing work. This exception misconstrues the charge. Throughout Judge Klugh seemed anxious to impress upon the jury that difference of rank did not necessarily prevent persons from being fellow servants. After charging defendants' request to this effect, he added these words: "That makes clear the distinction that I have been seeking to bring to your attention all along between the relation of fellow servants and the relation between the superior servant representing the master and the under servant, and I so charge you." It is impossible that the jury could have been misled by the words objected to. Therefore we overrule the objection.

3. The circuit judge charged the jury in effect that if the master fails to employ competent servants, and an employé is injured by reason of the incompetency or incapacity of his fellow servants, then the master is liable. The defendants object to this charge on the ground that it renders the master absolutely liable if injury results from the employment of incompetent servants. This contention must be sustained. It is true that one entering service does not assume the risk arising from the negligent selection of incompetent servants, and it is also true that evidence of incompetency of a servant raises a prima facie presumption of negligence in the master selecting him, in the absence of evidence of due care in selection. But it was error to charge the jury that if the master fails to employ competent servants, and an employé is injured by reason of incompetency or incapacity of his fellow servant, then the master is liable, for the master is liable only for due care in the selection of his servants. It is true the circuit judge did charge: "Now, after the employer has exercised reasonable care in selecting employés, he is not bound to compensate a fellow servant for the negligence of his fellow servants, as I have already instructed you." But he immediately followed it with this inconsistent and erroneous instruction: "But if he fails to employ competent fellow servants, and an employé is injured by reason of the incompetency or incapacity of the fellow servants to do the work they are employed to do, that is a risk the employé does not assume; but the employer is bound to compensate him if he was injured by the incompetency of his fellow servants, just as much as he is bound to compensate him if he is injured by reason of the unsafe or unsuitable appliances that might be necessary for the doing of the work and that are furnished by the employer."

The defendants' fifteenth request to charge was: "The law is that when one enters into the employ of another he assumes the natural and ordinary risk of such employment, which includes the negligence of a fellow servant, if the master has selected such fellow servant with due care. If the jury should find that Carothers had authority to direct and control those who were working under him, and if they should find further that he gave orders and directions, but that such orders and directions were not obeyed or carried out, and that that was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's alleged injury, then the plaintiff cannot recover, and the verdict must be for the defendant." In commenting on this request the circuit judge again emphasized the error in these words: "That is, if you should find that those orders were not carried out because of the negligence of the fellow servant to whom they were given. If you should find that they were not carried out because of the inefficiency or incompetency of a fellow servant, the defendant would be liable, because you must bear in mind the difference between the liability of the employer for the negligence of his fellow servants and his liability for inefficiency and incompetency. He is not liable for the negligence. He is liable if he has selected incompetent or inefficient fellow servants, just the same as he would be liable for a defect in any other appliance which he furnishes that would be necessary to do the work, and so I charge you." This, in effect, makes the master a guarantor of the competency of his servant, whereas all that the law imposes upon the master is the exercise of due care in selecting his servants. The question of due care under all the circumstances should have been submitted to the jury.

4. The last alleged error is failure of the circuit judge to grant a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to sustain the verdict. There was testimony on all the material issues in the cause. The jury heard the case and rendered a verdict for the plaintiff. The circuit judge, on the motion for a new trial, we must take for granted, carefully considered the testimony, and his conclusion was that the verdict was proper. Under the well-settled law this court cannot review the evidence. Miller v. Railway, 69 S. C. 116, 48 S. E. 99; Jones v. Hiers, 57 S. C. 427, 35 S. E. 748; Wilson v. Assurance Co., 51 S. C. 549, 29 S. E. 245, 64 Am. St. Rep. 700.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.

JONES, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment for reversal. The testimony, in view of the decision on the former appeal in this case (73 S. C. 572, 54 S. E. 231), leaves no room to doubt that plaintiff was fellow servant with Wilson in the matter of moving the cars from the threatening fire, and that the failure of Wilson to uncouple the cars, as directed by Carothers, representing the master, was the proximate cause of the injury. The plaintiff testified that, just before he went in between the cars to push with Wilson, he heard Carothers direct Wilson to uncouple the cars, and that he supposed the order had been obeyed. Being a fellow servant with Wilson, however regrettable his misfortune, plaintiff cannot recover of defendant for injuries resulting from the negligence of Wilson in failing to obey the order of Carothers. The master is liable to a servant for the acts or omissions of a fellow servant, due to incompetency and incapacity, when the master is negligent in the selection of such fellow servant. Proof of a servant's incapacity raises only a prima facie presumption of negligent selection by the master; but in this case there was no evidence that Wilson, a section hand, was incompetent to uncouple standing freight cars, and there was no evidence that it was a negligent act to select Wilson to aid in the sudden emergency and necessity for quick action caused by the fire.

For these reasons there was error in refusing to grant a nonsuit as alleged in subdivisions "a" and "b" of the second exception, in charging the jury as alleged in the fourth and fifth exceptions, and in refusing a new trial for want of evidence to sustain the verdict, as alleged in the eighth exception.

GARY, A. J. (dissenting). Mr. Chief Justice POPE uses this language in his opinion: "The circuit judge charged the jury in effect that if the master fails to employ competent servants, and an employé is injured by reason of the incompetency or incapacity of his fellow servants, then the master is liable. The defendants object to this charge on the ground that it renders the master absolutely liable if injury results from the employment of incompetent servants. This contention must be sustained. * * * This, in effect, makes the master a guarantor of the competency of his servant, whereas all that the law imposes upon the master is the exercise of due care in selecting his servants. The question of due care under all the circumstances should have been submitted to the jury." In order to determine whether there was error in that portion of the charge just mentioned, it will be necessary to refer to the pleadings, for the purpose of ascertaining the issues involved.

The complaint, in specifying the particulars in which the defendant was negligent, alleges that it failed to "select or employ a competent servant to uncouple the freight or box cars, to further and expedite their removal"; also, to "furnish a sufficient and competent force to remove said freight or box cars, with due regard to the safety of plaintiff." While the answer of the defendants does not deny this allegation in express terms, it may, under a liberal construction, be regarded as put in issue; but the defendants did not set up as a defense that they exercised due care in the selection of their servants. In the case of Hicks v. Railway, 63 S. C. 559, 375, 41 S. E. 753, the court says: "We see no reason why it should not be prima facie evidence of negligence to employ an incompetent servant, as well as to furnish defective machinery. Nor do we see why a servant should be held to assume the risk of negligence on the part of an incompetent fellow servant, when he does not assume the risk arising from defective machinery, especially since it has been decided that the word 'appliances' includes the persons necessary to operate the machinery." The principle is thus stated in Branch v. Railway, 35 S. C. 405, 407, 14 S. E. 808: "The allegation on the part of a servant that he has sustained an injury while in the service of the master by reason of the neglect of a duty which the latter owes to the former unquestionably states a cause of action; for, as said above, the omission of such duty affords at least prima facie evidence of negligence, and while it is true that such prima facie showing may be rebutted by evidence tending to show that such omission of duty on the part of the master was not owing to his want of care and diligence, but was due to other causes which he could not control, yet until such prima facie showing is rebutted it will be conclusive. For instance, the master may show that he did not know, and could not by the use of due care and diligence have ascertained, that there were any such defects in the machinery, or other appliances furnished the servant as would be likely to cause the injury complained of; but, until this is shown, the failure to perform an acknowledged duty stands unexcused, and renders the master responsible. It seems to us, therefore, that want of knowledge on the part of the master of the defect in the machinery, being a matter of excuse for the failure on his part to perform an acknowledged duty, constitutes matter of defense, and is not an element in the cause of action. * * * As the law, recognizing the imperfection of human nature, does not require absolute perfection in the performance of duty, it will listen to excuses for nonperformance as a defense to an action to recover damages for an injury sustained by one by reason of the failure of another to perform a duty which the latter owes to the former. We think, therefore, that knowledge on the part of defendant company, in this case, of the defect in the machinery, by reason of which the injury complained of was sustained, constitutes no part of the plaintiff's cause of action, but is a matter of defense."

Under this authority (which has been affirmed in subsequent cases) the charge mentioned in the opinion, even standing alone, was free from error. But his honor, the presiding judge, charged specifically that, "after the employer has exercised reasonable care in selecting employes, he is not bound to compensate a fellow servant for the negligence of his fellow servants," thus submitting the question squarely to the jury, whether there was due care in the selection of the servants. It seems to me that the doctrine announced in the opinion would practically overrule the case of Branch v. Railway, 35 S. C. 405, 14 S. E. 808, in this particular.

For these reasons I dissent.

FIELDS v. LANCASTER COTTON MILLS.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 13, 1907.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—TORTS OF SERVANT—LIABILITY OF MASTER.

Where the superintendent of a cotton mill was intrusted with the control of its policies and the methods to be employed to prevent interference with its operatives, the cotton mill is liable to one going on the mill property to entice away its employes, where he is tied and thrown into a pond of water, in which acts the superintendent participated.

2. TRIAL—VERDICT—DAMAGES—AMOUNT.

In an action for tort, a verdict for plaintiff "for punitive damages" was not illegal, because excluding the idea of actual damages.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; J. C. Klugh, Judge.

Action by Joseph H. Fields against the Lancaster Cotton Mills and another. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant corporation appeals. Affirmed.

Williams & Williams, for appellant. J. Harry Foster, for respondent.

WOODS, J. On August 21, 1905, the plaintiff, Joseph H. Fields, went from Winnsboro to Lancaster for the purpose of hiring hands, then in the employment of the Lancaster Cotton Mills, for the Fairfield Mills. The coming of outsiders on the mill property and inducing the hands to leave was a serious grievance to the Lancaster Mills, and the superintendent had instructed the overseers to prevent it by warning such persons not to come on the mill property, and if the warning was unheeded to have them arrested by an officer. Having information of the coming of Fields, or of some other person, with the design of enticing away the mill hands, the overseers, Hope, Layton, Hull, Mahaffey, Joseph Johnson, and William Johnson, went to the railroad station and met Fields. The defendant Skipper was also at the station, but for the purpose, as he testifies, of mailing a letter. After a friendly greeting, Fields walked in company with the superintendent and overseers towards the mill settlement, saying to them, falsely, that he had no intention of trying to hire hands, and had come only "to see his girl." When they reached the mill property some of the party seized and tied Fields, and threw him into the mill reservoir, and kept him there for a minute or two. The plaintiff sued the Lancaster Cotton Mills and Skipper for $25,000 damages, alleging the indignity to have been maliciously inflicted upon him, in pursuance of a preconcerted plan agreed on by them. The appeal is from a recovery of $800 against the Lancaster Cotton Mills alone.

The defendant first insists the circuit court committed error in refusing to grant a nonsuit, and subsequently refusing to order a new trial, on the ground that there was no evidence whatever of the participation of the defendants in the tort. Without evidence of the participation of Skipper, the superintendent of the mill, there might be some question whether the mill would be liable for the wrong committed by the overseers, who had no authority to act for the mill beyond warning such persons as Fields to keep off the mill property and to appeal to the law if the warning should be unheeded. But there was a conflict of evidence on the point of Skipper's participation. All the overseers testified the seizure and ducking of the plaintiff was the result of his having drawn a knife on Hope without provocation, and they all support Skipper in his statement that he had nothing whatever to do with the assault. Skipper admitted that he had some years before thrown into the water a man who had troubled him in a similar way, and that on this occasion he stood by and saw Hope and others carrying the plaintiff to the reservoir with the avowed purpose of throwing him in. He testified, however, that he had no idea there was any serious intention to carry out the threat. The plaintiff's testimony was to the effect that Skipper did not actually lay hands on him and was a little distance apart when he was cast into the water; but he also testified Skipper was one of the ringleaders of the mob, and when he was pulled out said: "Next time I come back here he would do me a damn sight worse." From this statement of the evidence it is manifest the issues of participation by the superintendent and the motive of the assault were for the decision of the jury. The superintendent of a cotton mill is usually the representative of the mill with respect to the hiring and management of its operatives and other features of its mechanical operations. The evidence on the part of the defendant shows the superintendent, in this instance, was intrusted with the control of its policy and the methods to be employed to prevent interference with the operatives. The Lancaster Cotton Mills cannot, therefore, escape the liability to third persons for any action taken by him with respect to the matters it had placed under his control. It makes no difference that the action was unlawful and that it would not have been sanctioned by the corporation itself. "The principal is liable for the acts of his agent done in the course of his employment." Parkerson v. Wightman, 4 Strob. (S. C.) 363; Cobb v. Railroad Co., 37 S. C. 194, 15 S. E. 878; Rucker v. Smoke, 87 S. C. 377, 16 S. E. 40, 34 Am. St. Rep. 758; Skipper v. Mfg. Co., 58 S. C. 143, 36 S. E. 509; Hutchison v. Real Estate Co., 65 S. C. 75, 43 S. E. 295; Polatty v. Railway Co., 67 S. C. 395, 45 S. E. 932, 100 Am. St. Rep. 750; Mitchell v. Leech, 69 S. C. 413, 48 S. E. 290, 66 L. R. A. 723; Williams v. Tolbert, 76 S. C. 211, 56 S. E. 908. There was no error in refusing the motions for nonsuit and for a new trial made on the grounds that there was no evidence of the participation by the Lancaster Cotton Mills in the tort.

The verdict was in this form: "We find for the plaintiff eight hundred dollars against the Lancaster Cotton Mills, for punitive damages." The defendant contends this verdict was illegal, and should have been set aside, because its language excludes the idea of actual damages, and there can be no recovery for punitive damages without actual damages. Since this exception was taken the point has been settled contrary to the defendant's view by the case of Doster v. Telegraph Co., 77 S. C. 56, 57 S. E. 671.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

SINGLETON v. PROGRESSIVE BEN. ASS'N.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 9, 1907.)

INSURANCE—BENEFIT ASSOCIATION—FORFEITURE—WAIVER.

A provision in a certificate of a benefit association that on the failure of the holder of the certificate to pay his dues for four weeks he will become "nonfinancial in case of death, and those failing to pay their dues for three weeks will become nonfinancial in case of sickness and not entitled to any benefit for thirty days after such dues have been paid," and that when any person shall be in arrears for four weeks the certificate shall be null and void, but he may be reinstated by paying a regular initiation fee and presenting a doctor's certificate, means that a member who is four weeks in arrears in dues forfeits his certificate, but such forfeiture may be waived by the association accepting dues thereafter.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 28, Insurance, § 1909.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; R. O. Purdy, Judge.

Action by Ella Singleton against the Progressive Benefit Association. From an order affirming a judgment of a magistrate's court in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jno. A. Gilliland and Jno. B. Edwards, for appellant. Nathans & Sinkler, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. This action was brought in the court of D. J. Baker, judicial magistrate for Charleston county, by the plaintiff, Ella Singleton, against the defendant association, to recover a benefit of $40 alleged to be due her on a certificate issued to her husband, Jeremiah Singleton, on the 12th day of September, 1904. The complaint alleged Jeremiah's death and the fulfillment of all the conditions of the certificate. In order to relieve itself from liability under paragraph 6 of the conditions printed on the certificate, defendant introduced plaintiff's receipt book in evidence, which showed that from April 21st to May 26th, prior to Jeremiah's death on June 3, 1906, no payment had been made on dues. Plaintiff alleged waiver of the forfeiture by the association in receiving pay for four weeks on the 26th of May. The defendant then took the position that under the section above referred to it was optional with the association either to declare a forfeiture or to allow the delinquent member to make up arrears, on condition that, in case of death within 30 days, no benefit should be recovered. The magistrate found for the plaintiff the full amount claimed, and on appeal to the circuit court Judge R. O. Purdy, in a decree of November 17, 1906, affirmed the finding. The defendant now appeals to this court, alleging error on the part of the circuit court in holding that the forfeiture had been waived.

Section 6, relied on by the appellant, is as follows: "Persons failing to pay their duties for four weeks will become nonfinancial in case of death, and those failing to pay their dues for three weeks will become nonfinancial in case of sickness, and not entitled to any benefit for thirty days after such dues shall have been paid. When any person shall be four weeks in arrears all claims on the association shall be forfeited, and the certificate thereon null and void. But such persons may be reinstated, after having been expelled for nonpayment of dues or assessments for a period of four weeks, by paying the regular initiation fee and presenting a doctor's certificate in addition thereto. A person presenting such a doctor's certificate shall be reinstated at the next regular meeting of the association." After most scrupulous care we are unable to arrive at any legitimate conclusion which will give meaning to all of the clauses of this condition. If an attempt is made to construe it as appellant wishes, we are met at the very threshold by the idea that it is clearly against the intention of the framers of the condition. In the first place, the two divisions of the section are diametrically opposed to each other. Hence it is hard to conceive, if it had been the intention that the association should have the optional power which it now claims, why some word implying such power would not have been used? It would have been the easiest thing, and certainly it is the most probable, that, if such had been the intention, some disjunctive word, such as "or" or its equivalent, would have been used. So far from the use of such a word, however, the language is not so arranged, nor are we able to discern any attempt at an arrangement which would imply inadvertent omission of such a connective. Were such the case, in order to carry out the intention, the needed word could be supplied and the section construed so as to give the association the power it claims. It seems, however, that it did not once occur to the drawers of the condition under consideration to allow members who had been delinquent for 4 weeks to pay up their dues and be reinstated only upon condition that, should death occur within 30 days thereafter, no benefit should be received. When the section is considered as a whole, there is strong reason to believe that the 30-day clause applies only to cases of sickness where there had been a failure to pay dues for 3 weeks. It will be noticed that, immediately after that provision, the section proceeds to declare the penalty for four weeks' neglect. Of course, if we had to be guided by a strict grammatical construction, it would be hard to demonstrate that the suspending clause in the first sentence did not apply to both of the clauses immediately preceding it; but in cases such as this intention is the needle pointing out our course, and if it is followed correctly we cannot go astray. When, therefore, it is declared in such unconditional language that forfeiture shall result from a failure of four weeks' dues, and the manner of reinstatement is so clearly and unequivocally prescribed, we cannot but think that that was the idea uppermost in the minds of the framers of the condition.

This conclusion is sustained by the fact that in most associations of like character, where a forfeiture for nonpayment of dues is declared, a somewhat analogous mode of reinstatement is prescribed. Hence we hold that, in the absence of waiver, plaintiff's certificate was forfeited. That the company did waive the forfeiture here, as it had a perfect right to do, seems evident. Just a short time before plaintiff's husband's death, and after six weeks had elapsed since her last payment of dues, she was approached by the authorized agent of the association, who received her dues and receipted her book for them. Therefore, at the death of her husband, she was a member in good standing in the association and entitled to the benefit named in her certificate.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

SMITH et al. v. LINDER.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 9, 1907.)

1. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS—DEEDS—FRAUD—LIMITATIONS.

In an action to set aside a deed as obtained by fraud, the complaint must allege that notice of the fraud was had within six years, under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 112, subd. 6, providing for the bringing of such actions within six years from the discovery of fraud.

2. SAME—KNOWLEDGE OF FRAUD—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action to set aside a deed obtained by fraud, the burden is on defendant to show that plaintiff had knowledge of the fraud for more than six years.

3. SAME—LACHES.

In an action to set aside a deed as obtained by fraud, evidence that the grantor who, when she conveyed, thought she only had a life estate, knew that the grantee claimed the land in fee under the deed, but not that the grantee had imposed upon her in obtaining the deed, and that upon receiving such information she consulted an attorney, shows due diligence.

4. DEEDS—VALIDITY—FRAUD—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show a deed from a mother to her son was obtained by the fraud of the son.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Deeds, § 645.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Cherokee County; Dantzler, Judge.

Action by Nannie Smith and Edna Littlejohn against R. E. Linder. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Butler & Osborne, Stanyarne Wilson, and J. E. Webster, for appellants. J. C. Jeffries and H. J. Haynesworth, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The plaintiffs seek equitable relief on the ground that the defendant fraudulently induced their testatrix to execute a conveyance in fee of the land in dispute, while laboring under the mistaken belief that she was only conveying a life estate. The allegations of the complaint are substantially as follows: That by the will of Robert Lipscomb the said property was devised to his daughter, Mary Linder, and at her death to the heirs of her body; that there was born to her, prior to 1895, as the lawful heirs of plaintiff Nannie Smith, and Alice Smith, who her body, the defendant R. E. Linder, the predeceased her, leaving as her only child the plaintiff Edna Littlejohn; that on the 15th of March, 1895, Mary Linder, in consideration of $1,000, executed to the defendant a deed to "all her right, title, and interest in the land," the deed being to him and his heirs and assigns, forever, and with the usual covenants of warranty; that the defendant is now in the sole possession of the land, and has been since the death of Mary Linder, on the — day of May, 1905; that the conveyance was obtained through the fraud and influence of the defendant, who by his great and undue influence over Mary Linder induced her to believe that her interest in the land under the will was a life estate, and that at her death it would go to the heirs of her body—she being under the mistaken fact that her interest was, as now claimed by defendant and as then known to him, the entire estate in fee conditional, and that the deed, as executed, conveyed to him the estate in fee; that the consideration is wholly inadequate. The prayer of the complaint is: (1) That said deed be reformed and construed to convey only an estate for the life of Mary Linder; (2) that the defendant account for two-thirds of the rents and profits; and (3) for partition.

The defendant denied the allegations of fraud, and alleged the following by way of defense: "That said deed was immediately placed upon the records of Spartanburg county, and the defendant immediately went into possession of said land, claiming the same in fee simple, and has ever so continued to possess the same. (2) That at the time of the execution of said deed all of the facts connected with said transaction were within the knowledge of the said Mary A. Linder, and that at said time, and certainly for longer than six years prior to the commencement of this action, she had knowledge of all facts alleged to constitute the fraud. (3) That the said Mary A. Linder, being possessed of such knowledge, did receive the purchase money for said land, to wit, $1,000, and did retain the same, and never at any time offered to return the same or any part thereof. That she acquiesced in and confirmed the plaintiff's title to said land, ratifying the said transaction and waiving any right to rescind. (4) That the said Mary A. Linder, and the plaintiffs who claim under her, are barred by laches, and by the statute of limitations, from any right to rescind said transaction or to sustain this action."

His honor, the presiding judge, sustained the defense of the statute of limitations and dismissed the complaint solely on that ground. The reasons assigned by him in sustaining said defense are as follows: "In relation to the defense of the statute of limitations—i. e., that for six years prior to the commencement of this action Mrs. Linder 'had knowledge of all facts alleged to constitute fraud'—I will quote the testimony on that point. Mrs. Nannie Smith testified: 'A short time before her death she (referring to Mrs. Mary A. Linder) found out he (referring to R. E. Linder, the defendant) had a deed for the place. Mr. Ray told her that he had a straight-out deed for the land. That was five or six years before her death. I can't remember exactly.' After having testified to a conversation he had with the defendant in relation to the transaction in question, R. G. Ray was asked this question: 'Now, you say that you afterwards had several conversations with Mrs. Mary A. Linder about the matter. Where was it you had the conversations? A. It was at her house, five or six years ago.' J. R. Beason testified: 'Q. State the time and circumstances, and what was said. A. It was the 1st of April, or last of March, 1895. I was on my way to Gaffney with Mr. John J. Jones, and we met Mr. Linder at Virgil McCraw's house. We stopped, and we had a conversation, and he told us about his big land deal that he had made, bragging about how rich he was, and about how much land he owned. I had done heard about his buying Mrs. Linder's lifetime interest, and I remarked to him that he only bought her lifetime interest, and he said, "Yes," but that he had a straight deed for it, and that there might be a hell of a lawsuit about it, but he had a straight deed for it, and would hold it.' On cross-examination by Mr. Haynesworth, the witness J. R. Beason said: 'Q. Who did you first mention this conversation to? A. The first one I talked to was Mrs. Linder herself. Q. How long was this afterwards? A. I don't remember. Something like two or three years.' On re-direct examination the following was his testimony: 'Q. When you mentioned it to her, what did she claim? A. She claimed she had sold him only a lifetime interest. I heard her tell Ed. so once. Q. What did he say? A. He said he had a straight deed, and would hold it. Q. How long ago was that? A. About six years ago.' While there may be a doubt as to the time when Mrs. Linder was informed by R. G. Ray that defendant had a straight-out deed, as testified to by Mrs. Nannie Smith—whether five or six years before the death of her mother—yet the testimony of J. R. Beason is sufficiently definite, I think, to show that Mrs. Linder had notice of the facts constituting the fraud for at least, and probably more than, six years before her death. * * *

The plaintiffs appealed upon several exceptions, but in different forms they present the question raised by the following exception: "That his honor erred in holding as follows: 'The testimony of J. R. Beason is sufficiently definite, I think, to show that Mrs. Linder had notice of the facts constituting the fraud for at least, and probably more than, six years before her death'—the error being that the testimony of that witness, taken in its entirety, did not support the conclusion so reached by his honor, as there was nothing in such testimony presenting any fact brought to the knowledge of Mrs. Linder upon which she could have discovered or established the fraud practiced upon her by this defendant, and, further, error being that such conclusion should not have been based upon such unsatisfactory testimony of the one witness, when the great body of the testimony in the case shows that Mrs. Linder was never in possession of the facts constituting the fraud practiced upon her, or in position to establish such fraud by any facts brought to her attention."

1. The attorneys of the respective parties differ as to whether the provisions of section 112, subd. 6, or section 118, Code Civ. Proc. 1902, are applicable to the case. The provisions of these sections are as follows: Section 112, subd. 6 (within six years): "Any action for relief on the ground of fraud, in cases which heretofore were solely cognizable by the court of chancery, the cause of action in such case not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud." Section 118: "An action for relief, not heretofore provided for, must be commenced within ten years after the cause of the action shall have accrued." This court deems it only necessary to state that the case is to be determined under the provisions of section 112, subd. 6, of the Code. When an action is brought for equitable relief on the ground of fraud, and a longer time has elapsed than the statute permits within which the action must be commenced, it is essential to the cause of action for the complaint to allege that the fraud was not discovered until a period within which the action may be brought; and the burden is upon the defendant to prove that the plaintiff, or the person under whom he claims, had knowledge of the fraud, or of such facts as would have led to the knowledge thereof, if pursued with reasonable diligence. Prescott v. Hubbell, 1 Hill, Eq. 215; Farr v. Farr, 1 Hill, Eq. 391; Shannon v. White, 6 Rich. Eq. 101, 60 Am. Dec. 115; Parham v. McCrary, 6 Rich. Eq. 145; McLure v. Ashby, 7 Rich. Eq. 439; Beattie v. Pool, 13 S. C. 384; Kibler v. McIlwain, 16 S. C. 554; Richardson y. Mounce, 19 S. C. 482; Harrell v. Kea, 37 S. C. 369, 16 S. E. 42; Garvin v. Garvin, 40 S. C. 443, 19 S. E. 79; Brown v. Brown, 44 S. C. 382, 22 S. E. 412; Bank v. Dowling, 52 S. C. 367, 29 S. E. 788; De Loach v. Sar-ratt, 55 S. C. 254, 33 S. E. 2; Toole v. Johnson, 61 S. C. 41, 39 S. E. 254.

2. The testimony does not show that Mary Linder had actual knowledge of the fraud, but the defendant contends that she had notice of facts which, if pursued with due diligence by a person of ordinary prudence, would have led to a discovery of the fraud six years prior to her death. In the first place, it seems to us that his honor, the circuit judge, erred in his finding of fact that Mary Linder received the information mentioned in the testimony of J. R. Beason six years prior to her death. That witness testified that he did not remember, and only undertook to state the time approximately. He, however, said she went to Spartanburg after his conversation with her. There was, also, other testimony to the effect that when R. G. Ray gave her similar information she was very much worried, went to Spartanburg, and consulted an attorney as to her rights. This was five or six years before her death. It is but reasonable to suppose that, if she had the conversation with Beason prior to that time, she would have gone at once to consult an attorney. It must be remembered that the burden of proof was on the defendant. But, conceding the fact that she received the information from Beason six years before she died, let us analyze it and see what it contained. It was simply, in effect, that he had a title in fee, and intended to hold the land at all hazards; but no fact was stated indicating that the defendant had imposed on her by fraud. In the case of Cunningham v. Cunningham, 20 S. C. 317, 382, the court recognizes the doctrine that, where there is an error common to both parties in the construction of a deed or will, it affords no ground for equitable relief, in the absence of fraud or imposition. In that case the court quotes with approval the following language of Chancellor Dargan, in Kelt v. Andrews, 4 Rich. Eq. 349: "The simple misconstruction of a will or deed, where there is no fraud or circumvention, cannot be regarded in any point of view as coming within the scope and authority of those cases where mistakes of law, in contradistinction to ignorance of law, have been considered as affording grounds for relief. It is a cardinal theory of the law, founded upon a necessary policy, that every one is presumed to have knowledge of its principles. This presumption prevails as well in reference to civil rights as in the criminal code. Without this doctrine, no system of law can practically fulfill the ends of its institution." Mary Linder, however, did not remain inactive, but consulted a prominent attorney in pursuance of the knowledge she had acquired as to the rights claimed by the defendant. The question, therefore, is, not whether the facts were sufficient to put her on inquiry, but whether she pursued such inquiry with due diligence; and the testimony satisfies us she did. The exceptions raising this question are sustained.

3. The respondent's attorneys gave notice that they would ask this court to sustain the decree on the additional grounds: (1) That there was no fraud in the transaction; and (2) that Mrs. Linder by retaining possession of the consideration and acquiescing in the transaction, has elected not to repudiate it, and is barred by laches. We proceed to consider first whether there was fraud. R. G. Ray testified as follows: "Q. Do you remember about the time this deed was made from Mrs. Mary Linder to R. E. Linder? A. Yes, sir; I remember the day he said he had got it. Q. Now, then, prior to the date this deed was made, state what R. E. Linder said to you, if anything, as to his intention regarding this land. A. I will state as near as I can what I remember about it. Some time before this deed was said to have been made, he talked to me about getting the deed and making the trade. He went on to say that he thought he was entitled to that land down there and ought to have it, and that he had a deal to make that he thought would work all right, if he could get it to work like he had it in his mind. He said that his mother was under the impression that she only had a life estate in that land under her father's will, and that he had the will examined by attorneys, and that he found that that entailment didn't hold good, that it was null and void, and that if he could get her to sign a deed of any kind that he would be all right. Well, he went on to say that Beason and Spurgeon ought not to have any of it anyhow. Q. Did he say anything about his intention of fooling the old lady? A. Yes; he said that if he could get her to sign the deed he could work the trick and hold the property. Q. All right. After it was made, state what conversation you had with R. E. Linder. A. Well, he told me that he had got that trick worked, and had the deed fixed, and he thought he had it so it would take them a damn long time to get it; that he expected to be deviled, but that they would have a long fight to get it. Those were the words he spoke. Q. Did he not say how much he made in that deal? A. He said he had made about $10,000 in that day's work, and that it had made him rich. Q. Was there anything about who he dreaded in the transaction? A. Yes. Q. Just tell what he said. A. After Nathan Littlejohn married into the family, which was some time after the first transaction that the deed was made, he said that he was looking for some trouble now, that Nathan Littlejohn had got in there, and that he had brains and money, and he dreaded the two together. That was just what he said. Q. Did you ever tell him about what you thought about him working the trick on the old lady? A. I do not know how much was said about it. I told him he ought not to work that kind of trick on his old mother. I had several conversations with him. Q. What did he say? A. He said he had it all right; that they would have to fight for it. Q. What estate did he say the old lady intended to convey to him? A. Life estate in the Bob Lipscomb land. That was my understanding. Q. Did you talk to him frequently about this matter? A. Yes, sir; he talked to me 50 times about this matter, both before and after. Very often when he had a drink ahead; that was when he talked most. Q. Did you ever hear Mrs. Linder say what she had conveyed to him? A. Yes, sir; her life estate. Told me time and again that that was all she intended to convey to him. She even got me to go to Spartanburg on one occasion to see if she could not enter suit and have it back." W. L. Self testified as follows: "Q. Do you know R. E. Linder? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long have you known him? A. Ever since I was a boy. Q. Went to school with him? A. Yes, sir. Q. Been intimate with him since that time? A. Yes, sir. Q. What, if, anything, did you hear him say regarding the land that was deeded to him by his mother? A. About three or four years ago last fall me and him went to Spartanburg, and on our way back he was bragging how rich he was, what a fine plantation he had here before Gaffney; and I said, 'Yes; I heard Mr. Littlejohn say he was going to devil you after your mother died.' And he said, 'Yes'; he expected that. He said he had a straightout deed signed up; that she signed it; that she thought she was signing her lifetime interest; that he fooled her." Furthermore, the form in which the deed was prepared was suspicious, and the circumstances attending the execution of the deed tended to show that the defendant imposed upon his mother. This ground is therefore overruled.

4. We will consider next the second of the additional grounds: Nannie Smith testified as follows: "Q. Did she continue to believe that she only had a life estate? A. She went to Mr. Carlisle, it worried her so much. Mr. Carlisle told her to just state the case as it is, and she did so. He said: 'Mrs. Linder, you have only a lifetime interest in the place, and nothing can be done until after your death.' Q. And she acted on his advice and continued to believe she only had a life estate? A. Yes, sir." R. G. Ray testified as follows: "Q. After she told Mr. Carlisle as to what took place when the deed was signed, and the understanding between her and him, and as to what kind of an estate was being conveyed by that paper, what did Capt. Carlisle tell her? A. He told her that she had made a deed, and that he did not know that she could do anything during her lifetime, but that her heirs could take action after her death. Q. What was Capt. Carlisle's advice as to the situation? A. He told her that if she had only deeded him a lifetime interest that, of course it would hold good, and that her heirs would have a chance at it after her death. Q. And she acted on that advice? A. Yes, sir. Q. You went with her? A. Yes, sir; Mrs. Smith was along. Q. And Capt. Carlisle gave that advice under the information he received from Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Linder, as to what had taken place when the paper was signed? A. Yes, sir. Q. And the old woman was much relieved when she got that information? A. Yes, sir; she seemed very much better satisfied." The conduct of Mrs. Linder, after she consulted Mr. Carlisle, was consistent with the advice which he gave her, and explains her seeming laches and acquiescence. This ground is also overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

Ex parte ROMANS.

In re ROMANS' ESTATE.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 20, 1907.)

MARRIAGE—NEGROES—SOLEMNIZATION.

Act 1865 (13 St. at Large, p. 291) provides that persons of color desirous of thereafter becoming husband and wife shall have the contract duly solemnized, but also declares that cohabitation, with reputation or recognition of the parties, shall be evidence of marriage in civil and criminal cases. Act 1866 (13 St. at Large, p. 393) declares that all differences between persons of color and white persons as to right to contract are abrogated. Held, that solemnization is not essential to the validity of a marriage between negroes.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenwood County; George E. Prince, Judge.

Application by Luvinia Romans for administration on the estate of Daniel Romans, deceased, which was contested by Henrietta Romans. From a decree awarding administration to petitioner, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Ellis G. Graydon, for appellant. McGhee & Richardson, for respondent.

WOODS, A. J. Upon the death of Daniel Romans, a negro, Luvinia Romans, claiming to be his widow, applied to the probate court of Greenwood county for letters of administration on his estate. The appellant, Henrietta Romans, denying that Daniel Romans and Luvinia Romans were married, asserted the right to administration as the lawful wife of Romans at his death. The judgment of the probate court, holding Luvinia to be the true widow was affirmed by the circuit court, and we can discover no ground to doubt the correctness of the conclusion.

Appellant admits that before her own marriage to Romans there was a marriage ceremony in December, 1863, by which Daniel Romans and Luvinia contracted in the presence of witnesses to be husband and wife, and that Romans and Luvinia immediately thereafter publicly entered into marriage relations, which were continued until he deserted her. The validity of Luvinia's marriage was attacked on the sole ground that the marriage was not solemnized by a clergyman, the district judge, or magistrate, or any judicial officer, as provided by the act of 1865. The statute of 1865 contains these provisions on which appellant relies: "Persons of color desirous hereafter to become husband and wife should have the contract of marriage duly solemnized. A clergyman, the district judge, a magistrate, or any judicial officer may solemnize marriages." 13 St. at Large, p. 291. But the same statute also contains this provision: "Cohabitation, with reputation or recognition of the parties, shall be evidence of marriage in cases criminal and civil." In addition to this, by the act of 1866 (13 St. at Large, p. 393), all differences between persons of color and white persons as to the right to contract were done away with.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

1. MINES AND MINERALS—PARTNERSHIP—WHEN IMPLIED.

If two or more owners of a mine unite in working it, without any partnership agreement, the act of working it together creates a mining partnership; and the same is true of two or more holding interests in a lease of mining property.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tyler County.

Bill by W. E. Kirchner against L. E. Smith and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. V. Blair, Caldwell & Caldwell, Pugh & Pugh, and H. P. Camden, for appellants. B. Engle, J. H. Strickling, and C. R. Riggle, for appellee.

McWHORTER, J. On the 8th day of April, 1890, Junius A. McCormick and others assigned and transferred to L. E. Smith certain oil and gas leases described in the paper assigning the same. On the 15th day of September, 1892, the said L. E. Smith assigned the same to a corporation known as "Owls Head Oil Company." Both of the above-mentioned assignments were duly acknowledged and recorded in the county clerk's office of Tyler county. Afterwards the Owls Head Oil Company became involved, and its effects were levied upon under an execution issued upon a judgment rendered against said corporation, and sold by a constable, at which sale Frank P. McNell became the purchaser, and took from the constable, St. Myers, of Ohio county, a bill of sale of said effects; and on the 9th day of April, 1894, the said McNell sold and transferred all the property of the said Owls Head Oil Company so purchased at the constable's sale to L. E. Smith, C. H. Taney, T. M. Darrah, C. F. Kotzebue (now represented by Mary E. Matthews, late Kotzebue), J. A. Burgbacher, A. J. Jameson, J. S. Pierpoint, R. A. Martin, John Stealey, and W. E. Kirchner, all of whom were stockholders in the said Owls Head Oil Company, and holding together 120 shares of stock in the proportions shown in the record. None of the other stockholders in said Owls Head Oil Company participated in the purchase; those named as the purchasers buying for themselves alone. In said purchase were included the various oil and gas leases so transferred to the Owls Head Oil Company by the said L. E. Smith. The purchasers of said property held the same in the proportions in which they had held stock in the said corporation. Among the leases so purchased and held by them was one of July 31, 1889, for a tract of 104 acres, more or less, made by W. S. Lawson, one of August 2, 1889, made by David Hickman on a tract of 100 acres, more or less, and also one of August 6, 1889, made by E. P. Snyder on a tract of 105 acres, more or less, which leases were taken by William Johnson, who assigned an interest therein to the said McCormick and others, assignors of said L. E.

Smith. On the 18th of May, 1895, at a meeting of all the said 10 parties composing the said mining partnership, excepting John Stealey, who was not present, the said partnership entered into a contract with C. P. Tustin, guardian of Harvey Lawson, Ella Lawson, Maggie Lawson, James Lawson, and Calvin Lawson, infant children of W. S. Lawson, deceased, and Nathan Lawson, Ida Railing, and Milroy Railing, her husband, of the county of Tyler, as parties of the first part, with W. E. Kirchner, one of the said partners, of the second part, whereby, in consideration of the sum of $2,500 cash and of the covenants and agreements made to the party of the second part for a lease, for the purpose of operating and drilling for gas and oil, of a tract of 96 acres of land. Under the agreement the party of the second part was to hold the premises for and during the term of two years from the date of the lease, and so long thereafter as oil or gas was produced in paying quantities or rentals paid thereon. The usual one-eighth part of the oil was to be given to the lessors, and $300 per annum for each gas well the products of which was utilized off the premises; said lease to become null and void and all rights thereunder cease unless a well should be completed by the party of the second part within one year from the date of the lease, and the party of the second part to pay the other parties at the rate of $2.50 per acre per month in advance from the date of the lease until a well should be completed on the premises, and containing a further provision that the second party, his heirs or assigns, should have the right to at any time surrender up the lease, from which time it should be null and void and no longer binding on either party, and that all conditions between the parties should be extended to their heirs and assigns.

On the 16th day of August, 1895, the said L. E. Smith, W. E. Kirchner, in his own right and as administrator of C. F. Kotzebue, T. M. Darrah, C. H. Taney, J. A. Burgbacher, A. J. Jameson, J. S. Pierpoint, R. A. Martin, and John Stealey (the latter mentioned in the body of the paper, but which was not signed or executed by him), in consideration of $2,500 paid, granted, assigned, and set over to the Carter Oil Company, its successors and assigns, "all their interest in and to all the leases and contracts on and affecting the W. S. Lawson farm of 96 acres in Meade district, Tyler county, West Virginia"—followed by a general description of the land—"Including an old Johnson lease on the premises and a lease from C. P. Tustin, administrator of the estate of W. S. Lawson, deceased, and guardian of the minor heirs, and the two major heirs, and a contract with B. Forst to complete a well on the premises without cost to the second party."

On the 16th of August, 1895, C. P. Tustin, guardian, filed his petition in a summary proceeding in the circuit court of Tyler county to sell the interests of the infants in pursuance of said contract, and on the 19th of August, 1895, procured a decree from said court to sell the same to said Kirchner, under which decree the said Tustin, as guardian, conveyed the seven-eighths of the oil and the gas to the said Kirchner on the 20th of August, 1895; but from the decree and deed made thereunder the provision in the contract of May 18, 1895, of the right of surrender of the said lease by the lessee at any time was left out. At the end of two years from the date of the contract for lease, the infants, by their next friend, and the adult heirs of W. S. Lawson, brought their action of assumpsit against Kirchner in the circuit court of Tyler county for the rents accruing under the said contract, and obtained judgment for the said rents, amounting in all to, including interest and costs, $5,687.48, which judgment was affirmed by this court upon writ of error obtained by the said Kirchner.

At the March rules, 1902, Kirchner filed his bill in equity against the parties interested in said contract for lease at the time it was taken, alleging that they composed at the time a mining partnership, and took the lease as such partners, and that he held the same for himself and them in trust, and prayed that the said defendants be required to answer; that plaintiff might have an accounting of said partnership business and affairs, and that the cause be referred to a commissioner for that purpose; that upon the coming in of the report of said commissioner a decree might be rendered in his favor against the mining partnership for the amount of all moneys found to have been expended by him on account of said judgment, interest, costs, attorney's fees, and expenses in said action of assumpsit and appeal, together with whatever balance of the judgment and interest accrued and accruing thereon that he might be liable to pay; that said mining partnership be dissolved; and for further and general relief. The defendants Smith, Taney, and Darrah, at the April term, 1902, filed their demurrer to the plaintiff's bill. On July 19, 1902, the court sustained the demurrer, and on motion of plaintiff the cause was remanded to rules for an amended and supplemental bill, which was filed at August rules, 1902.

In his amended bill plaintiff alleged that he had paid the residue of said judgment and named the persons composing the alleged mining partnership, and alleging: That by agreement of the said partners among themselves the whole number of interests or shares in said partnership were 120, owned and held by the members as follows: Smith, 20; Darrah, 22; Burgbacher, 2½; Jameson, 2½; Pierpoint, 5; Martin, 10; Stealey, 16; Matthews, 11; and plaintiff, 11. That profits accruing and losses sustained by said mining partnership were shared by the members on the basis of the interests or shares so owned by them, respectively, as set out. That at a meeting of the members of such partnership, held in the town of Middlebourne, before said suit of Tustin against Susan Lawson, widow, and others, was instituted, in which said oil and gas interests were sold and purchased by said partnership in said 96 acres of land, it was agreed that said purchase should be made for the price of $2,428.49 of the said guardian, and the price was actually paid by said members on the basis of their interests as set out. That it was understood and agreed by and among the said members that plaintiff was to take and hold the legal title to said oil and gas in his name for convenience in transacting the business, and to hold the same for the use and benefit of himself and the other members, and that he should be governed by the wishes and directions of the members; and in pursuance to the sale made by the said mining partnership of the oil and gas interests to the Carter Oil Company and the wishes and directions of said members he conveyed the same to the said Carter Oil Company by deed. That he caused notice of the pendency of said action of assumpsit against him for the rentals to be given to the members of said mining partnership to aid and help defend said suit, and gave notice of the judgment to said members, and appointed times and places to meet and make arrangements for such defense; but the members failed and refused to aid him in the defense of the suit or to advise him, and that all the members had failed and refused to contribute towards the payment of said judgment, interest, costs, etc., except Burgbacher, who paid $118.04 on account of his 2½ shares, Jameson, who paid the same, Martin who paid $474.16 on account of his 10 shares, and Mary E. Matthews, who paid $519.37 on account of her 11 shares, and plaintiff paid the residue of said judgment, costs, and expenses, but did not release said members so paying from any further liability that might exist against them on that account—and again praying for an accounting on account of said judgment, costs, and expenses, and an accounting of said partnership business and affairs, and for general relief. The defendants Smith, Taney, and Darrah filed their demurrer to the said amended bill, which demurrer was overruled, and said demurrants then filed their joint and several answer; and defendant Stealey also filed his answer, to which answer of Stealey the plaintiff replied generally.

The defendants Smith, Taney, and Darrah denied the existence of such mining partnership, or that they were engaged in leasing lands and operating the same for oil and gas and marketing same as alleged; denied that in the month of August, 1895, said mining partnership purchased in the summary proceeding from Tustin, guardian, the interests of said infant heirs of Lawson, or that the deed was made therefor to the plaintiff member of said mining partnership for convenience, or that title was vested in him for their benefit, or that the members of said mining partnership were jointly and severally liable to pay said judgment, costs, etc., as alleged, or that plaintiff was entitled to an accounting of the so-called partnership; denying all the material allegations of the bill, but averring that the facts were that they were, with plaintiff and different other persons, owners of stock in the Owls Head Oil Company, a corporation, which was owner of divers leaseholds for oil and gas purposes; that respondents, with other defendants in this suit, became part owners in the oil and gas privileges conveyed by Tustin, guardian, and the adult heirs of W. S. Lawson, to Kirchner by contract in writing commonly called an "oil and gas lease" on the 96 acres, bearing date the 13th day of May, 1895, but that it was not true that they, with said Kirchner and others, entered upon the premises and operated or attempted to operate the same for oil and gas as a mining partnership or otherwise; that they were such owners of said contract and leases from the 13th day of May, 1895, until the 16th day of August, 1895, when they sold and assigned the same to the Carter Oil Company, with all their interests in and to all the leases and contracts on and affecting the Lawson farm of 96 acres, which sale to the Carter Oil Company was before the said decree of sale, and before the sale and confirmation of the sale, and before the deed to Kirchner dated August 20, 1895, was made, so that at the time of his acceptance of said deed respondents had not, nor had either of them, any interest whatever, individually or as partners or otherwise, in said lands, oil, and gas, and no interest whatever in said summary proceedings and the acts and doings of said Kirchner therein; and denied that they authorized Kirchner to act for and in behalf of them, that he had no right, power, or authority to participate in any purchase, or accept any lease or contract or leasehold, differently from the terms, conditions, and covenants set forth in said agreement of May 13, 1895, "in which leasehold it was and is stipulated that the same shall become null and void, and all rights thereunder shall cease and determine, unless a well shall be completed on said premises within one year from the date hereof, and party of the second part shall pay to the party of the first part at the rate of $2.50 per acre per month in advance from the date hereof until a well is completed on the premises hereby leased, and it is further agreed that the second party, his heirs, or assigns, shall have the right at any time to surrender up this lease. Then and from that time this lease and agreement shall be null and void and no longer binding on either party, which stipulations and agreements therein contained were of material concern and interest to these respondents and to the said Carter Oil Company, the assignee of the owners of said leasehold as hereinbefore set forth," and that the Carter Oil Company refused to purchase of the said Kirchner and to accept a deed of assignment from him of the oil and gas rights and privileges conveyed to him by the deed of the 20th of August, 1895, which differed so materially from the agreement of May 13, 1895, and that if plaintiff was amerced in costs and damages and had to pay out and expend money by reason of his acceptance of said deed of August 20, 1895, and by reason of said action of assumpsit and judgment for the recovery of rentals, it was brought on by his own act, unauthorized by respondents, or either of them, or by the so-called mining partnership, and that he had no right to call on them for contribution.

The said Stealey says that from depositions taken in the case he learned of the assignment by McNell, April 9, 1894, of all the property of the Owls Head Oil Company purchased by him at constable sale to L. E. Smith, Darrah, Taney, respondent, and others; that he was not present when said transfer was made by McNell, nor advised of the meeting, nor consulted in regard thereto; that he never authorized or directed said McNell to so convey to him in connection with the other parties, nor did he direct or authorize any person to act for him or in his behalf in said transaction; denied that he was present or was consulted about the contract of May 13, 1895; that he had no part therein, and that he never authorized any one to act for him; that he never paid any part of the consideration of the contract of May 13, 1895; that he never was asked to sign, nor did he sign, the agreement made on the 16th day of August, 1895, between L. E. Smith and others and the Carter Oil Company; that he never in any manner, either personally or through any person authorized to act for him, to any extent authorized or directed plaintiff, Kirchner, to purchase the underlying oil and gas pertaining to the Lawson leasehold under decree of court and take title thereto in his name, as alleged in the amended bill; that the action of Kirchner in purchasing said leasehold, as far as respondent was concerned, was wholly without authority and as a matter of fact without respondent's knowledge; that he never authorized Kirchner, out of any fund received by him from the Carter Oil Company, to pay any rentals for the use and benefit of respondent, and that until the reading of depositions of Kirchner and others respondent never knew that such rentals upon said leasehold had been paid; that he never claimed any interest in said fund and as a matter of fact had no interest in it, and that the act of Kirchner in paying such rentals was purely voluntary and wholly without the knowledge or consent of respondent; that respondent was not indebted to Kirchner, nor was he ever indebted to him, on account of matter or business transacted contained in plaintiff's original or amended bills; that so far as respondent was concerned said bills were without equity; that he should not be required to contribute any money for the relief and benefit of plaintiff as to any matter or transaction alleged in his bills, but as to respondent the cause should be dismissed.

On the 21st day of April, 1904, the cause was heard upon the bill and amended and supplemental bill and exhibits, the bills taken for confessed as to all the defendants except Smith, Taney, Darrah, and Stealey, upon the answers and replication to Stealey's answer, upon the depositions and exhibits filed therewith, and upon a certain contract in writing between T. M. Darrah and nine others (the defendants and others) and J. W. Henderson, dated October 13, 1897, filed in evidence by plaintiff, to which counsel for defendants objected and excepted and moved to strike out, which motion was overruled, when the court held, and so decreed, that the nine defendants named, together with the plaintiff, composed and formed a mining partnership as alleged in the bill and amended bill, holding interests or shares in said partnership as stated, making in the aggregate 120 shares or interests, and decreeing that they should pay to plaintiff the sums aggregating on the 19th day of March, 1902, the amount of $5,695.97, and decreed against the defendants therefor in proportion to their shares or holdings in said partnership, with leave to plaintiff to sue out separate executions therefor against the defendants L. E. Smith, C. H. Taney, T. M. Darrah, J. S. Pierpoint, and John Stealey, and continued the cause for further decree against said defendants for contribution in case plaintiff failed to make, on execution or otherwise, off of said defendants or either of them, the said sums so decreed against them. From such decree the defendants Smith, Taney, Darrah, and Stealey appealed, and say the court erred in overruling their demurrers to plaintiff's amended and supplemental bill; that the bill fails to make proper averments of facts upon and from which a mining partnership can be inferred. The bill alleges the names of the 10 persons composing the partnership; that the whole number of interests or shares were 120, and showing the number held by each member; that all profits accrued and losses sustained by said mining partnership were shared by the members thereof on the basis of the interests or shares owned by them respectively, and all assessments against the members were made on the basis of their respective holdings, and dividends paid in the same way, and all business of said partnership was done and transacted on the same basis; that the purchase price paid for the oil and gas interests in the 96 acres of Lawson land was contributed by the respective members in the same proportion according to their interests or shares, as well as the expense attending the procurement of the infants' interests; that the money received from the Carter Oil Company was divided and distributed among the members in the like proportions; that said mining partnership placed or caused to be placed on said 96 acres of Lawson land a boiler and other appliances, and caused to be erected a rig to drill for oil and gas thereon by virtue of a certain drilling contract in writing with one Bernard Forst, which said drilling contract by the terms thereof was subsequently, and before the bringing of the action of assumpsit for the rentals against plaintiff, forfeited, and the interest conveyed by said contract in writing reverted to said mining partnership, and passed by virtue of their deed of assignment to the Carter Oil Company. "If two or more owners of a mine unite in working it, without any partnership agreement, the act of working it together creates a mining partnership; and the same is true of two or more holding interests in a lease of mining property." Thornton, Oil & Gas, § 314. "The joint owners of a mine, which they unite and co-operate in working, constitute a mining partnership. Without any contract or agreement between them, by the act of uniting in working the mines the relation is established." Bar. & A. Mines & Mining, p. 750. In Childers v. Neeley, 47 W. Va. 70, 34 S. E. 828, 49 L. R. A. 468, 81 Am. St. Rep. 777, it is held: "Where tenants in common or joint tenants of an oil lease or mine unite and co-operate in working it, they constitute a mining partnership." The bill in case at bar shows that the plaintiff, together with the defendants sought to be charged, were tenants in common, co-owners of the leaseholds, and united in working the same.

As a further ground of demurrer it is claimed that the record in the action at law, Lawson v. Kirchner, filed as Exhibit B with plaintiff's bill, shows that whatever was done by way of operating the Lawson farm was done by the Owls Head Oil Company, a corporation, and refers to the testimony of Burgbacher in said exhibit. It is true he calls it the Owls Head Oil Company, but says it was a partnership at that time—says it was in the month of August, 1895, which was more than a year after the effects of the Owls Head Oil Company had been sold out and purchased by the defendants, who had all been stockholders in the Owls Head Oil Company. While the purchasers were all members of the Owls Head Oil Company while it existed, all the stockholders did not participate in the purchase of its property, and the purchasers having been active in the operations of the said corporation, it was not unnatural that the witness should refer to them as the "Owls Head Oil people," or even as the "Owls Head Oil Company." It clearly appears that the operation was by the defendants, and not by the Owls Head Oil Company.

A further ground of demurrer is that the record shows that the demurrants had sold out and parted with their interests in the Lawson lease, if any they had, before the rentals accrued for which Kirchner was sued. The bill, which the demurrer admits to be true, shows that the title to the lease given by Tustin, guardian, was made to Kirchner for the benefit of himself and all the defendants, that his name was used for the sake of convenience in transacting the business, that the money paid for the lease was paid by all the parties for whose benefit it was taken, and when it was sold to the Carter Oil Company the proceeds, $2,500, was distributed amongst them all, each getting his share or proportion according to his holdings in the partnership; that Kirchner's name was used in the summary proceeding to get the infants' title for all alike in their agreed proportions, the oil and gas were sold to him, and he was bound to pay the rent, although paying it for himself and his co-owners, and they could not relieve themselves by assigning their equitable interests and let the burden fall upon their fellow, who held the legal title alone, except as to his own tenth interest in it. Demurrants further say that if they were members of a mining partnership owning the Lawson premises for the purpose of operating the same for oil and gas, and conveyed their interests to the Carter Oil Company before rentals had accrued, then plaintiff could have no claim on them but must look to their assignee or grantee. The Carter Oil Company had the contract as well of Kirchner as of all the defendants for a good title and with a surrender clause, and could not be made liable for the rentals, and was not, therefore, a necessary party to the bill, as claimed by demurrants. The demurrer was properly overruled.

Appellants' second assignment of error is in refusing to sustain their exceptions to the depositions taken on behalf of the plaintiff and in overruling their motion to strike out the contract in writing between Darrah and others and J. W. Henderson, bearing date the 13th of October, 1897. The record does not show that the exceptions taken to the depositions and indorsed thereon in the course of their taking were in any way brought to the attention of the trial court at the hearing, or that such exceptions were passed upon by the court. In such case such exceptions will be deemed to have been waived. Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 59; Baxter v. Moore, 5 Leigh (Va.) 219; Simmons v. Simmons' Adm'r, 33 Grat. (Va.) 451; Rose v. Brown, 11 W. Va. 122; McVeigh v. Chamberlain, 94 Va. 73, 26 S. E. 395; Martin v. South Salem Land Co., 94 Va. 28, 26 S. E. 595; Fant v. Miller, 17 Grat. (Va.) 187; Vanscoy v. Stinchcomb, 29 W. Va. 263, 11 S. E. 927.

It is also strenuously contended by appellants that their objections to the testimony of witnesses Engle and Riggle should have been sustained, and the evidence ruled out, because of their relationship as attorney and client with the plaintiff, Kirchner; that "these men were acting on the 13th day of May, 1895, as attorneys at law for the parties to this suit, and all that they learned upon that day, during the negotiations and consultations in their office, was through and by reason of that confidential, and almost sacred, relation"; that any directions given them by the parties, or any of them, respecting the proceedings to obtain a valid title of the infants' interest in the leasehold for oil and gas, and any advice they gave on that occasion, could not be legitimately divulged by them in this case without the consent of all the parties who employed them. The same rule would apply to the exception to the depositions of these witnesses as to the others just mentioned; but in case the objections had been especially called to the attention of the court and overruled, the ruling would have been correct. This is a case in which all the parties, the plaintiff and the defendants, who constitute the mining partnership, together employed the said Engle and Riggle as attorneys to prepare the contract with Tustin, guardian, conduct the summary proceedings to obtain the title of the infants to the Lawson land, and to advise them therein. As between themselves there was no privileged communications. In 23 A. & E. E. L. 65, we find: "An attorney employed by two or more persons to give professional advice or assistance in a matter in which they are mutually interested can, on litigation subsequently arising between such persons or their representatives, be examined as a witness at the instance of either as to communications made when he was acting as attorney for all. But he cannot disclose such communications in a controversy between his clients, or either of them, and third persons." In Sparks v. Sparks, 51 Kan. 195, 32 Pac. 892, it is held that "communications made to an attorney who was acting for both parties and made in the presence of both parties cannot be regarded as confidential and privileged"—citing Goodwin & Co.'s Appeal, 117 Pa. 514, 12 Atl. 736, 2 Am. St. Rep. 696; Whiting v. Barney, 30 N. Y. 330, 86 Am. Dec. 385; Britton v. Lorenz, 45 N. Y. 51; Hanlon v. Doherty, 109 Ind. 37, 9 N. E. 782; Dunn v. Amos, 14 Wis. 106; De Wolfe v. Strader, 26 Ill. 225, 79 Am. Dec. 371; Machette v. Wanless, 2 Colo. 169; 1 Whar. Ev. § 587. And in Hurlburt v. Hurlburt, 128 N. Y. 420, 23 N. E. 651, 26 Am. St.

Rep. 482, it is held that "the provision of the Code of Civil Procedure (paragraph 835) prohibiting an attorney from disclosing professional communications made to him by his client does not apply as between the parties to communications made by two or more persons in consultation with an attorney for their mutual benefit. It cannot be invoked in any litigation which may thereafter arise between such persons, although it seems it may in a litigation between them and a stranger." "When two persons employ an attorney in the same business, communications made by them in pursuance of such common retainer are not privileged inter sese." Gulick v. Gulick, 39 N. J. Eq. 516. In section 587, vol. 1, Mr. Wharton, in his work on Evidence, says: "It is easy to conceive of cases in which two or more persons address a lawyer as their common agent. So far as concerns a stranger their communications to the lawyer would be privileged. It is otherwise, however, as to themselves. As they stand on the same footing as to the lawyer, either could compel him to testify against the other as to their negotiations. See, also, Lynn v. Lyerle, 113 Ill. 128; Griffin v. Griffin, 125 Ill. 430, 17 N. E. 782; Cady v. Walker, 62 Mich. 157, 28 N. W. 805, 4 Am. St. 834; 6 Cur. Law, 1885, § 4. Besides the authorities cited, the same doctrine has been held in the states of Alabama, California, Kentucky, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, North Carolina, Oregon, Texas, and doubtless others. These witnesses, Engle and Riggle, in the meeting of May 13, 1895, were employed as attorneys alike for the plaintiff, Kirchner, and the defendants, composing the mining partnership, for their mutual benefit, the promotion of their common interests, and under the authorities cited there could be no privileged communications between them and their attorneys as among or between themselves. Hence the witnesses were competent to testify.

Appellants say the court erred in overruling their motion to strike out as evidence the contract in writing between T. M. Darrah and others and J. W. Henderson, dated October 13, 1897, offered with the deposition of the plaintiff. The leasehold described and assigned in this paper was a part of the leases sold by the constable to McNell as the property of the Owls Head Oil Company and assigned by McNell to the 10 persons constituting the alleged mining partnership. This contract of sale recites the fact that the parties of the first part sold and transferred thereby to the said J. W. Henderson all of their interests, respectively, "in and to the leases held by the parties of the first part in fifteen (15) acres compromise of the E. P. Snider tract of land, and also for two locations on the thirty (30) acres, part of the E. P. Snider tract of land, now owned by D. W. Snider, which two locations were secured to the parties of the first part by a compromise, reference to which agreement of compromise, respectively, is hereto made. The said compromise agreements are to be turned over to the party of the second part as evidence of the rights of the parties of the first part in said tract of land, together with all the oil heretofore and hereafter produced from said tracts of land, and all the machinery, rigs, boilers, engines, casing, tubing, rods, tankage, and all other necessary fixtures and appurtenances thereto and thereon situated on the two tracts aforesaid." The consideration of this agreement was $17,000. It is shown by this assignment on its face that the defendants had been operating for oil on said premises, as it speaks of oil theretofore and thereafter produced, as well as of machinery and all necessary fixtures and appurtenances for operating for oil. 1 Wig. on Ev. § 10, says: "All facts having rational probative value are admissible, unless some specific rule forbids." No specific objection was made to this paper; simply a general objection to its introduction and consideration, with a motion to strike out the same. This paper has probative value, especially in view of the answer filed by John Stealey, wherein he disclaims all interest in the property assigned to him and others by McNell, purchaser of the Owls Head Oil Company's property. This assignment of Darrah and others of October 13, 1897, represents a part of the leaseholds so assigned by McNell to Stealey and others, and in this assignment the said Stealey realized his proportion of the $17,000 consideration from Henderson for the said conveyance. The contract was properly admitted.

Special effort is made to relieve the defendant John Stealey from any liability on account of the Tustin contract of May 13, 1895. Stealey filed an answer to the bill and amended bill, in which he admits being a stockholder in the Owls Head Oil Company, but denying participation in the purchase of the Tustin, guardian, lease, and denying, also, that he had any interest in the assignment made by McNell of the 9th of April, 1894; but we find not only the sale to J. W. Henderson of October 13, 1897, joined in by said Stealey, which was a transfer of a part of the leasehold so assigned by McNell to Stealey and others of the effects of the Owls Head Oil Company, but we find on the day that the said defendants and Kirchner made the contract with Tustin, guardian, May 13, 1895, John Stealey, with the other nine members of the mining partnership, executed a contract with Bernard Forst, dated May 11, 1895, but acknowledged on the said 13th day of May, assigning to said Forst an undivided three-eighths interest in what is known as the "Old William Johnson lease" on the said W. S. Lawson tract, dated July 31, 1889, called in said lease 104 acres, but shown by the record to be the same tract of 96 acres mentioned in the Tustin lease, and one of the leases sold as the property of the Owls Head Oil Company, for the assignment of which interest said Forst was to begin forthwith to drill an oil well on said "W. S. Lawson lease, and drill same as rapidly as possible and without avoidable delay, down to and through the Big Indian sand, if necessary, so as to make it a well to thoroughly test said last-named leasehold," but to be drilled entirely at the expense of Forst. The interest that Stealey had in said leasehold can only be accounted for through the assignment of McNeill of the property purchased by him of the Owls Head Oil Company. The Tustin lease was to supplement and perfect the title held by the said mining partnership in the Lawson land. All the circumstances go to show beyond question that John Stealey was a partner with the other members of the firm in their operations in buying and selling and operating oil leases. Another circumstance which adds strongly to this conclusion is that said Stealey failed to go upon the witness stand to sustain the averments of his answer and to contradict the statements made tending to show his interest in the said partnership. If it was a fact that he had no interest in the partnership, he should have proved the same by his own testimony and subjected himself to cross-examination, that his contention might have a clear showing. There was no one had such peculiar knowledge of his interest in the matter as Stealey himself, and surely the evidence connecting him with the partnership was of such a character, taken together with all the circumstances of the cause, as to call upon him to offer the best evidence at his command to overcome the prima facie case made against him by the plaintiff. In Heflebower v. Detrick, 27 W. Va. 16, it is held: "Where a party has in his possession or under his control evidence by the introduction of which at the trial he would be able to render certain a fact material to his success, which is otherwise left in doubt, and he withholds such evidence, the court will, upon a demurrer to the evidence introduced by his adversary, presume that the fact was against him." Also in Trust Co. v. McClellan, 40 W. Va. 405, 21 S. E. 1025, Syl. point 8: "Where the burden is on a party to a suit to prove a material fact in issue, the failure, without excuse, to produce an important and necessary witness to such fact raises the conclusive presumption that such witness' testimony, if introduced, would be adverse to the pretensions of such party." See, also, Wells-Stone v. Truax, 44 W. Va. 531, 29 S. E. 1006. The evidence establishes the fact that the parties bought the Tustin lease, that the title thereto was perfected by their counsel, Engle and Riggie, under the direction of all the members of the company who were present, the defendant L. E. Smith being the principal spokesman for the company, and the attorneys were instructed to get such title from the infants as would not be forfeited in case the rentals should not be paid strictly on time. While there is some conflict in the evidence, there is a strong preponderance thereof establishing the mining partnership as alleged in the bill; and the direct evidence, taken together with all the circumstances of the case, make it reasonably certain that John Stealey was a member of said partnership and liable as such.

Defendants Taney, Smith, and Darrah contend that the decree ought to be reversed as to them because there was no replication to their answer. Section 4, c. 134 (section 4035, Code 1906), provides: "No decree shall be reversed for want of a replication to the answer, where the defendant has taken depositions as if there had been a replication; nor shall a decree be reversed at the instance of a party who has taken depositions, for an informality in the proceedings, when it appears that there was a full and fair hearing upon the merits, and that substantial justice has been done." And in Moore v. Wheeler, 10 W. Va. 35, it is held: "A decree will not be reversed for want of a replication to the answer when the defendant has taken depositions as if there had been a replication." Richardson v. Donehoo, 16 W. Va. 685; Chalfants v. Martin, 25 W. Va. 394; Skaags v. Mann, 46 W. Va. 209, 220, 33 S. E. 110; Martin v. Kester, 49 W. Va. 647, 653, 39 S. E. 599; Paxton v. Paxton, 38 W. Va. 616, 18 S. E. 765; Goddin v. Vaughn's Ex'r, 14 Grat. (Va.) 102, 131; Justis' Anno. 942.

It is claimed to be error holding said suit on the docket for further decrees and in refusing to dismiss the bills. It was necessary to retain the cause for the final adjustment between the parties, in case the plaintiff should not be able to collect from all the parties against whom he so recovered the amounts thereof, and it was proper to retain the cause until the execution of the court's decrees. We see no reversible error in said decree, and therefore affirm the same.

Affirmed.

STATE v. LOTONO.*

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
June 17, 1907.)

1. FORGERY—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Forgery is the false and fraudulent making or altering of an instrument which would, if genuine, apparently impose a legal liability on another or change his legal liability to his prejudice.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Forgery, § 1.]

2. SAME—ALTERATION OF INSTRUMENT.

An alteration in an instrument, to constitute forgery, must be of a material part thereof; and a material alteration of an instrument is one which makes it speak a language different in legal effect from that which it originally spoke, or which carries with it some change in the rights, interests, or obligations of the parties to the writing.

3. SAME—MATERIALITY.

The materiality of the alteration is a question of law for the court, upon the admissibility of the altered instrument in evidence; and, the alteration being shown, nothing remains for the jury to pass upon.

4. SAME—FIGURES IN CHECK.

The figures in a check, following the words in the body thereof denoting the sum called for, are not a material part of the instrument; the words being controlling in determining its legal effect.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Circuit Court, Monongalia County.

Frank Lotono was convicted of forgery, and brings error. Reversed.

Wm. S. John and Wm. J. Sneec, for plaintiff in error. C. Wm. Cramer, Pros. Atty., for the State.

MILLER, J. The grand jury preferred an indictment in eight counts against Frank Lotono for forgery. His motion to quash was sustained as to the first count and overruled as to the others. On the trial, after the evidence was all in, but before argument, the prosecuting attorney elected to rely on the eighth count, and the defendant was found guilty as charged therein. This count charged that the defendant "on the _____ day of December, 1906, within one year next preceding the date of the finding of the indictment, in the said county, did afterward, on the day and year aforesaid, at the Citizens' National Bank of Morgantown, West Virginia, aforesaid, fraudulently and unlawfully and feloniously utter and attempt to employ as true, to the Citizens' National Bank of Morgantown, West Virginia, a certain other false, forged, and counterfeited writing or paper." The paper described is a check of the American Sheet & Tin Plate Company, of December 15, 1906, payable to defendant, or bearer, for $2.70, at the Citizens' National Bank, Morgantown, W. Va. When presented to the bank by the defendant for payment, the sum called for was written thus: "Two and 70-100 Dollars $20.70." The defendant presented this check, with six others and a slip on which all were listed, together aggregating $76.29. It was listed at $20.70; but the teller, in payment of the checks, counted it at $2.70. There was no direct evidence that the defendant altered the check; but the paymaster of the company, who wrote the check and delivered it to Lotono, testified that when delivered it called for $2.70, but since had been altered by inserting a cipher after the figure 2, so as to make the figures read $20.70, in which condition it was when presented to the bank for payment. The teller testified that when he handed the defendant the amount of the checks the latter said he did not have enough money; that he then showed Lotono the alteration, but did not remember what he said.

Our statute (Code 1899, c. 146, § 5 [Code 1906, § 4289]) provides: "If a person forge any writing other than such as is mentioned in the first and third sections of this chapter, to the prejudice of another's right, or utter or attempt to employ as true such forged writing, knowing it to be forged, he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than two nor more than ten years." Forgery is the false and fraudulent making or altering of an instrument which would, if genuine, apparently impose a legal liability on another or change his legal liability to his prejudice. Clark, Cr. L. §§ 11, 112; Turnipseed v. State, 45 Fla. 110, 33 South. 851, and cases cited; 2 Bishop, New Cr. L. §§ 573, 577; Burgess v. Blake, 86 Am. St. Rep. 86, note, and cases cited; State v. Briggs, 34 Vt. 501. An alteration in an instrument, to amount to forgery according to the authorities cited, must be such as to make it speak a language different in legal effect from that which it originally spoke, or which carries with it some change in the rights, interests, or obligations of the parties to the writing. It follows that an immaterial change—a change which, if true, would not affect the legal liability of the parties in an action on the instrument—would not amount to forgery. 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 572; State v. Poindexter, 23 W. Va. 805. The test is the legal effect of the change or alteration, not whether some one may be misled or deceived by the paper. Here the only change was in what are called in some cases the "marginal figures," which, while they might mislead one who should fail to observe the body of the instrument, could not change or affect the legal status of the parties, or tend in legal effect to prejudice another's rights. The alteration of the check in this case did not deceive the bank, and its legal effect was not changed. The materiality of the alteration is a question of law for the court, upon the admissibility of the altered instrument in evidence; and, the alteration being shown, nothing remains for the jury to pass upon. Manufacturing Co. v. Watson, 58 W. Va. 189, 195, 52 S. E. 515.

Was the alteration of the figures in the check a material one? We think not. It is true the figures follow the words in the body of the check denoting the sum called for, as is frequently the case, and are not strictly marginal; but we do not think they form a material part of the paper. They are for ready reference, as if written at the top or in the margin, and for convenience. They are not controlling, and do not change the legal effect of the paper. The words are the controlling portion, and the figures constitute no material part of the instrument. Many authorities so hold. 2 Cyc. 196, 211, and cases cited; Schryver v. Hawkes, 22 Ohio St. 308. We are cited to only one case which holds the contrary. Commonwealth v. Hide, 94 Ky. 517, 23 S. W. 195. That case stands alone, unsupported, and we do not think it states the law correctly. As a matter of law, upon the undisputed facts in this case, we do not think the prisoner guilty of any offense.

We therefore reverse the judgment of the circuit court, set aside the verdict of the jury, and discharge the prisoner from further prosecution.

WHITLEY GROCERY CO. et al. v. JONES et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1907.)

1. ADMINISTRATORS — JUDGMENT AUTHORIZING SALE OF LAND—MOTION TO SET ASIDE—PARTIES.

To a motion to set aside a judgment of the court of ordinary authorizing a sale of land by an administrator such administrator is a necessary party.

2. SAME.

If letters of dismission have been granted to the administrator, the judgment discharging him must be reopened before the motion to set aside the judgment authorizing the sale by him can be entertained.

3. SAME.

Although the purchasers at the sale and those holding under them, and also the person who had formerly been the administrator, but to whom letters of dismission had been granted, were made parties to a motion to set aside the judgment authorizing a sale by him, this would not obviate the effect of the grant of the letters of dismission or the absence of the administrator, as such, on whose application the judgment was rendered.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Sumter County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Petition by Josephine Jones and others in the court of ordinary to set aside an order granting leave to C. R. Whitley, administrator of Henry Jones, deceased, to sell certain land, and praying that a rule nisi be issued directing Whitley, the Whitley Grocery Company, and another to show cause why the relief prayed for should not be granted. On appeal to the superior court there was a judgment for movants, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Josephine Jones and her children filed a petition in the court of ordinary of Sumter county to set aside an order granting leave to C. R. Whitley, administrator of Henry Jones, deceased, to sell certain land, alleging as follows: Henry Jones, the husband of Josephine Jones, died in Sumter county on November 21, 1897, leaving certain described real estate. C. R. Whitley was appointed administrator on his estate, and applied for leave to sell the land. At the February term, 1898, of the court of ordinary, an order was passed granting such leave. He sold the property to the Whitley Grocery Company, and it afterwards deeded a part thereof to the Standard Grocery Company. The order is null and void, because no notice of it was ever published in the public gazette in which the county advertising was published, and as the law requires, and neither of the petitioners had any notice of the application or knew anything of it until after the deeds were made. It was prayed that the order be declared null and void and set aside, and that the petitioners have such other and further relief as the premises may warrant and demand, and also that a rule nisi be issued directing Whitley, the Whitley Grocery Company, and the Standard Grocery Company to show cause at the next term why the relief prayed should not be granted. By amendment it was alleged that Whitley had applied for, and had issued to him by the court of ordinary, letters of dismission as administrator of the estate of Henry Jones, and that at the time of filing the original petition and since there had been no administration on the estate. Each of the defendants demurred to the petition. The case was carried by appeal to the superior court. The demurrers were overruled, and a verdict directed for the movants. The defendants excepted.

W. P. Wallis, and Allen Fort & Sons, for plaintiffs in error. J. A. Hixon and Shipp & Sheppard, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). This is not a proceeding in equity, but a proceeding to set aside an order authorizing the sale of real estate by an administrator, in the court of ordinary where such order was granted. The question involved is not, therefore, to be tested by the power of a court of equity, but by the power of a court of ordinary. The demurrers contained several grounds, but it is only necessary to deal with one of them which controls the case. Each of the defendants demurred to the proceeding, on the ground that neither C. R. Whitley as administrator of the estate of Henry Jones, nor any other administrator of the deceased, was made a party or served. The order granting the administrator authority to sell was a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction. The present application is an effort to set aside that judgment, without having before the court as a party the administrator on whose petition and in whose favor it was granted. It is an attempt by motion to set aside a judgment without having before the court the party on whose petition it was rendered. C. R. Whitley individually is not the same as C. R. Whitley as administrator of the estate of Henry Jones. It is urged that the administrator has since been granted letters of dismission by the court of ordinary, and therefore cannot be made a party to this petition. In that lies the insuperable difficulty to entertaining the proceeding at all. The administrator is a necessary party. If he has been granted letters of dismission, he cannot be made a party unless the grant is reopened and he is reinstated in office. It is sought to avoid the necessity for making him a party by making parties of those who hold under the sale; but they alone were not interested. If the order is set aside, the sale and disposition of the proceeds might be a devastavit, and the securities on the bond of the administrator would be interested. Under certain circumstances it has been held that an equitable proceeding to set aside an executor's deed could be maintained without the presence of the executor, who had died. Hodges v. Wheeler, 126 Ga. 848.<sup>1</sup> But this is different from setting aside a judgment without the presence of the party in whose favor it was rendered, or any person representing him. See Broach v. Walker, 2 Ga. 428; Carter v. Anderson, 4 Ga. 516; Groce v. Field, 13 Ga. 24; Whitaker v. Smith, 33 Ga. 237; Bell v. Hanks, 55 Ga. 274; McArthur v. Matthewson, 67 Ga. 134. The demurrer should have been sustained, and the petition dismissed.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurred.

HENDERSON v. ARMSTRONG et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1907.)

DEEDS—RECORDING—PRIORITIES—DEED FROM HEIRS.

A deed to described wild land, executed by the general devisees of the deceased former owner, taken by the vendee therein for value and without notice of a deed to the same land executed by the testator, although recorded before the registry of the older deed, does not obtain priority over such senior conveyance.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Wilcox County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by J. W. Armstrong and others against P. A. Henderson. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. W. Armstrong and others brought suit, in the superior court of Wilcox county, against Parker A. Henderson, to enjoin the defendant from cutting the timber upon lots of land Nos. 210 and 212, in the Eighth district of that county, and for damages for the cutting of timber thereon. At the trial, the plaintiffs amended the petition so as to claim damages for timber cut from the land after the filing of the suit. By agreement of the parties, the case was tried by the judge, without the intervention of a jury, under a written agreement as to the facts. It was admitted that the timber on the two lots of land had been cut by defendant during the pendency of the suit, and that the question of damages for the cutting of the same by defendant was to be included in the suit and to be determined by the court in deciding the case. It was also admitted that the value of the timber cut by defendant was $800. The two lots were what is known as "wild land," no one being in possession of either until defendant entered upon them and began to cut the timber. The lots were granted by the state to Herschel V. Johnson on February 6, 1847, and he conveyed the same to James W. Armstrong on October 15, 1847. The deed from Johnson to Armstrong was recorded February 12, 1900. Plaintiffs are successors in title to James W. Armstrong. Herschel V. Johnson executed his will on August 15, 1880, in which he devised all his property, of every description, to his wife, Ann F. Johnson, during her life, with full power to dispose of the same in any way that she might desire, by gift or sale, during her life, or by will at her death, with remainder to his children in whatever property should remain undisposed of at the death of Mrs. Johnson. Mrs. Ann F. Johnson survived her husband, and died without having disposed of the land in question. On December 23, 1899, the remaindermen conveyed the lots to the Georgia Title Guarantors Company. This deed was recorded on December 28, 1899. The Georgia Title Guarantors Company conveyed the property to P. A. Henderson on June 13, 1901, and the deed was recorded on that date. Upon this state of facts the judge rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendant for the sum of $800 principal, and $242 interest, as damages for cutting the timber, further finding that plaintiffs were the true owners of the land. To this judgment the defendant excepted.

C. J. Haden and E. D. Graham, for plaintiff in error. M. B. Cannon and Hal. Lawson, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The facts in this case are undisputed, and counsel agree that the case is controlled by a single question of law.

The question upon which the case turns is whether, in a competition between a deed executed by the owner of land and a deed to the same land executed after his death by those claiming title under a general devise of the whole of his estate, the older deed is defeated, when it appears that it was not recorded until after the younger deed was executed and duly recorded, and that this latter deed was taken without notice of the existence of the other. This is purely a question of statutory construction, dependent for its solution upon the meaning to be given our statutes in reference to the recording of deeds; for it is perfectly clear that, without the assistance of a statute, one who purchases land from another who has no title can acquire no title to the land by such purchase. The remaindermen under the will of Herschel V. Johnson had no title to the lands in controversy to convey to the Georgia Guarantors Company, as such lands were no part of his estate at the time of his death; he having parted with the title to the same during his lifetime. As they had no title to convey, their grantee acquired none by the conveyance, and hence had none to convey to Hen-der son, the defendant in this case, unless the fact that the Georgia Guarantors Company purchased these land lots from the devisees in remainder of the estate of the deceased former owner, without actual or constructive notice of the existence of his deed to James W. Armstrong, and then had its deed recorded before the Armstrong deed was placed upon record, had the effect of defeating the Armstrong title. Prior to the act of October 1, 1889 (Acts 1889, p. 106), there had been no material change in the law upon the subject under consideration since the passage of the act of December 25, 1837 (Cobb's Dig. p. 175, § 46). That act provided that "in all cases where two or more deeds shall hereafter be executed by the same person or persons, conveying the same premises to different persons, the one recorded within twelve months from the time of execution (if the feoffee have no notice of a prior deed unrecorded at the time of the execution of the deed to him or her) shall have preference; and if all be recorded or not recorded within the time specified, the eldest deed shall have preference." The section upon the subject in the Code of 1863 read as follows: "Every deed conveying lands shall be recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court of the county where the land lies, within one year from the date of such deed. On failure to record within this time the record may be made at any time thereafter; but such deed loses its priority over a subsequent deed from the same vendor, recorded in time, and taken without notice of the existence of the first." Code 1863, § 2667. Exactly the same provisions appear in Code 1868, § 2663, Code 1873, § 2705, and Code 1882, § 2705. The act of 1889 provided "that deeds, mortgages, and liens of all kinds, which are now required by law to be recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court of each county within a specified time, shall, as against the interests of third parties acting in good faith and without notice, who may have acquired a transfer or lien binding the same property, take effect only from the time they are filed for record in the clerk's office. And the said clerk is required to keep a docket for such filing, showing the day and hour thereof, which docket shall be open for examination and inspection as other records of his office." This is now section 2778 of our present Civil Code. Code 1895. The old law relative to the registry of deeds, as modified by the act of 1889, appears in Civ. Code 1895, § 3618, in the following language: "Every deed conveying lands shall be recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court of the county where the land lies. The record may be made at any time, but such deed loses its priority over a subsequent recorded deed from the same vendor, taken without notice of the existence of the first." It will be observed that the change wrought in the old law upon this subject, as it stood in the several Codes prior to the present one, is simply as to the time when a deed may be recorded so as not to lose its priority over a subsequent deed from the same vendor duly recorded. The old law allowed one year in which to record a deed, during which time its priority over a subsequent recorded deed from the same vendor was preserved; whereas, under the law as it has stood since the act of 1889, no time is prescribed within which a deed may be recorded so as to preserve its priority, and the question of precedence between two deeds from the same vendor depends, when the deed last executed was taken without notice of the first, upon priority of record. Of course, construing sections 2778 and 3618 of the Civil Code of 1895 together, a deed is, when in competition with another, to be considered as recorded at the time when it is duly filed for record. Under the act of 1837 deeds made by the same person or persons were brought into competition with each other. Deeds made by different persons did not compete. But in construing this act it was held that "a purchaser at sheriff's sale, who has his deed first recorded, will gain the same preference over an unrecorded deed as if he had bought directly from the debtor himself" (Ellis v. Smith, 10 Ga. 253), and that "a purchaser at an administrator's sale, who had his deed first recorded, will have the same preference over an unrecorded deed as if he had bought of the intestate in his lifetime" (Tucker v. Harris, 13 Ga. 1, 58 Am. Dec. 488). The reasoning of the court in the first of these cases was this: "The effect of a sale by the law, in this respect, is just the same as if made by the individual, whose agent or trustee the officer becomes to make the transfer. All of the defendant's estate is sold. The purchaser takes his place." In the second case the first was cited, and it was held that "the rule and the reasoning in that case apply with full force to a purchaser at an administrator's sale." But in Webb v. Wilcher, 33 Ga. 565, it was held that the provisions quoted above from the act of 1837 were "inapplicable where an unrecorded deed [came] in competition with a junior deed to the same property, executed by the heir at law of the first feoffee, duly recorded." In the opinion, Jenkins, J., said: "The statute by its terms applies only to 'cases where two or more deeds shall be executed by the same person or persons, for the same premises. In the case at bar the older deed was executed by William Tomlinson, and the junior by Rhoda Gilbert, two different persons. From this difficulty the plaintiff in error insists that he is relieved by the fact that Rhoda Gilbert, at the time of her conveyance, held as heir at law of William Tomlinson; and he relies upon the rulings of this court in Ellis v. Lessee of Smith, 10 Ga. 253, and in Tucker v. Harris, 13 Ga. 1, 58 Am. Dec. 488." He then discussed the rulings made in those cases and the principle upon which they were based, and said: "What is that principle? That the actual salesman in each [case] acted in a representative or fiduciary capacity, and by his deed transmitted not his own title, but that of the party he represented. The sheriff transmitted the title of the defendant in execution, the administrator that of his intestate. Can the same thing be said of Rhoda Gilbert's conveyance? By no means. She thereby transmitted not the title of William Tomlinson, but her own title. It matters not that she derived title from Tomlinson, nor does it matter how she derived it, whether by deed or by inheritance. Before her conveyance to Smith the title had become vested in her. It was only her title that could then be transmitted, and this makes her case to differ from those cited and considered." While in that case the act of 1837 was under construction, it is evident that the reasoning of the court and the principle upon which it based its decision would apply equally as well in a case involving the construction of the statute as it stood after the adoption of the first Code, wherein the words, "from the same vendor," were used in describing the deeds, instead of the words, "executed by the same person or persons," which were employed to describe the deeds in the original act. But it has been thought that the act of 1889 had the effect of opening the door of competition between the deeds to the same land, to junior deeds which could, before the passage of that act, have competed with senior unrecorded deeds. See Ousley v. Bailey, 111 Ga. 783, 788, 36 S. E. 750; Equitable Loan Co. v. Lewman, 124 Ga. 190, 202, 52 S. E. 599, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 879.

In neither of the cases just referred to was it necessary, however, to so construe the act in order to make the decision rendered therein. In the case first cited the ruling was that "a purchaser of land at judicial sale, acting in good faith and without notice, acquires title as against a prior conveyance by the owner, unrecorded at the time of the making and confirmation of such sale." This ruling was merely in accordance with the rulings made in Ellis v. Smith, and Tucker v. Harris, supra, which would have controlled the question presented, whether the act of 1889 had ever been passed or not; "for," as was held by this court in the Ellis case in reference to the priority of competing deeds to the same property, "the effect of a sale by the law in this respect is just the same as if made by the individual. * * * All the defendant's estate is sold. The purchaser takes his place. The mischief of an unrecorded deed is the same to him as to a private purchaser. He examines the title, and, from anything that appears, the defendant is the undisputed proprietor, while, in fact, there is an outstanding deed from him, which would sweep off the property." While the court in that case said that the officer making a sale under execution becomes "the agent or trustee" of the defendant in execution, "to make the transfer," it is evident that he only becomes such by appointment of the law, and, in this respect, a master commissioner or receiver, acting under orders of the court, is as such "the agent or trustee" of the person whose property he is ordered by the court to sell as is a sheriff, who sells property under execution, the "agent or trustee" of the defendant in execution.

As pointed out by Judge Jenkins in Webb v. Wilcher, supra, in discussing the rulings in the cases cited above from 10 Ga. 253, and 13 Ga. 1, 58 Am. Dec. 428, the actual salesman in each case by his deed transmitted, not his own title, but that of the party whose property he sold. "The sheriff transmitted the title of the defendant in execution, the administrator that of his intestate." And he drew the distinction between those cases and the one with which he was dealing by showing that the heir at law in that case, by her deed, transmitted not the title of her ancestor, but her own title. By a judicial sale the title transmitted is that of the person whose property has been seized and sold by the court. Consequently such a sale, when the question of priority of deeds to land thus sold is concerned, stands upon the same footing that a deed from a sheriff, or a deed from an administrator, stands when such question is involved. The vendor in each case is, within the meaning of Civ. Code 1895, § 3618, the person whose title was sold and conveyed. The purpose and the effect of recording a deed is to carry notice, to all whom it may concern, that the title to the land therein conveyed has passed from one designated person to another designated person, and the person from whom the title passes, by a deed of bargain and sale, is the "vendor" within the meaning of that word as used in section 3618. If the act of 1889 had never been passed, it would have been clearly subversive of the purpose and meaning of that section of the Civil Code to have held that because the court, in a particular sense, is said to be "the vendor" in a deed executed in pursuance of a judicial sale, as distinguished from a sale under execution, therefore such a deed and a deed to the same land made by the person as whose property the court seized and sold it are not, in contemplation of the statute, "from the same vendor." Under such a holding there never could be competition between such deeds, and a bona fide purchaser taking the younger deed, without notice, actual or constructive, of the older one, and having his deed first recorded, could obtain no title against the senior, unrecorded deed. And it would not make any difference whether the younger deed was the one made in pursuance of the judicial sale or not.

What the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court in Ousley v. Bailey, supra, said in reference to the effect of the act of 1889 upon the previously existing law, was unnecessary to reach the decision there rendered. The same may be said with reference to the statement by another learned judge now upon the bench in Equitable Loan & Security Company v. Lewman, supra, with reference to the effect of the act of 1889 upon competition between a recorded deed from an heir or devisee and an unrecorded deed from the ancestor. His remarks were based upon the ruling in Holder v. American Investment Company, 94 Ga. 640, 21 S. E. 897, which was made after the passage of the act of 1889, and is in apparent conflict with the decision in Webb v. Wilcher, supra. The ruling in the Holder Case is contained in the fourth headnote, wherein it was held that the statute giving priority to a junior recorded deed over a senior unrecorded deed "applies where the senior deed was made by the testatrix and the junior by her devisee." No opinion was filed in that case; the rulings being embraced in headnotes only. No reference is made in any of the headnotes to the act of 1889; and whether the existence of that act influenced the decision of the court is a matter for conjecture only. The inference that it did must have arisen from the apparent conflict between that case and the earlier one above cited. But, after a careful consideration of the matter, we have been unable to see how that act changed the law with reference to the priority of deeds of bargain and sale to the same land under the recording acts. In Donovan v. Simmons, 96 Ga. 340, 346, 22 S. E. 966, in which case it was held that the registry act of 1889 did not create any new competition between deeds of bargain and sale and the lien of judgments, Judge Hart, who delivered the opinion of the court, speaking of this act in connection with such deeds, said: "The law as to deeds of this character is unchanged by it. The danger of a failure to record a deed is the exposure of it to defeat by a subsequent vendee without notice of the prior purchase. The only change made in the law by the act of 1889, so far as deeds are concerned, is to fix their time of going into effect and becoming operative relatively to the interests of certain persons." In Toole v. Toole, 107 Ga. 472, 33 S. E. 686, where it was held that a junior voluntary deed, though duly recorded and taken without notice of a prior voluntary deed executed by the same grantor and not recorded, does not obtain priority over such senior deed. Chief Justice Simmons, in speaking of the contention of counsel for plaintiff in error that sections 2778, 3530, and 3618 of the Civil Code of 1895 "are broad enough to protect grantees under voluntary deeds, because two of them declare in substance that all deeds must be recorded," said: "It will be observed, however, that in the latter part of section 3618, where it provides a penalty for failure to record the first deed, it is declared that 'such deed loses its priority over a subsequent recorded deed from the same vendor.' The word 'vendor' was evidently used with reference to a deed of bargain and sale, based upon a valuable consideration. If it had been intended to include voluntary deeds, the word 'grantor,' and not 'vendor,' would have been used." It will be observed that the word "vendor," as used in Civ. Code 1895, § 3618, was here construed in its literal sense; that is, as meaning the party by whom a sale is made (Anderson's Law Dict.), or the person who transfers property by sale (Black's Law Dict.). And it was, in effect, held that, although two deeds to the same land may be from the same grantor, they cannot compete, under the statute, unless they are also from the same vendor. This is inconsistent with the idea that the effect of the act of 1889 was to broaden the meaning of the terms used in the existing statute to describe what deeds could compete thereunder for priority. As we have said, the ruling in Holder v. American Investment Co., supra, appears to be in conflict with the decision in the earlier case of Webb v. Wilcher; and, if so, the older case would prevail. The present case, however, differs from the Holder Case in this material respect: There the owner of a half interest, in certain land conveyed a small portion of it, and afterwards devised the entire half interest, describing it. It was held that the devise imported on its face to carry title to all of such interest in the land described, and therefore conflicted with the former deed. In the case at bar Herschel V. Johnson conveyed the land in controversy to Armstrong in 1847. In 1880 he made a will by which he devised and bequeathed to his wife "all [his] property, both real and personal, of every description," during her life, with remainder in "whatever remains of said property undisposed of by her as herein provided for" to his children. This does not purport on its face to devise any specific property, or to describe that now involved in controversy. The testator only sought by his will to pass all of his property, and this property was not his. There is nothing to indicate that he either actually had any interest in it when he made the will, or that he claimed to have any. It was wild land, in the possession of no one. So that, without more, a mere comparison of his previous deed with his will would lead to the conclusion that he did not devise this property at all. If not, then, of course, the deed from his devisees would not take precedence over his antecedent deed.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

SUPREME LODGE KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS v. CRENSHAW.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 4, 1907.)

1. INSURANCE—CAUSE OF DEATH—DEATH “AT HANDS OF JUSTICE.”

Even though the killing by the husband of the paramour of the wife be under such circumstances that the law would class the act as justifiable homicide, such killing is not at the hands of justice, either punitive or preventive. Death by the punitive hand of justice is when the law commands the killing. Death by the hands of preventive justice is where the law permits the killing. In each instance the killing must be by some person authorized to carry out the commands of the law, or who is permitted by the law to do the act in the advancement of public justice.

2. SAME.

A policy of life insurance contained the stipulation that “if death is caused or superinduced at the hands of justice, or in violation of or attempt to violate any criminal law,” the insurer would not be liable for the full amount of the policy, but only for an amount to be computed according to a mode prescribed in the policy. The insured was slain by a husband, either while he was attempting to have sexual intercourse with the wife, or immediately after the act of sexual intercourse was complete. Held, that the death of the insured was not caused or superinduced in the violation of, or attempt to violate, any criminal law, within the meaning of the policy as properly interpreted.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Insurance, § 1937.]

3. SAME—ACTION ON CERTIFICATE—PLEADING.

In the petition in a suit on a certificate issued by a benefit society, containing a contract of life insurance, the plaintiff alleged, in one paragraph, that the insured was a member in good standing and the certificate was in full force at the time of the death of the insured, and, in another paragraph, that the plaintiff had furnished defendant with proof of the death and performed all the conditions of the contract, and, in still another paragraph, that all assessments and dues were duly paid. In the answer the defendant denied that the insured was a member in good standing at the date of his death, and that the certificate was in full force, and also denied, in a general way, the allegations in the other paragraphs. Held, that the denial of the defendant was in due form, and the effect of the same was to place upon the plaintiff the burden of proving the allegations as made, notwithstanding they were general in their nature.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by Kate Crenshaw against the Supreme Lodge Knights of Pythias on a benefit certificate. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

Kate Crenshaw brought suit against the Supreme Lodge of the Knights of Pythias, alleging that the defendant was incorporated under an act of Congress, with an office and place of doing business in the county in this state in which the suit was brought; that it issued a benefit certificate and policy of insurance, insuring the life of Perry J. Williams in the sum of $2,000; that the plaintiff is the mother of the insured and the beneficiary under the certificate; that the insured was a member in good standing on February 1, 1906, on which date he departed this life; that during the month of February, and subsequently to his death, the plaintiff furnished proofs of death, and conformed to all the conditions of the certificate as required, and all assessments and dues were duly paid, and the defendant has not paid the policy, nor any part thereof. Judgment was prayed for the $2,000, with interest. Attached to the petition as an exhibit is a copy of the certificate, which recites that it is issued upon the statements and agreements contained in the application for the same. The defendant filed a demurrer, which was overruled, and the defendant excepted. It also filed an answer, in which it admitted the allegations as to its corporate existence and place of business in the county alleged, and that it had issued the certificate as alleged. It denied that the insured was a member in good standing; that the policy was in force on the date that the insured died; that all assessments had been paid; and that proofs of death had been furnished. It admitted that the policy had not been paid, and denied all liability thereunder. It also filed three special pleas in bar. The first alleged that in the application for the certificate was the following provision: “It is agreed that if death is caused or superinduced at the hands of justice, or in violation of, or attempt to violate, any criminal law, then there shall be paid” a lower sum than the face of the policy, to be calculated according to the method prescribed in the application. It then alleged that the death of the insured was caused or superinduced by the hands of justice, for that he was shot to death by R. C. Lindsay while he was engaged in the attempt to commit the offense of adultery and fornication with the wife of the said Lindsay, who discovered them under circumstances showing that the act was about to begin, and the said Lindsay acted promptly and in the burst of passion and indignation which overwhelmed him on discovering the outrage which had been done him, and that the killing was justifiable. The plea then set forth the amount that is admitted to be due under the terms of the policy, which amount the defendant tendered to the plaintiff. The second special plea, after setting forth the stipulation in the application above referred to, and also making tender of the amount admitted to be due thereunder, alleged that the death of the insured was caused or superinduced in the violation of a criminal law, in that the insured was shot to death by Lindsay immediately after he had committed the offense of adultery and fornication with Lindsay’s wife, Lindsay slaying him immediately after the guilty act was over, and in the killing he acted promptly and in that burst of passion and indignation that overwhelmed him on discovering the outrage that was done him, and, if the killing was not justifiable, it would reduce the crime from murder to manslaughter. The third special plea, after alleging the stipulation in the application above referred to, and making tender of the amount admitted to be due thereunder, alleged that the death of the insured was caused or superinduced in the violation of, or attempt to violate, the criminal laws of this state, in that he was shot to death by Lindsay while engaged in an attempt to commit the offense of adultery and fornication with the wife of Lindsay, or immediately after he had committed the offense. The plaintiff filed demurrers to the answer and special pleas, which were sustained, and the plea stricken. The defendant excepted.

T. H. Parker, for plaintiff in error. Shipp & Kline and Robt. L. Shipp, for defendant in error.

COBB, P. J. (after stating the facts as above).

1. The first special plea set up the defense that the insured came to his death by the hands of justice. The agreement in the policy was that, if the death was "caused or superinduced at the hands of justice," the full amount of the policy could not be recovered. The Code declares: "Death by suicide, or by the hands of justice, either punitive or preventive, releases the insurer from the obligation of his contract." Civ. Code 1895, § 2118. It is contended, not that the death of the insured was the result of the administration of punitive justice, but that it was the result of the administration of preventive justice, that the law allows the husband to kill his wife's paramour under certain circumstances, and the killing, under these circumstances, is in the administration of preventive justice within the meaning of the Code. We do not think that the word "preventive" in the Code is to be given this interpretation. The word "punitive" certainly refers to death inflicted by an officer of the law in obedience to the commands of the law. The word "preventive" must be construed to refer to a killing by an authorized officer of the law, or a private person standing for the time being in the attitude of a public officer; as a member of the sheriff's posse, or the like, under those circumstances where the law authorizes the taking of human life in the advancement of public justice. It cannot be properly interpreted to ever include a killing by a private person to avenge or prevent a private wrong, even though the circumstances be such that the homicide is justifiable. This section is to be construed in connection with Pen. Code 1895, § 70, which enumerates the different cases of justifiable homicide, among them being the killing of a human being by commandment of the law in execution of public justice, and by permission of the law in the advancement of public justice. The word "preventive" was used to convey the same idea as is conveyed in the section of the Penal Code by the word "permission." It refers to a killing done in the advancement of public justice, and therefore must be a killing by an officer, or some one having the rights of an officer who is authorized to take human life in the advancement of public justice, and not by a private individual merely to prevent a private wrong, although the act constituting it may be also a public offense.

2. The second special plea sets forth, as a reason why the defendant is not liable for the full amount of the policy, that the killing "was caused or superinduced in the violation of a criminal law," in that the insured had committed the offense of adultery and fornication with the wife of Lindsay, and that Lindsay had slain him immediately after the act was over. The third special plea set up that the killing "was caused or superinduced in the violation of, or an attempt to violate, the criminal laws of the state," in that the insured was engaged in an attempt to commit the offense of adultery and fornication with the wife of Lindsay, and was killed immediately after the offense had been committed. Certificates issued by benefit societies usually contain a stipulation that the society shall not be liable in case of death of a member while engaged in, or in consequence of, an unlawful act. A contract having such a stipulation is not voided by the mere fact that at the time of the death of the member he was violating the law, if the death occurred from some cause other than such violation. The rule seems to be that, in order to relieve the society, the violation of the law must be such as to proximately lead to the death of the insured by bringing him into danger of losing his life; that is, the act of the insured must be of such a character as to increase the risk of the insurer, and be entered into under such circumstances that the insured must have known that the act he was committing was of such character as to bring him into danger of losing his life. In Bloom v. Franklin Life Ins. Co., 97 Ind. 478, it was said: "A known violation of a positive law, whether the law is a civil or a criminal one, avoids the policy if the natural and reasonable consequences of the violation are to increase the risk. A violation of law, whether the law is a civil or a criminal one, does not avoid the policy if the natural and reasonable consequence of the act does not increase the risk." In that case the insured was killed while committing an assault and battery upon a member of the family of the slayer; he being a brother-in-law of the assaulted woman. The act of the insured was held in that case to be the proximate cause of his death, within the meaning of the law, upon the theory that the man who makes a violent assault upon a woman knows that he puts his own person and life in danger; for any male relative, and even a stranger, may interfere to preserve the life of the assaulted. It was said in that case: "The natural result of such an illegal act as that of the assured therefore was to bring his person into danger, and as death resulted his own act was the proximate cause." We do not entirely agree with the conclusion reached in that case. In Griffin v. Western Mutual Ass'n, 20 Neb. 620, 31 N. W. 122, 57 Am. Rep. 848, the insured, with an accomplice, went to the state treasury at the capitol, and presented pistols and demanded money of the treasurer. He delivered it to them, and they started away with it, and had nearly reached the door of the capitol when they were fired upon by a policeman, and the insured was killed. It was held that the policy was not avoided under a stipulation providing that it should be void if the insured should "die while violating any law." The death of the insured in that case would not have occurred except for the crime committed by him, but his death was not the reasonable and natural consequence of the crime committed. In Goetzman v. Conn. Mut. Life Ins. Co., 3 Hun (N. Y.) 515, the policy provided that there should be no liability if the insured should die "in consequence of his violation of any law." It appeared that the insured was killed by a husband immediately after he had criminal intercourse with the slayer's wife; and it was held that the killing could not be treated as the natural and legitimate effect of the act of adultery. Gilbert, J., in the opinion, says: "If the assured had been killed a week or a year after the injury, for the same cause, it would have been quite as direct a result thereof as when it was done. In short, the proposition that a man, who has been thus wantonly killed by another, without necessity or lawful excuse, died in consequence of his own act, is logically contradictory, unless it be admitted that the killing of an adulterer follows his offense in the ordinary sequence of events. That admission we are not prepared to make." See, also, in this connection, Niblack on Acc. Ins. & Ben. Soc. (2d Ed.) § 157; Insurance Co. v. Bennett, 90 Tenn. 256, 16 S. W. 723, 25 Am. St. Rep. 685; Insurance Co. v. Seaver, 86 U. S. 531, 22 L. Ed. 155; Supreme Lodge Knights of Pythias v. Bradley, 83 S. W. 1055, 73 Ark. 274, 67 L. R. A. 770, 108 Am. St. Rep. 38; Prudential Life Ins. Co. v. Higbee, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 495, 57 S. W. 614; Davis v. Modern Woodman of America, 98 Mo. App. 713, 73 S. W. 923; Cluff v. Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co., 13 Allen (Mass.) 308; Brown v. Supreme Lodge Knights of Pythias, 83 Mo. App. 633. It is deducible, from the authorities, that a stipulation of the character now under consideration must be given a reasonable construction, and that the liability of the company is not to be discharged, unless the violation of the law consisted in an act of which the death of the insured was the reasonable and legitimate consequence. If the insured does an act which is a violation of the law, and which he knows puts his life in peril at the time that he commits it, the company is not liable under a policy containing a stipulation of the character now before us. But there must be something in the act itself, independent of other circumstances, which makes the death the reasonable consequence. Death may follow the commission of any violation of law, when the offense is a felony; for the arresting officer is authorized to kill under certain circumstances in order to effectuate an arrest, as in the case where the insured robbed the State Treasurer he knew that under the law of the land an arresting officer, or, in some circumstances, even a private person, would have the right to slay him in order to take him; but his death resulting from the effort to arrest him was not the reasonable and legitimate consequence of the robbery that he had committed a few minutes before. One who commits the offense of adultery with a married woman well knows that his life is imperiled if the outraged husband take the guilty pair in the unlawful act, or at its beginning, or at its conclusion; but it cannot be said as a matter of law that the killing of the adulterer is the natural and legitimate consequence of the illicit intercourse between him and the wife of the wronged husband. Death may result, but it can be no more said that death of the adulterer at the hands of the husband is the reasonable and legitimate consequence of the act of adultery than it can be said that the death of a felon at the hands of an arresting officer is the reasonable and legitimate consequence of the felony committed. Death does not follow in the ordinary sequence of events any more in the one case than in the other. In Gresham v. Equitable Accident Ins. Co., 87 Ga. 497, 13 S. E. 752, 13 L. R. A. 838, 27 Am. St. Rep. 268, the policy excepted from the risk, death, or injury which may have been caused by fighting. The ruling in that case was simply that such a stipulation refers to voluntary fighting by the insured, or involuntary fighting brought on wholly or partially by his fault or temerity, or fighting for which he is partially responsible, either as a volunteer or a rash speaker or as a wrongdoer. Fighting is an act which, in its nature and essence, is calculated to bring on injury or death. Fighting under any circumstances may be attended with disastrous consequences. Death resulting from a fight is the natural and legitimate consequence which is to be expected. There is nothing in the crime of adultery, although a violation of the law of the land and a great moral wrong, which in its essence is calculated to produce the death of the adulterer. Under some circumstances it may be the occasion of the death of the adulterer, but his death is not the natural and legitimate consequence of the adultery itself. There was no error in striking the special pleas.

3. The certificate declared that it was issued upon evidence received that the insured was "a member in good standing" of the order. In one of the paragraphs of the petition it was alleged that the insured "was a member in good standing," and that the policy and certificate were in full force and effect "on the date that the insured died." The answer to this paragraph denied that the insured "was a member in good standing" and that the policy was in full force on the date alleged. There was a demurrer to this paragraph, upon the ground that it did not distinctly answer the averments in the petition, but is simply a general denial, and did not put the defendant on notice of why the policy was not in force. Since the pleading act of 1893 it is not permissible for a defendant to file what was, in the common-law practice, a plea of the general issue. He cannot come in and file a plea merely that he is not indebted, and thus put the plaintiff upon proof of all the material averments in the petition. He is allowed, however, to deny every fact alleged in the petition, and he may interpose his denial by applying the same to each paragraph or each allegation; or he may, in one paragraph of his answer, deny all of the averments in every paragraph of the petition. Civ. Code 1895, § 5051. Whatever the plaintiff alleges he has a right to deny, and, if denied, the law places the burden upon the plaintiff of proving the allegation, provided it is material in itself, or the plaintiff has made it material in the manner in which he alleges it. The plaintiff saw proper to allege that the insured was a member of the order in good standing at the time of his death. The fact that he was a member in good standing may be made up of a number of facts, but the plaintiff has seen proper simply to make a general allegation. This was, in effect, the plaintiff saying to the defendant: "Deny this allegation, and proof will be introduced to support the same." If the plaintiff had seen proper to allege those things which constituted good standing, the defendant would have been required either to admit or deny each one of the facts going to make up this status. But, having rested simply upon the general allegation that the insured was in good standing, the defendant had a right to interpose a denial to the allegation as made, and thus impose the burden upon the plaintiff to sustain, by proof, the allegation. This is, in no sense, an evasive answer. It is a direct answer. If the defendant had answered that it could neither admit nor deny, the answer would have been evasive; for the facts which constituted good membership are peculiarly within the knowledge of the officers of the order, and the defendant would not be permitted to put the burden of proof upon the plaintiff by a merely evasive answer. But the answer denies the allegation as made, and the allegation as made must be proved to the extent that may be necessary to show a prima facie case of liability under the policy. The defendant cannot, under this denial, set up any affirmative defense growing out of a breach of the conditions of the policy or otherwise. What is said in reference to this portion of the answer will also apply to those portions which deny that proof of death had been submitted and that all dues had been paid, etc. The court erred in striking those portions of the answer referred to in this division of the opinion.

Judgment affirmed in part and reversed in part. All the Justices concur.

DARNELL v. COLUMBUS SHOW CASE CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 10, 1907.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT—LIABILITY OF LANDLORD—LEASE—CONSTRUCTION.

A lease of a tenement carries with it an implied grant of the right to light and air from the adjoining land of the landlord, where the situation and habitual use of the demised tenement is such that the right to light and air is essential to the beneficial enjoyment of the leased tenement.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Easements, § 58.]

2. SAME—LIABILITY OF LESSEE.

One who subsequently rents the adjoining land is invested with no greater privileges than his landlord, and is liable to his neighbor tenant in damages resulting from interference with the latter's implied easement.

3. SAME—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

Ordinarily the damage recoverable is the depreciated rental value of the tenement; but, if the instrumentality which obstructs the light and air be so constructed as to project the rain-water through the window of the tenement, to the injury of the tenant's bedroom furnishings and to his personal discomfort, and this is done with the view of causing the tenant to abandon his lease, punitive damages may be allowed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Easements, § 145.]

4. SAME.

Some of the special demurrers were well taken, and others should have been overruled.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County: W. A. Little, Judge.

Action by S. W. Darnell against the Columbus Show Case Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

G. Y. Tigner, for plaintiff in error. Charlton E. Battle, for defendant in error.

EVANS, J. The case made by the petition was substantially this: The owner of two adjoining lots leased them separately to the plaintiff and the defendant; the lease to the plaintiff being prior to that of the defendant. Upon the lot demised to the plaintiff was a three-room tenement, which was used as a dwelling house. The only means of lighting and ventilating two rooms thereof was by a single window in each room, which overlooked the premises demised to the defendant. The defendant, being a manufacturing corporation dealing in lumber, piled a quantity of lumber on the lot rented by it in such a manner as to obstruct the light and air necessary for the use and enjoyment of the tenement by the other tenant, and to cause rain-water to drip into the house, rendering the house damp, unwholesome, unhealthy, and uncomfortable. Other matters were also alleged, which will be noticed in a discussion of the special demurrers filed. The defendant demurred both generally and specially to the petition. The demurrers were sustained, and the petition dismissed.

The complaining tenant was a tenant by the year, and does not claim an express grant to an easement of light and air. Whatever right he may have to prevent his neighbor tenant from obstructing his window must be founded upon an implied grant of an easement in the use and enjoyment of light and ventilation over the adjoining land of his landlord at the time of his lease. There is much conflict in the American cases on the question of implied grant of these easements. In many jurisdictions it is held that a lease of land upon which is a building depending for its light and air on windows therein, which overlook adjoining land of the landlord, does not include any right of light and air through such windows, unless expressly granted in the lease. Myers v. Gemmell, 10 Barb. 537; Kelper v. Klein, 51 Ind. 316; Keating v. Springer, 146 Ill. 481, 84 N. E. 805, 22 L. R. A. 544, 37 Am. St. Rep. 175. Other courts lay down the doctrine that there is an implied grant in a lease of the right to light and air from the adjoining land of the landlord, where the situation and habitual use of the demised premises is such that the right to light and air is necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of the leased premises. Case v. Minot, 158 Mass. 577, 33 N. E. 700, 22 L. R. A. 536. See note to this case in 22 L. R. A. 536, where many of the cases are collated. The question of an implied grant of easement of light and air was before this court in Turner v. Thompson, 58 Ga. 288, 36 Am. Rep. 297. In that case it was held that "where an executrix sold half a lot of land, with a tenement thereon having windows opening upon the other half lot, and bought the other half herself at the same sale, she will be estopped from obstructing the passage of light and air through such windows, if those windows were necessary to the admission of sufficient light and air for the reasonable enjoyment of the tenement which she sold; aliter, if sufficient light and air can be derived from other windows opened, or which could conveniently be opened, elsewhere in the tenement to make the rooms reasonably useful and enjoyable." The principle deduced from this decision has been incorporated in Civ. Code 1895, § 3046, as follows: "A right to the easement of light and air over another's land through ancient lights or windows is not acquired by prescription; but where one sells a house, the light necessary for the reasonable enjoyment whereof is derived from and across adjoining land then belonging to the same owner, the easement of light and air over such vacant lot passes as an incident to the house sold, because necessary to the enjoyment thereof." The principle here stated is equally applicable to a case where the owner of two adjoining lots leases one upon which there is a dwelling house dependant upon a window overlooking the adjoining lot for light and air. Indeed, the reason for the rule is more cogent in a case of tenancy than of purchase. Where one purchases a tenement depending for light and air upon a window overlooking the adjoining land belonging to his grantor, in order to prevent closing the window, he must show that he cannot get light and air elsewhere over his own land; that it is a real necessity that he get it at this easement; that he cannot get other lights to his own building over his own property at a reasonable cost. Thompson v. Turner, 69 Ga. 223. A tenant, without his landlord's consent, cannot change and alter the demised tenement in any material respect. Certainly he is under no duty to alter the demised tenement to meet any exigency produced by the act of his landlord to escape its consequences. The tenant is entitled to the use of the tenement with such necessary privileges accruing from its situation to adjoining land of his landlord at the time of the demise, and the landlord cannot deprive him of the enjoyment thereof by changing the situation in such a material way as practically to make the tenement unfit for use.

We have thus far discussed the matter as if the complaint of the tenant were against his landlord, instead of against a tenant who subsequently rented from his landlord. It is not charged in the petition that the common landlord consented, expressly or impliedly, to the commission of the acts complained of, nor connived thereat. From the doctrine that a landlord is not responsible for the acts of strangers, it would follow that a tortious act done by one tenant to another tenant of a common landlord, without the authority, consent, or connivance of the landlord, is not the latter's tort, but the tort of him who does the act. Perry v. Wall, 68 Ga. 70. However, if the common landlord cannot use his adjoining land in such a manner as to shut out necessary light and air from a dwelling house which he has rented, one who thereafter rents the adjoining land has no greater right or privilege in respect thereto than his landlord possessed. It follows, therefore, that the defendant cannot justify its act under the lease.

The petition should not have been dismissed on general demurrer for another reason. It was alleged that the lumber was piled in such a way as to cause the rainwater to be thrown through the window of the plaintiff's bedroom, "thereby wetting petitioner's bedroom floor and his bedding and bedroom furnishings, and rendering petitioner's said house and bedroom especially damp, close, stuffy, unwholesome, and unhealthy, and exceedingly uncomfortable, to his great annoyance, and to the disturbance and violation of his right to the full, free, comfortable, and reasonable enjoyment of his said dwelling house and home." Here is charged a distinct physical invasion and interference with the plaintiff's possession, which is a positive tort. Although a tenant has no estate in the land, he is the owner of its use for the term of his rent contract, and can recover damages for any injury to such use resulting from a physical invasion of his possession. See Bentley v. Atlanta, 92 Ga. 623, 18 S. E. 1013.

There were several special demurrers to the petition. One was directed to the allegations respecting the plaintiff's condition in life, and the nature of his vocation. Simply that the plaintiff is a poor man, and his employment is that of a night watchman, which requires him to sleep in the day, would not make the defendant liable in damages for the interference of his slumbers caused by the noises incident to the operation of a lumber yard. Hence the sixteenth and twentieth paragraphs were subject to the special demurrers aimed at them. The allegations that the plaintiff had previously occupied the same house as a tenant for many years in the past, and was attached to the same, was entirely irrelevant, and properly stricken on demurrer.

The allegation in the seventeenth paragraph, that the plaintiff had renewed his lease for another term, does not aid his case. When he renewed the lease, he took the premises as he found them, and cannot complain of conditions existing at the time of the renewal of his lease contract.

The twenty-second paragraph of the petition declared that the various acts and deeds set forth and complained of, both in themselves and in the intent with which they were done, constitute aggravating circumstances entitling petitioner to additional damages for which he sues. The mere wrongful obstruction of the plaintiff's light, without more, would not make the defendant liable in punitive damages. But if, as charged in the petition, the lumber was piled so as not only to exclude light and air from the plaintiff's dwelling, but also to throw the rainwater into his bedroom, and this was done by the defendant for the purpose of harassing the plaintiff with a view of causing him to abandon his lease, that the defendant might get possession of the property, it would be in the province of the jury to allow punitive damages.

The other special demurrers to which no special reference has been made should have been overruled.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

ANDREWS CO. et al. v. NATIONAL BANK OF COLUMBUS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 10, 1907.)

1. CORPORATIONS — INDEBTEDNESS — NOTE OF PRESIDENT.

Where A. obtains money from a bank and gives therefor a note under seal, signed by A. individually, and pledges, as collateral security for the payment of said note, stock in a corporation, which stock is the property of A., the debt represented by the note is the individual debt of A., and cannot be enforced against the corporation, of which A. is the president; and this rule is not affected by general recitals in the petition that the money so obtained was for the use and benefit of the corporation, and was so understood at the time, and that the same was placed to the credit of the corporation on the books of the bank.

2. SAME — RIGHTS OF PLEDGEE OF STOCK.

A pledgee of stock has the right to maintain an action, and to invoke the application of appropriate equitable remedies for the preservation of the assets of the company, and the prevention of their passing out of the hands of the corporation under terms of a sale which was the result of a "combination and confederation" to destroy the value of the stock of the corporation, and a fraud on the rights of the pledgee.

3. EQUITY — BILL — MULTIFARIOUSNESS — MISJOINDER OF PARTIES.

The petition was not open to attack by demurrer upon the grounds that it was multifarious, and that there was a misjoinder of parties.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; H. H. Swift, Judge pro. hac.

Action by the National Bank of Columbus against the Andrews Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

The National Bank of Columbus filed an equitable petition against the defendants Andrews Company, a corporation, Ernest Andrews, Lane, Bagley, and others, as individuals, seeking to obtain judgment against them on certain promissory notes, and against these and other defendants, Schuessler and Roberts, to have an alleged fraudulent sale of the assets of the Andrews Company to the last two named defendants set aside, and to have a receiver appointed to take charge of the assets of said company; and praying, also, that Ernest Andrews, Schuessler, and Roberts be required to account for all sales of goods belonging to said Andrews Company made by them since the date of the alleged fraudulent transfer to said Schuessler and Roberts. The material allegations of the petition are as follows: That about the 27th day of August, 1900, Ernest Andrews, president of the Andrews Company, obtained from petitioner the sum of $2,500, as a loan. He "asked the officers of petitioner to take his individual note for this sum, * * * but petitioner states that, although said note was taken from said Ernest Andrews individually, the same represented a debt of the Andrews Company." In September, 1900, said Andrews obtained from petitioner an additional loan of $2,500, "and petitioner avers that, although the said Ernest Andrews gave his individual note for the said last-mentioned sum, the same was also a debt of the said Andrews Company." In both of these instances the notes given to plaintiff were under seal, and signed by Ernest Andrews individually; and in each case he

"deposited with petitioner $10,000 of the capital stock of said Andrews Company, which had been issued to him, as collateral security" for said loans. Again, in August, 1902, Ernest Andrews applied to petitioner for an additional loan of $5,000; but "petitioner already held the notes of the said Ernest Andrews for $5,000, as above stated, and was unwilling to take his note for any additional amounts, and he [Andrews] then stated to petitioner that the money was for the Andrews Company, but that he did not want to increase its indebtedness, and that he would therefore procure the notes of certain employes of the corporation," to wit, Lane, Bagley, and three others, "for the sum of $1,000 each, which notes would be indorsed by him, and that he would deposit, as security therefor, stock in the Andrews Company to the amount of $5,000, which had been issued to said parties." In pursuance of this agreement, petitioner advanced $5,000, and took the notes of said employes, Lane, Bagley, and others, each of said parties giving 44 notes for the sum of $25, and one note for the sum of $24. All of said notes were under seal, and signed by said parties individually, and indorsed by Ernest Andrews, and $5,000 of stock in the Andrews Company, which had been issued to said parties, $1,000 each, was deposited as collateral security for said notes. In May, 1903, said Andrews represented to petitioner that the assets of the Andrews Company amounted to $57,000, and that the liabilities were about $24,000, but that $10,000 of this indebtedness was due to W. T. Roberts, one of the directors of the Andrews Company, and that Roberts was willing to take $10,000 of preferred stock in said company in settlement of said debt; "the said Andrews stating at the time that the company would increase its capital stock to $40,000, including said preferred stock, and that the only effect of said preferred stock would be to entitle the holder thereof to an 8 per cent. dividend before any dividends or profits were paid to the other stockholders." And petitioner thereupon surrendered the certificates of stock held by it as collateral, and other certificates were delivered to it in lieu of those surrendered, the new certificates being marked "Common," and the stock of said company was increased to $40,000. Subsequently Andrews paid petitioner $500 on the notes signed by him, and petitioner surrendered $2,000 of the stock held by it as collateral, leaving $23,000 of the stock in the Andrews Company in the hands of the petitioner as security for the balance due on said notes. In the summer of 1903 Ernest Andrews entered into negotiations with certain creditors who held claims against the Andrews Company for merchandise, and sought and obtained a settlement of about $10,000 of the indebtedness of the company for about $5,000 or $6,000, which amount was paid out of the money of the Andrews

Company. Petitioner alleges that the total indebtedness of the firm for merchandise was about $16,000, and that, after the settlement above referred to, only $6,000 remained unpaid. "Yet the said Ernest Andrews, for the purpose of holding said indebtedness against the assets of said corporation, and of defrauding petitioner, * * * procured the creditors holding said claims to transfer and assign the same to B. A. Schuessler, a sister of said Andrews, intending thereby that the said Schuessler should hold said claims for the full amount of the face thereof against said Andrews Company." In November, 1903, all of said defendants "combined and confederated for the purpose of defeating petitioner in the collection of its debts, by depreciating and utterly destroying the value of the securities held by it, and, in pursuance of said confederation, the said Ernest Andrews and the Andrews Company made a pretended sale of all the stock of goods and other assets of the Andrews Company to the said Schuessler and Roberts. * * * No money was paid by said parties in said purchase, * * * but it was agreed between them that the purchase price thereof should be the $10,000 of settled accounts which were held by the said Schuessler, and the $10,000 of preferred stock in said company held by said Roberts, and the assumption of the $6,000 of unsettled indebtedness against said Andrews Company. * * * Petitioner avers that the $10,000 of preferred stock held by said Roberts did not entitle him to any priority in the distribution of the capital or assets of said corporation, but only to a dividend of 8 per cent. upon stock before any dividends or profits were paid to the other stockholders," that the value of the assets of the company was about $44,000, "and that there was really no consideration for said sale, except the assumption of the $6,000 of the indebtedness of said corporation." And "petitioner further shows that by said pretended sale the said Ernest Andrews and the other stockholders of said company, well knowing that your petitioner held said $23,000 of stock in said company as collateral security, and that the same would be thereby rendered worthless, and intending thereby to destroy the security held by petitioner and to defeat petitioner in the collection of its just debt, prevented the said Andrews Company from continuing its said business, although the same has been since conducted by the said Ernest Andrews in the same manner as before, as hereinbefore stated," viz., in the name of Schuessler and Roberts. The insolvency of Ernest Andrews, Lane, and Bagley, and the other signers of the notes is also alleged. The plaintiff amended its petition by amplifying the allegations of fraud. The defendants filed several demurrers on various grounds, among others that the petition is multifarious, and that there is a misjoinder of parties defendant. The court overruled each of the demurrers, and the defendants excepted.

Goetchius & Chappell and C. E. Battle, for plaintiffs in error. J. H. Lewis, J. H. Martin, and A. W. Cozart, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. When all of the allegations in the petition, relative to the creation of the debt represented by the notes attached to the petition, are considered together, no doubt remains that the debt is one from Ernest Andrews, Lane, and the other makers of the notes, individually, and not the debt of the Andrews Company, the corporation, to the bank. This conclusion is not to be affected by the general recitals that the debt was one of the Andrews Company, and that the money obtained, which was the consideration of the notes; was for the use and benefit of the Andrews Company, and was placed to the credit of that company on the books of the bank. There are facts alleged in the petition of more weight and significance than these mere general allegations. In the first place, the bank took the notes of Ernest Andrews, Lane, and the other stockholders individually, and these notes are under seal; and, again, the shares of stock of the corporation were deposited as collateral security for the payment, not of the debt of the company to the bank, but for the payment of these notes. And in one paragraph of the petition it distinctly appears that after the notes of Ernest Andrews, to the amount of $5,000, had been taken, and that additional funds were needed, the bank "was unwilling to take his [Ernest Andrews] notes for any additional amount; and he then stated to your petitioner that the money was for the Andrews Company, but that he did not want to increase its indebtedness, and that he would, therefore, procure the notes of certain employees of the corporation, to wit, Lane, Bagley, and others, for the sum of $1,000 each, which notes would be indorsed by him, and that he would deposit as security therefor stock in the Andrews Company to the amount of $5,000, which had been issued to said parties." Here again it appears that the notes of Lane, Bagley, and others were taken under seal, signed by them individually, and that these notes were taken because the bank was unwilling to take Ernest Andrews' notes "for any additional amounts," and that "he did not want to increase [the corporation's] indebtedness." The authorities cited by the plaintiffs in error upon the point now under consideration contain nothing contrary to the conclusion which we have reached. In the case of Merchants' Bank v. Central Bank, 1 Kelly (Ga.) 418, 44 Am. Dec. 665, it was said that: "It may be stated generally that where it appears on the face of the paper that the credit is not given to the agent, and the name of the principal is disclosed at the time of the transaction, and the act is within the powers of the agent, the principal is bound. The question whether the agent is bound does not affect this question, for there are many cases where both principal and agent are bound. Now, it is apparent on this bill of exchange [the paper sued on] that it was the intent of the parties to bind Scott Cray's principal; else, why make it payable to him as agent, and why take his indorsement as agent? It is still more manifest that he does appear to act as agent. The testimony upon the trial, too, is that the name of his principal was disclosed to the Central Bank at the time the bill was discounted." If this excerpt from the opinion in the case last cited is not sufficient to show an entirely different state of facts from those set forth in the case at bar, the reading of the entire case will make the difference clear and distinct.

It is unnecessary to discuss the cases cited by the plaintiffs in error in detail. The case last above referred to, and the case of Third National Bank v. Van Haagen Mfg. Co., 141 Pa. 214, 21 Atl. 598, 12 L. R. A. 223, seems to be most confidently relied upon by counsel. The latter case lays down merely the broad ruling that a loan of money to a corporation will render it liable for the debt, although the note of an individual, instead of the note of the corporation, was taken therefor, because supposed to be better security. In the case at bar we hold as a matter of law, under the allegations in the petition, that the loan of money was not to the corporation, but to the individuals. The other cases cited on the brief of counsel for the plaintiffs in error are easily distinguishable from the instant case. And while we do not put our ruling upon the question immediately under consideration, upon the fact that the notes given by Ernest Andrews, Lane, and others were under seal, it is not to be concluded that we regard that feature of the case as unimportant. In the case of Merchants' Bank v. Central Bank, supra, it is said: "The inference drawn from the paper is that Scott Cray acted as agent for some person, or corporation; but who, or what, does not appear. The name of his principal does not appear. The general rule is this: In order to bind a principal, on a contract made by an agent, it must purport on its face to be the contract of the principal, and his name must be inserted in it. It is not enough that the agent be described as such in the instrument. Story on Agency, § 147; Paley on Agency, by Lloyd, 180, 181, 182; 2 Kent (3d Ed.) 629. This rule applies, more particularly, to solemn instruments under seal, and as to them, to use the language of Judge Story, it is 'regularly true,' but not universally true in all its extent; for, so far as regards instruments under seal, there are some exceptions to some of the requirements of the rule. Although the rule is thus strict as to sealed instruments, yet a more liberal rule obtains as to unsolemn instruments, especially commercial and maritime contracts." See, also, Van Dyke v. Van Dyke, 123 Ga. 686, 51 S. E. 582, and authorities there cited.

2. Having reached the conclusion that the debt represented by the notes was the individual debt of the signers of these notes, we have now to decide whether the payee and holder of these notes, who was the pledgee of a majority of the shares of stock of the Andrews Company, was in a position to invoke the equitable relief against the corporation to prevent it and other parties from consummating a fraudulent sale and transfer of the assets of the corporation, whereby the stock pledged would be rendered valueless. Reference to the statement of facts will make it appear how this sale and transfer was to be effected. That the transaction between the corporation on the one side, and Schuessler and Roberts on the other, was not only tainted, but saturated with fraud, is undeniable if the allegations of the petition are true; and they are to be so taken as against the demurrer. It is not necessary for us to decide what might have been the rights and remedies of the petitioner had it been a stockholder of the Andrews Company, or had it been a creditor of the same. Had it been a stockholder, owning a majority of the shares of stock, and having a voice in the control and direction of the affairs of the corporation, it might possibly have been compelled to resort to a different procedure more peculiarly adapted to the righting of the wrong about to be inflicted upon a stockholder by an unauthorized act of the corporation, tending to impair and destroy the value of his shares of stock, or, if the bank had been a creditor of the corporation, it might not have been able to proceed against the corporation, or the parties to whom the corporation made a pretended sale of all its assets, until after its claim was reduced to judgment, unless it was proceeding under the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 2716, and had put itself in a position to invoke the remedies provided thereby. But it is neither a creditor nor a stockholder in the full sense of that word. In both the briefs for plaintiffs and defendant in error it is considered as a pledgee of stock, holding the shares of stock as collateral security for the payment of a debt. And it is as bearing this relation to the corporation, the validity of whose acts are attacked, that we are to treat it, and to decide whether or not it is entitled to the aid of a court of equity in setting aside a sale alleged to be fraudulent, and charged to have been the result of a combination and conspiracy "for the purpose of defeating petitioner in the collection of its debts by depreciating and utterly destroying the value of the securities held by it."

Counsel for plaintiffs in error contend that, if it appears that petitioner is neither a stockholder nor a creditor of the Andrews

Company, it must follow that it is not entitled to maintain the present action. But, as we view it, the fact of its being neither a stockholder nor a creditor of the corporation removes all doubt as to its right to equitable relief at this time. Had it been a stockholder, it might, as we have said, have had some voice in the control and direction of the affairs of the corporation. Had it been a creditor, it might have reduced its claim to judgment, and proceeded against the purchasers under the fraudulent sale of the assets of the corporation; but being merely pledgees of the stock holding debts against individual stockholders, it cannot have adequate relief except in an action of this nature against the corporation, the stockholders, and the parties who "combined and confederated" with them to depreciate and destroy the value of the stock pledged. Any kind of a proceeding at common law would have required a multiplicity of suits and a circuitry of action. "Pledgee of stock has the right to maintain an action for the preservation of the assets of the company." 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 907; 10 Cyc. 648. "Pledgees of shares of stock have such interest in the corporation as to entitle them to object to the act of their pledgors in turning property of the corporation over to another stockholder in payment of shares of stock." St. Louis Stoneware Co. v. Partidge, 8 Mo. App. 580; 12 Cent. Dig. par. 573e. This doctrine is applied by the Supreme Court of Minnesota in the case of Baldwin v. Canfield, 28 Minn. 43, 1 N. W. 261, 276, where it is said: "The holders of the stock, whether holding as general owners or as pledgees, are therefore interested in the preservation of the corporate property, and in preventing it from passing out of the hands of the corporation. Stockholders do not have an 'interest' in the corporate real estate, in the sense in which the word 'interest' is commonly used in that connection; for such real estate is the property of the corporation. For this reason, we think that the court below has used the word 'interest' in this finding inaccurately. But this is not important. Upon the facts found, and the preceding conclusions of law, the plaintiffs, as holders of the stock, are interested in the preservation of the corporate property, and in preventing it from passing out of the hands of the corporation. If this is so, they have a right to take legal means to preserve the property, to prevent it from being lost to the corporation, or its value from being impaired."

* * * It is also contended by the defendant's counsel that the plaintiffs have no standing in court, because a stockholder, as such, could not sustain an action of this kind. It is an answer to this to say that, as remarked by the counsel in another part of his brief, the plaintiffs, though they hold the stock, are not stockholders, but pledgees merely, and therefore they cannot exercise the control over the association which stockholders can. What the stockholders may compel the association to do they cannot compel it to do. They cannot, therefore, be required to act through the association, but they may bring an action on their own account, and in their own names to protect their rights and interests as pledgees."

If we have stated the correct doctrine as to the right of pledgees of stock in cases like that stated in this petition, the court did not err in overruling the demurrers of any of the defendants, which were general in their nature though it must follow as a matter of course from what we have said in this opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to a judgment upon its notes against the Andrews Company and so much of the prayer of the petition as seeks this particular relief against the corporation must be unavailing however righteous the other demands in the petition may be.

3. But the mere fact that a part of the remedy and relief sought is not appropriate does not have the effect to render the bill multifarious. Nor was there a misjoinder of parties. The corporation whose assets were transferred by the fraudulent sale resulting from a wrongful "combination and conspiracy," its stockholders, and the other parties to the alleged pretended and wrongful sale were all proper parties. And especially W. T. Roberts and Mrs. Schuessler should have joined as parties defendant; and, if they have so misappropriated and wasted any of the assets obtained by the alleged wrongful sale the petitioner would be entitled to an accounting as against them. The respective rights of Mrs. Schuessler and Roberts as creditors of the corporation, and of Roberts as a creditor or holder of the preferred stock, if he be one, and of petitioners, may be all adjusted according to the priorities of their claims upon the final winding up of the business of the corporation, and the distribution of its assets.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

SEWELL v. NORRIS et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1907.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—VALIDITY OF TRANSACTION AS BETWEEN PARTIES.

Where two parties confederate for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of one of them, and in pursuance thereof the debtor executes and delivers a deed conveying land to the other, neither law nor equity will help him to cancel such deed or to avoid its effect by showing that it was fraudulent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Fraudulent Conveyances, § 523.]

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—EXECUTORY CONTRACT—FRAUD.

If the parties make a contract for the purpose of defrauding a creditor or creditors of one of them, such contract, while executory, cannot be enforced by either against the other.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Specific Performance, § 176.]

3. ESTOPPEL—CLOTHING ANOTHER WITH APPARENT TITLE—REAL PROPERTY.

If one who held the legal title to land, though unrecorded, represented that the title was in another person, who appeared from the record to be the owner, and that such other person had the right to sell, and make a bond for title to the land, and thus induced an innocent purchaser for value, in reliance on such representation, to accept a bond for title from the other person, to give notes for the purchase money, and to pay some or all of them, the person so acting would be estopped from denying the title of such third person.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 19, Estoppel, § 218.]

4. SAME.

But if the whole agreement of sale was fraudulent, and a mere sham to defeat creditors of the real owner, whose deed was unrecorded, and the taker of the bond participated in such scheme and knew the real facts, no equitable estoppel would arise in his favor, so as to prevent the holder of the legal title from asserting it, if he could do so without relying on or taking advantage of the fraudulent transaction.

5. SAME.

If the owner had a legal title untainted by the fraud, his right to recover possession on it against the holder of the bond for title from the third person would not be defeated, if his case did not involve the setting up of the fraud, but the defense was compelled to set up the fraudulent transaction for the purpose of establishing an equitable estoppel or affirmative equitable rights.

(Syllabus, by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Franklin County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

Action by J. R. P. Sewell against J. O. Norris and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

J. R. P. Sewell brought an action of complaint against J. R. Grubbs and J. O. Norris, seeking to recover a tract of land containing 42½ acres. The defendants denied that the plaintiff was the owner of the land, and Norris alleged that he was the lawful owner and in legally acquired possession. He also pleaded that he bought the property from Mrs. E. J. Sewell, receiving a bond for title from her; that at the time of the purchase the plaintiff represented that the title was in her, and assisted in conducting the sale; that he induced this defendant to accept the bond, and also wrote the notes given for the purchase money, four of which have been paid; and that he was thereby estopped from claiming title. The plaintiff conveyed the land to his mother, Mrs. E. J. Sewell, by a deed dated May 6, 1893, and she reconveyed it to him by deed dated May 15th of the same year. She made to G. L. King a bond for title dated August 24, 1898, and this was transferred by King to Norris on April 12, 1902. The defendants sought to show that Sewell negotiated the trade with King, and stated that the title was in his mother because he owed her some money; that upon his representation King accepted a bond for title from Mrs. Sewell, the mother, and gave notes, which had been paid off; that he was in possession; that the trade was made in good faith on his part; and that the bond was transferred to Norris, who also took in good faith. The evidence on behalf of the defendants themselves indicated that they knew that Sewell had separated from his wife and was hid in a little tenant's house; that King and Norris knew that he was in trouble and wanted to sell his land, and was thus dealing with the land in controversy, although the title was in his mother. The evidence for the plaintiff tended to show that the whole transaction with King and Norris was a fraud, and merely colorable; that they knew the title was in the plaintiff, though his deed was unrecorded; that Sewell had separated from his wife, and, to avoid a claim for alimony or some similar claim, the bond for title from his mother to King was executed and the purchase-money notes made, though it was understood that they were never to be paid; and that all the parties participated in this. The plaintiff denied that he ever received any payment of the notes. The brother of the plaintiff testified that on behalf of his mother he tendered back to King the amount which had been paid on the notes, and that the latter refused it. The jury found for the defendants.

The plaintiff moved for a new trial on the general grounds, and also on certain grounds which were added by amendment. One of these complains of the following charge of the court: "If you believe from the evidence in the case that the alleged sale of the property in controversy, and the alleged purchase of the same by King, was a fraudulent purchase and sale, and that the bond for titles and notes given pursuant to said sale were a part thereof, and were fraudulently executed and delivered by the respective parties—that is to say, that if you believe all this was done to defraud any creditor of the plaintiff, and that the defendant King and Norris were parties to this fraudulent scheme, and that the whole thing was a fraud and known to all the parties thereto—then all the parties are bound by their fraudulent conduct, and the law will leave them where it finds them. Courts will not lend their aid to relieve any one from the consequence of his own fraudulent conduct. This rule of law applies to executed contracts, and not to contracts that are executory in their nature. Whether it is an executed contract or an executory contract is a question which the jury will decide from the evidence in the case." It was alleged that this was error, because the court should have charged that the contract referred to was an executory contract, that the law found Sewell with the legal title, which would authorize a recovery unless he had lost the right, and that his right to recover on his legal title would not be defeated by showing a subsequent fraudulent contract resulting in the giving of a bond for title and possession by the defendant, and that the court in a previous part of the charge, in stating the contentions of the defendants, told the jury that they contended that the law found them in possession, and the law would leave them where it found them, and that, taking this in connection with the charge quoted, it was calculated to confuse the jury as to where the parties were found by the law in the legal sense of that expression. The judge declined to certify two grounds of the motion, but certified that he did not charge that, notwithstanding there might have been a fraudulent scheme on the part of the parties to the litigation to defeat the collection of a debt against the plaintiff, and the bond and notes were given in pursuance of the scheme, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, unless it was necessary to invoke the aid of the fraud to make out his case. The motion was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted.

Skelton & Swilling and J. N. Worley, for plaintiff in error. J. B. Jones and W. R. Little, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is to be regretted that parties should bring such a transaction as is here involved before the courts. That Sewell was endeavoring to avoid some legal liability appears beyond question. If King and Norris were innocent purchasers for value and without notice, they would be protected. If they were participants in the fraudulent effort of Sewell to conceal his property, and were in pari delicto with him, they would stand no better in such transaction than he does. Where parties are equally at fault, neither law nor equity will help either of them to enforce a contract the object of which was to defraud others, if executory, or to set it aside, if executed. The rule is often expressed by saying that in such cases the law "will leave the parties where it finds them." Civ. Code 1895, § 3937. In Bump on Fraudulent Conveyances (4th Ed.) 445, it is tersely and forcibly said that "there is no obligation upon any one to extricate a rogue from his own toils. On any other principle a knave might gain, but could not lose, by a dishonest expedient, and inducements would be furnished to unfair dealing, if the law were to repair the accidents of an unsuccessful trick. A fraudulent grantee, therefore, is allowed to retain the property, not for any merit of his own, but for the demerit of his confederate, in accordance with a wise and liberal policy, which requires that the consequence of a fraudulent experiment shall be made as disastrous as possible. The law endeavors to environ a debtor with all possible perils, and make it appear that honesty is the best policy." Fouche v. Brower, 74 Ga. 251, 267. Legally speaking where does the law find the parties to this case? It finds the plaintiff with the legal title to the property in him, placed there several years before the transaction with the defendants, and apparently having no connection with the fraud or the dealing with them. If the maxim, "Ex dolo malo non oritur actio" ("From fraud no cause of action arises"), or the other like maxim, "Ex turpi causa non oritur actio" ("From a base transaction a cause of action does not arise"), be applied to this case, it does not appear that the legal title in the plaintiff was tainted with the fraud which the evidence indicates entered into the subsequent agreement between him and the defendants. He did not have to invoke the unlawful agreement or transaction in order to assert that title. Thus, then, so far, at least, as this record discloses, the law found him with a legal title on which he could recover without resort to or reliance upon any illegal agreement, unless he were prevented from recovering by some legal defense.

Under the doctrine expressed in the maxim, "Ex turpi causa non oritur actio," it has been said that no court will "allow itself to be made the instrument of enforcing obligations alleged to arise out of a contract or transaction which is illegal." Scott v. Brown, 2 Q. B. Div. 724, 728. Lindley, L. J., said: "Under the circumstances, the plaintiff must look elsewhere than to a court of justice for such assistance as he may require against the persons he employed to assist him in his fraud, if the claim to such assistance is based on his illegal contract. Any rights which he may have irrespective of his illegal contract will, of course, be recognized and enforced. But his illegal contract confers no rights on him." In Simpson v. Bloss, 7 Taunt. 246 (17 Rev. Rep. 509), it was said that "the test whether a demand connected with an illegal transaction is capable of being enforced at law is whether the plaintiff requires any aid from the illegal transaction to establish his case." In Ingram v. Mitchell, 30 Ga. 547, it was said that, whenever the plaintiff can make out his case without invoking the illegal contract to his aid, he is entitled to recover. And see Clarke v. Brown, 77 Ga. 606, 4 Am. St. Rep. 98; Howell v. Fountain, 3 Ga. 182, 46 Am. Dec. 415; Adams v. Barrett, 5 Ga. 404; Garrison v. Burns, 98 Ga. 762, 26 S. E. 471. But Lord Mansfield said: "If, from the plaintiff's own statement or otherwise, the cause of action appears to arise ex turpi causa, or the transgression of a positive law of this country, there the court says he has no right to be assisted." Holman v. Johnson, Cowp. 343; Holleman v. Bradley Fertilizer Co., 106 Ga. 156, 32 S. E. 83; Tompkins v. Compton, 93 Ga. 520, 21 S. E. 79. The illegality of a contract which is sought to be enforced, or in respect to which relief is prayed, may appear from the plaintiff's case or may be set up by way of defense. Bugg v. Towner, 41 Ga. 315. The deed on which it was attempted to recover possession in that case was void under a statute of this state.

Where money is paid or personal property is delivered under such a fraudulent or illegal contract, nothing more is necessary to pass title thereto. The contract is executed, and there can be no recovery of such money or property if the parties are in pari delicto. In regard to real estate, the mere allowing a person to take possession, or even placing him in possession, does not convey title or operate as a complete execution of a contract to make a title. A conveyance of real estate or of an interest therein must be in writing. A contract of sale in parol, with full payment of the purchase money and delivery of possession, may take the sale without the provisions of the statute of frauds. But, as already noted, the written contract here was not between the owner and the person who took possession, but between such person and a third party, and as against the owner it was necessary to invoke the doctrine of equitable estoppel.

Where did the law find the defendants? They were in possession, or one of them was so. But they have no title, and possession alone would not defeat a recovery under a superior legal title. Something else must be shown. "If the owner or a person having an interest in property represents another as the owner, or permits him to appear as such, or as having complete authority over it, he will be estopped to deny such ownership or authority against persons who, relying on his representations or silence, have purchased or acquired an interest in the property; and generally where a person by word or conduct voluntarily induces another to act on a belief in the existence of a certain state of facts, he will be estopped, as against him, to allege a different state of facts." Equitable Mortgage Co. v. Butler, 105 Ga. 555, 560, 31 S. E. 395. In order to be benefited by this rule, the purchaser must have relied on the representations or conduct of the person sought to be estopped. He must have been induced to act on the belief in the existence of a state of facts, by reason of the representations or conduct of the other party. He must have acted in ignorance that the state of facts on which he claimed to rely was not the true state, and the purchase must have been a bona fide purchase, not a mere sham to avoid creditors, participated in by both parties. If the transaction was merely a trick or device to defeat a creditor or creditors of Sewell, and King and Norris knowingly took part in it, no equity could arise in their favor by reason of it. The law declares it to be wrong to seek to defraud creditors; and, if parties combine together to commit such a wrong, no equity will arise in favor of either against the other, nor will an equitable estoppel arise in favor of one of such parties as against the other from such a transaction. Deen v. Williams, 57 S. E. 427.

The bond for title was not made by Sewell, but by his mother. Whatever money was paid on the trade was not paid to him, but to her. The plaintiff does not rely upon this transaction either to recover the land or to set aside any contract of his. The defendants have not title, and must set up the transaction, whatever it was, in support of their claim. This being so, if the thing on which they must rely for some affirmative right is in law contrary to public policy and good morals, their claim must fail. In cases where parties conspire together to defeat creditors of one of them, if they subsequently fall out among themselves, the law will not enforce the contract between them if it is executory, and will not set it aside if it is executed. Whichever party has to resort to setting up the illegal transaction, in order to establish or support an affirmative claim of right, must lose. If the debtor has made and delivered a deed conveying property, he can get no aid to set aside such a deed because of his own fraud. The deed becomes an executed contract, and places the title in his grantee, and if the grantee sues him for possession of the land so conveyed, neither law nor equity will help the grantor to defeat a recovery by setting up that the transaction was entered into in order to defraud his creditors; and, on the other hand, if one holds the legal title not affected by the fraudulent transaction, if there was one, and brings suit to recover the land from the possession of another who has no title, the latter cannot defend successfully by setting up that he is without legal title, but that he was placed in possession under a contract or arrangement to defeat the creditors of the owner. This would be in effect to enforce a contract or agreement which the law declares fraudulent and contrary to public policy. It would be equivalent to setting aside the legal title, or granting specific performance in favor of the holder of the bond for title, under a fraudulent agreement, or of recognizing equities as growing out of such transactions.

We do not know what facts may be developed on the trial, whether it may appear that the purchasers were bona fide and without notice of any wrongful purpose in the transaction, or whether they were participants in an effort to defeat a creditor or creditors of Sewell. But we do not think that our excellent brother of the circuit bench clearly placed before the jury the doctrine of executed and executory contracts, the question whether the plaintiff had a legal title unaffected by the fraud involved in the transaction, if there was any, and, if there was such a fraudulent transaction in which both parties participated, whether the defendant Norris had title outside of it, or must invoke the fraudulent transaction to establish some affirmative right or equity on his part. See Parrott v. Baker, 82 Ga. 364, 9 S. E. 1068, where the case of Harrison v. Hatcher, 44 Ga. 638, decided by two judges, was overruled; Beard v. White, 120 Ga. 1018, 48 S. E. 400.

SMALLWOOD et al. v. KIMBALL et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 10, 1907.)

1. ERROR, WRIT OF—DISMISSAL—GROUNDS FOR.

An action of ejectment was brought in the name of four plaintiffs. Before the trial one of them entered a retraxit, upon which judgment was entered by the court in favor of the defendant against such plaintiff and he was dismissed from the suit. The case proceeded to trial, which resulted in a verdict for the defendant. Thereafter a motion for new trial was filed by the plaintiffs, which being overruled, a bill of exceptions was sued out, in which all four of the original plaintiffs were described as plaintiffs in error. A pauper affidavit was filed by the three plaintiffs who remained parties to the suit. When the case was called in the Supreme Court, attention was called to the fact that one of the plaintiffs in error—that is, the one who had filed the retraxit in the court below—had filed no pauper affidavit. Counsel for the plaintiffs in error then moved to strike the name of this plaintiff in error from the bill of exceptions wherever it occurred. Held, that such motion will be granted, and the fact that the plaintiff in error thus stricken has failed to file a pauper affidavit will not work a dismissal of the writ of error.

2. EVIDENCE—OFFICIAL RECORDS—AUTHENTICATION.

When there is no clerk of a court of ordinary, the judge is ex officio clerk. A certificate of the ordinary, purporting to certify a copy of marriage license appearing of record in his office, does not render the copy admissible in evidence, unless it is made affirmatively to appear that there is no clerk other than the ordinary. Sellers v. Page, 127 Ga. 634, 56 S. E. 1011 (3); Lay v. Sheppard, 112 Ga. 111, 37 S. E. 132.

3. NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE.

A material issue in this case was whether a certain alleged marriage was lawful, and the improper admission of the marriage license in evidence is sufficient cause for the grant of a new trial.

4. ERROR, WRIT OF—REVIEW.

There are a number of assignments of error which are so indefinite as to render it doubtful whether under the rulings of this court they may be considered; but they, as well as all other objections to the judgment refusing to grant a new trial, relate to such matters as probably will not occur in the same way upon another trial, and we will not rule upon any other question than those dealt with in the preceding headnotes.

Error from Superior Court, Laurens County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by Augustus Ashley and others against W. J. Cook and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Augustus Ashley, Lulu Kreutz, and J. M. Ashley instituted suit against W. J. Cook, W. R. Cook, and Daniel Cummings, alleging, in substance, that in 1884 P. A. Ashley executed a deed conveying 720 acres, more or less, of land, composed of a number of separate tracts as follows: Being parts of lots Nos. 36, 14, 15, and 16 in the Second land district, and parts of lots Nos. 391, 392, and 393, in the Twenty-Second land district—the conveyance being made to Kate Ashley, the mother of plaintiffs, for life, with remainder over to her children, which deed was not recorded within the time prescribed by law; that in 1893 Kate Ashley died, leaving the plaintiffs and their brother, J. H. Ashley, as her only children; that afterwards J. H. Ashley died, leaving the plaintiffs as his only heirs at law; that after the execution of the aforesaid deed P. A. Ashley on April 13, 1885, executed a deed to secure a debt, to Mary L. Floyd Jones, conveying the same property, the amount secured being $800, and said Jones taking the said security deed in good faith, without notice of the previous unrecorded deed to Kate Ashley and her children; that afterwards Mary L. Floyd Jones sued to judgment the notes so secured, and caused execution to issue thereon for $800 principal, $214.28 interest, $101.45 attorney's fees, and

$9.85 costs of court, and on March 5, 1891, she caused said execution to be levied by the sheriff upon the property described in the deeds, and on February 2, 1892, the sheriff, G. M. Howard, exposed for sale at public outcry lot No. 14 of the Second district, containing 202½ acres, more or less, which was purchased by W. J. Cook for $750, which price was paid to the sheriff, whereupon he executed to the said Cook his deed conveying the property so described; that said sale was void, for the reason that Mary L. Floyd Jones did not execute and file and have recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court, prior to the time of levy, a deed of reconveyance to P. A. Ashley, but W. J. Cook, the purchaser, became subrogated to all the rights of Mary L. Floyd Jones, and his interest acquired by subrogation was superior to the interest acquired by Kate Ashley and her children under the first deed from P. A. Ashley; that on the same date of sale the sheriff also, by virtue of the same execution, sold 140 acres of lot No. 36 in the Second district to Daniel Cummings (the amount of the purchase price not being alleged), which sale was void for the same reason as that averred touching the sale to W. J. Cook; that the sheriff executed a deed to Daniel Cummings, who became subrogated to the rights of Mary L. Floyd Jones with respect to the property so purchased by him; that Kate Ashley, on February 3, 1892, paid on the execution the $360, and that sum was credited thereon (it not being otherwise alleged what disposition was made of this money); that W. J. Cook enjoyed the rents, issues, and profits of the land purchased by him from February 2, 1892, to March 8, 1898, of the yearly value of $100 and during said time he cut and took from the land a large amount of timber, of the value of $500 or other large sum, and on March 8, 1898, he conveyed to W. R. Cook the part of the land so purchased by him, but Cook took the land with full knowledge of petitioners' equities in the premises, and entered upon the land, and enjoyed the rents, issues, and profits thereof, of the yearly value of $100, from March 8, 1898, to the time of the filing of the suit, April 24, 1900; that Daniel Cummings has enjoyed the rents, issues, and profits of the land purchased by him, of the yearly value of $100, from the 2d day of February, 1892, to the date of the filing of the suit, and has also taken from said premises a large amount of timber, of the value of $300; and that the rents, issues, and profits of lot No. 14, collected by W. J. Cook and W. R. Cook, together with the value of the timber cut by W. J. Cook, and the rents, issues, and profits of said part of lot No. 36 collected by Daniel Cummings, together with the timber cut from lot of land 36 by him, and the amount paid on the fi. fa. by the said Kate Ashley, have long since paid off said executions in favor of Mary L. Floyd Jones, to whose rights W. J. Cook and Daniel Cummings are subrogated in said void sale.

It will be observed that while it is alleged that the security deed executed by P. A. Ashley to Mary L. Floyd Jones conveyed the same premises as described in the deed from P. A. Ashley to Kate Ashley and her children, it was not alleged that any part of the lands were sold at sheriff's sales, except lot No. 14, containing 202 $\frac{1}{2}$  acres, more or less, and 140 acres of lot No. 136. Deducting this acreage from the 720 acres would leave, according to the allegations, 377 $\frac{1}{2}$  acres vested in Mary L. Floyd Jones under the security deed, concerning which neither W. J. Cook nor Daniel Cummings ever asserted any claim. It was prayed: (1) That W. J. Cook, W. R. Cook, and Daniel Cummings be required to account for the rents, issues, and profits received by them, and the timber cut by them from said lands, and if said amounts have paid off said executions, with interest, petitioners be decreed to have title to the land, and that the defendants' deeds be delivered up and canceled. (2) That in the event it is found, on accounting, that said amounts have not paid up said execution, the petitioners be allowed to pay the defendants such amounts as may be decreed to be equitably due them, and thereupon that petitioners be decreed to have title to the premises, and that the deeds be delivered up and canceled. (3) That in the event it be found, on accounting, that said sums have more than paid the execution, then that petitioners may have judgment against each of the defendants separately for the amounts that may be found equitably due each of them.

After the suit was filed W. J. Cook died, and on January 26, 1903, his death was suggested of record. On the same day the court passed an order reciting the suggestion of record of the death of W. J. Cook, and that there was no administration on his estate, and ordering, upon motion of plaintiffs' counsel, that W. J. Cook be stricken as a party defendant. To the petition as amended the defendants demurred upon the ground, among others, that there is a nonjoinder of necessary parties, to wit, Mary L. Floyd Jones and G. M. Howard, sheriff, and that there is a misjoinder of causes of action.

John M. Stubbs, D. M. Roberts, and Akerman & Akerman, for plaintiffs in error. Hines & Jordan and T. L. Griner, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). The court having placed the decision only upon the questions of misjoinder of causes of action and nonjoinder of necessary parties, we will deal only with those questions. The allegations of the petition in effect charge that Mary L. Floyd Jones by virtue of the security deed acquired a title to all the property as security for the debt which was superior to the title of the plaintiffs. It follows that the lien of the judgment upon which execution issued, which was admittedly valid, was also superior to the title asserted by the plaintiffs. If the sale by the sheriff to W. J. Cook and the sale by the sheriff to Daniel Cummings were both void, as alleged, neither of these acquired any title whatever to the land which the sheriff conveyed to them, respectively. But it is alleged that each of them was subrogated to the rights of Mary L. Floyd Jones. See Ashley v. Cook, 109 Ga. 653, 35 S. E. 89. If they were subrogated to anything, it was to the security which she held. A mere security was the greatest interest which she held in the land. The greatest right which they acquired under the equitable right of subrogation was a right to participate in common in the control of the unsatisfied security for their reimbursement. If, in the course of collection by lawful sale or otherwise, they should make a new arrangement by which they would acquire lawful right to the identical property attempted to be sold to them, respectively, by the sheriff, that would be a different matter altogether. So far as the allegations go, Mrs. Mary L. Floyd Jones also has an interest in the security in common with W. J. Cook and Daniel Cummings, because it is not alleged that she has been fully paid. It is alleged that W. J. Cook, who did not have title, conveyed the land bought by him to W. R. Cook, who did not acquire title, but only took the right of subrogation theretofore held by W. J. Cook. That is not alleged in so many words, but it is necessarily implied from a fair construction of the declaration. If that be true, W. R. Cook had no other right than, in common with others, to have the security deed enforced for his benefit to satisfy any interest in the security to which he might be entitled by force of the alleged equitable assignment by W. J. Cook. It is thus seen that, under the theory by which it is sought to recover, all of the defendants are obliged to resort to the enforcement of the same security for whatever rights they may have, and that their several equities must be satisfied from a common security. The security will be enforced for the benefit of all, as their interests may appear. Under these conditions, there are no separate and distinct causes of action united in one suit and the action is not multifarious. See, in this connection, White v. North Georgia Electric Co., 128 Ga. 539, 58 S. E. 83.

From what has been said it is manifest that under the allegations Mary L. Floyd Jones has an interest in the security, and also that the estate of W. J. Cook is substantially interested. The security as a whole could not be decreed satisfied, nor could a complete accounting be had, without making them parties. Their respective interests extend to every feature of the case. The facts of the demise of W. J. Cook and omission to have administration upon his estate between the time of filing the suit and the hearing of the demurrer do not render it the less necessary that his estate be made a party. It is sought to make his estate account for rents and profits, and also to bring about conditions which could render it liable upon a warranty of title. Neither of these things could ever be done without an opportunity afforded to be heard. Neither Mary L. Floyd Jones nor the estate of W. J. Cook was a party, and in the absence of proper amendments the court was authorized to dismiss the petition upon demurrer raising the point that they should be parties. The sheriff is a mere nominal party, without any real or actual interest, and the failure to make him a party was not cause for dismissing the petition. See, in this connection, 15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 600, and citations; Beall v. Blake, 16 Ga. 119; Smith v. Pate, 51 Ga. 246. The judgment of the court dismissing the case, because of the omission to make Mary L. Floyd Jones and the estate of W. J. Cook parties, was authorized. Nothing in the judgment now rendered will operate as a bar to another suit, with all the proper parties thereto.

MILLEDGEVILLE WATER CO. et al. v. FOWLER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1907.)

DAMAGES—BREACH OF CONTRACT—EVIDENCE.

This being an action to recover for a breach of a contract, the burden of proving the amount suffered through the alleged breach rested upon the plaintiff; and, there being no evidence whatever to show the amount of damages suffered, the verdict for substantial compensatory damages in favor of the plaintiff was unauthorized, though he might have been entitled to nominal damages upon proof merely of the breach.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Damages, § 502.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Baldwin County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by S. B. Fowler against the Milledgeville Water Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Reversed.

Fowler brought suit against the Milledgeville Water Company and Hanes, superintendent, to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the failure and refusal of the defendants to furnish water for the plaintiff's residence in the city of Milledgeville. He alleged, in substance, that said water company is under a contract "with the mayor and aldermen of said city, for and in behalf of the citizens of said city, whereby it agrees to furnish water to the residents of said city upon terms therein fully set out"; that in pursuance of said contract the defendants had furnished him with water up to September 1, 1904, at which time Hanes, general manager of the defendant company, demanded of him the payment of water rental for the preceding six months, which he had already paid; that he refused to pay said back rental, but paid the rental for the next ensuing six months ending March 1, 1905. "Nevertheless said Hanes retained said money, sent your petitioner a receipt purporting to be for the half year ending September 1, 1904, and immediately cut off said water from his said residence." As to the damages sustained in consequence of being deprived of the water the plaintiff testified: "I had no other supply of water besides the hydrant. I did not have a well. I got my water from the neighbors, or some street well. * * * This certainly necessitated additional work. The hydrant was so located that my wife could draw all the water that she wanted. * * * I used this water for bathing, and it was very convenient. * * * The water remained cut off until March 1, 1905." The defendant denied the material allegations in the petition, and contended that the plaintiff was in arrears with his dues, and that the water was cut off because the rental was not paid. The jury found in favor of the plaintiff $150. The defendants moved for a new trial, which was denied, and they excepted.

Hines & Vinson, for plaintiffs in error.
Allen & Pottle, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above). The plaintiff's case, as stated in his petition and as made by his evidence, was plainly one arising from a breach of a contract. The relation of the parties to the action was plainly contractual. The defendant, under the terms of the contract, was under obligation, upon the payment in advance of a certain sum by the plaintiff, to furnish water to plaintiff at his residence. The plaintiff contended, and submitted proof to show, that he had performed his part of the contract by payment in advance of the requisite amount, and that the defendant had failed and refused to perform his part. Counsel for the plaintiff in their brief and argument insist that, under the pleadings and facts of the case, a right of action as for a tort had been shown. And while the movant does not except to any portion of the charge, and the charge itself is not in the record, the case must have been submitted to the jury on that theory; otherwise, we cannot account for the verdict.

Mere breach of a contract cannot be converted into a tort by showing that failure to perform upon the part of the one committing the breach had resulted in great inconvenience, trouble, annoyance, and hardship to the other party to the contract. Civ. Code 1895, § 3807, provides that: "A tort is a legal wrong committed upon the person or property independent of contract. It may be either: (1) A direct invasion of some legal right of the individual. (2) The infraction of some public duty by which special damage accrues to the individual. (3) The violation of some private obligation by which like damage accrues to the individual. In the former case, no special damage is necessary to entitle the party to recover. In the two latter cases, such damage is necessary." Section 3810, contained in the chapter on "Torts," provides that: "Private duties may arise either from statute, or flow from the relations created by contract, express or implied. The violation of any such specific duty, accompanied with damage, gives a right of action." And in L. & N. Railroad Co. v. Spinks, 104 Ga. 692, 30 S. E. 968, it was decided that: "In arriving at a correct understanding of the meaning of section 3807, the words 'independent of contract' must be understood as applying to each one of the three subdivisions embraced in that section. Accordingly, the third subdivision means the same as if it read: 'The violation of some private obligation, independent of contract, by which like damage accrues to the individual.' And section 3810, in so far as it refers to private duties flowing from 'relations created by contract, express or implied,' means the same thing. Every person who makes a contract of any kind is, of course, under a duty of performing it; but it would never do to hold that every breach of a civil contract, though necessarily in a sense involving a breach of the duty thereby imposed, would give rise to an action ex delicto." Judge Cooley says, after pointing out certain exceptions to the rule: "The rule is general that, where contract relations exist, the parties assume toward each other no duties whatever besides those the contract imposes." 1 Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) 160. If one seriously doubts whether this is an action ex contractu, the doubt will disappear upon reading the Spinks Case, supra, and the authorities cited.

There is an important and vital point of difference between the instant case and that of Freeman v. Macon Gas & Water Co., 126 Ga. 843, 56 S. E. 61, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 917. In the latter case it was held that the petition as amended set forth a cause of action sounding in tort, and the particular tort there alleged was a willful breach by the defendant company of a public duty which it owed to the plaintiff as a consumer of the water it undertook to supply to the inhabitants of the city. The contract was merely alleged by way of inducement for the purpose of establishing the nature and scope of the duty and liability of the company relatively to the general public. And the corporation against which the suit was brought was in the exercise of a franchise granted by the municipality pursuant to a statute, which conferred upon it the right to use the streets of the city on condition that it would therein lay its mains and furnish the municipality and its inhabitants with a supply of water at a fixed toll. In the case at bar the defendant is not shown to have owed the plaintiff any duty independent of the contract with him. So far as it appears from the record, the defendant company was not in the exercise of any franchise granted by the municipality, nor was it in any way obligated to serve the public at large, nor the plaintiff as a member thereof.

The plaintiff's action being one ex contractu, as we have seen, upon proof of a breach thereof he would be entitled to at least nominal damages; but in order to recover substantial, compensatory damages, such as were awarded in the present case by the jury, there must be some evidence of actual damages, and the amount thereof. It is even admitted in the brief of counsel that there is no evidence showing that there were "any damages sustained in money," and, that being true, the plaintiff has failed entirely to carry the onus of proving the amount of his damages; a burden which the law imposes upon the plaintiff in every such action as the present one. Clark v. Telegraph Co., 112 Ga. 633, 37 S. E. 870; Grier v. Ward, 23 Ga. 145; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Waxelbaum, 113 Ga. 1017, 39 S. E. 443, 56 L. R. A. 741.

ROBINSON-HUMPHREY CO. v. WILCOX COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 13, 1907.)

1. TRIAL—DISMISSAL—DISCRETION OF JUDGE.

As a general rule it is better that the judge should not suggest to counsel how to try their cases; but, if the plaintiff's petition alleges such facts as to show that in law he is not in any event entitled to recover, it is not an abuse of discretion for the judge to raise the question and entertain the motion to dismiss the suit.

2. COUNTIES—CONTRACTS—ACTION FOR BREACH.

There is no authority of law for a county to enter into an executory contract for the sale of bonds which at the time of the contract the county is not authorized to issue. For a breach of such an undertaking an action for damages will not lie against the county.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Wilcox County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by the Robinson-Humphrey Company against Wilcox county. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Eldridge Cutts, D. B. Nicholson, and J. H. Gilbert, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Bankston, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. The plaintiff's petition as amended alleges that the plaintiff entered into a written contract with the county of Willcox by the terms whereof the county agreed to sell the plaintiff certain bonds at their face value, which the county contemplated issuing for the purpose of building a courthouse; that as evidence of good faith the plaintiff deposited with the treasurer of the county a certified check for $1,000; that it was contemplated by the parties that an election should be held, under authority of the state Constitution (Civ. Code 1895, § 5893), to determine whether bonds should issue; that the contract was to be binding only in the event there were a sufficient number of votes cast for bonds to authorize the issue. It was further contemplated that after the election the county should cause the bonds to be validated according to the statute (Van Epps' Code Supp. § 6074), and final delivery to be made for the agreed price, to be paid in cash; the purchaser furnishing at his own expense the bonds in blank, properly lithographed. An election was called, but before the day of the election there was a special meeting of the commissioners of roads and revenues of Wilcox county, called at the request of the plaintiff, which was attended by a representative of the plaintiff. At that meeting the commissioners determined not to comply with the written contract, and so notified the plaintiff. It was further alleged that afterwards the election was held, and that a sufficient number of votes in favor of the issue of bonds was cast at such election to authorize the commissioners to issue the bonds; that the plaintiff tendered the price which he agreed to pay for the bonds, and that the same was declined; that afterwards the county sold the bonds to another person at the same price at which the plaintiff had agreed to buy; that the bonds were worth to the plaintiff, on open market, $5,000 more than the price at which the county had contracted to sell; and that by reason of the failure to obtain the bonds the plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $5,000. The prayer was for a judgment for damages. There were also allegations to the effect that before the execution of the contract the county authorities had levied a special tax sufficient to pay for the courthouse, which was to be effective only in the event there was not sufficient votes cast at the contemplated bond election to authorize the issue of bonds. The court ruled that the contract made between the county and the plaintiff was void, and that the county incurred no liability to the plaintiff for a breach thereof. Exception was taken to that ruling and the question is here for review.

2. A county cannot incur a liability by a contract, unless it has statutory authority therefor. The authority may be express or implied—express, where the statute by express terms authorizes the contract; implied, where the statute makes no express reference to the contract, but authorizes certain things to be done, or raises certain duties, in the performance of which it is necessary to make a contract. There is no statutory authority, either express or implied, for the making of the contract involved in this case. The contract is executory for the sale of the bonds, which at the time were neither issued nor authorized to be issued. No election had been held under the provisions of Pol. Code, §§ 377-381. Nor had the bonds been validated under the provisions of Van Epps' Code Supp. § 6074. Under those conditions, the contemplated bonds were not authorized to be sold. It could not from any standpoint be said that the commissioners at that time were under duty or necessity of making such a contract. If the commissioners were without authority to contract in the manner indicated, it follows that their effort was futile, and no liability in damages against the county would arise by reason of a failure to perform. Nor does it affect the case that the commissioners had levied a tax (to be collected under certain conditions) for the purpose of raising funds to construct a courthouse. There was no relation between the contract in question and the tax levy. The tax levy could not raise a duty or necessity to sell the bonds. The tax levy may have been important, if the contract had been for the building of the courthouse, but not so where the contract is for the sale of bonds.

DYKES et al. v. JONES et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 12, 1907.)

PARTITION—SALE—PETITION TO SET ASIDE—PROCESS—APPEARANCE.

The application to set aside the partition sale contained allegations sufficient to render it an equitable petition, good as against a general demurrer, to set aside the sale for fraud on the part of those conducting the sale and the bidders who became purchasers thereat. That the petition contained no prayer for process, and that no process was attached thereto, were defects which might have worked dismissal upon proper motion; but, no motion to dismiss upon those grounds having been made, these defects were cured by the defendant's appearing and pleading.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 38, Partition, §§ 365, 367; vol. 39, Pleading, § 1355.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Pulaski County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by W. H. Jones and O. H. Jones against Dollie Dykes and others to partition certain real estate. After partition and sale, defendants filed objections, and prayed that the same be set aside. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the petition, Dykes and another bring error. Reversed.

W. H. Jones and O. H. Jones filed their application for partition of certain lands in Pulaski county. The petition alleges that because of improvements on the land a just and equitable division by metes and bounds is impracticable, and prays for the sale of the lands. The plaintiffs in error, Dykes and Mullis, were minors interested in the lands, and the court appointed a guardian ad litem to represent them, who accepted the appointment and filed a written consent that the lands be sold as prayed for in the petition. Before passing the order for sale, the court heard proof that all the parties at interest had been duly notified of the application for partition; and, as no objections were made, the sale was ordered, and three commissioners were appointed to conduct it. The land was sold by said commissioners at public sale, and purchased by W. H. Jones and O. H. Jones. After the sale had been made, Dykes and Mullis, by their next friends, filed certain "objections" to the sale and to the partition proceedings, and prayed that the sale be set aside and declared null and void, and that the order for such sale be set aside and revoked. There was no prayer for process, and no process was served upon the opposite parties; but at the hearing W. H. Jones and O. H. Jones, the guardian ad litem, and the commissioners who conducted said sale appeared and demurred generally to the "objections." The court sustained the demurrer and refused to hear evidence in support of the objections urged by Dykes and Mullis. To this ruling they excepted.

W. L. & Warren Grice, for plaintiffs in error. J. B. Mitchell and Fort & Grice, for defendants in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above)
1. The application to set aside the sale made under the order of the judge upon the partition proceedings is certainly open to the criticism, made upon it by counsel for the defendants in error, that it is "unusual in form." It is divided into 24 paragraphs, and these paragraphs are by the pleader characterized as "objections to certain partition proceedings." It is unnecessary to discuss these objections in detail. It appears upon a reading of them that the objections embraced in paragraphs Nos. 1-16 are either entirely immaterial, or that they seek to attack the order or judgment of the court ordering the sale for defects and irregularities in the proceedings which were amendable and cured by the judgment, and which cannot be urged after judgment by parties who had been served with due and legal notice before the filing of the application for partition, but that portions of the objections embraced in the paragraphs not referred to above contain allegations sufficient in substance to render it an equitable petition, ancillary to the motion to set aside the sale of the lands referred to, and therefore we feel authorized to refer to and treat these "objections," considered in their entirety as an equitable petition brought for the purpose of having said sale set aside. This conclusion is clearly justified by a brief statement of the substance of the petition as contained in paragraphs 17, 22, 23, and 24, wherein it is alleged, in substance, that no effort was made by those in charge of the sale to get the highest price for the land, but everything was done to enable the petitioners in the partition proceedings to purchase it below its value; that the purchasers of the land, who were also the petitioners in the partition proceedings, went to prospective purchasers before the sale and requested them not to bid for the land, telling them that the heirs had agreed to buy it, and wanted to get it as cheaply as they could; and that by reason of "these false and fraudulent statements purchasers were deterred from bidding, and the land was sold * * * for $1,560, when it was worth at least $2,500, and would have brought that sum if competition had been fair, and no effort had been made to stifle the bidding."

Whether the allegations of fraud on the part of the defendants in error, and of their acts and doings, which are alleged to have been a fraud upon the rights of the plaintiffs in error, are sufficiently definite and clear to have withstood an attack by special demurrer, it is unnecessary for us to decide, inasmuch as no such attack was made. If this criticism, "Nor do the allegations of paragraph 23 clearly and distinctly allege fraud," was intended as a special demurrer, it is itself too indefinite and general to be available for the purpose intended. The demurrer to so much of these objections as constitute an ancillary equitable petition being general, it is only necessary for us to decide whether or not that petition contains "good matter for equity to deal with." If it does, then it follows that this general demurrer should have been overruled, and the petition retained, and the petitioners given an opportunity to sustain their allegations by evidence, if they can produce it. It was said in the case of Herndon v. Gibson, 38 S. C. 357, 17 S. E. 145, 20 L. R. A. 545, 37 Am. St. Rep. 765, that "the prevention of bidding at a master's sale on foreclosure, by the mortgagor's announcement of an intention to bid for herself, and of the fact that she was a widow dependent upon the land for support, will require the sale to be set aside, although there was no misrepresentation or concealment of facts." And in the note to the above case in 20 L. R. A. 545, it is said: "The general principle of law applied to all sales at auction is that any act of the auctioneer, or of the party selling, or of third parties, as purchasers, which prevents a fair, free, and open sale, or which diminishes competition, and stifles or chills the sale, is contrary to public policy, and renders the sale null and void." See, also, 17 Am. Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 980; Van Dyke v. Martin, 53 Ga. 221; Barnes v. Mays, 88 Ga. 696, 16 S. E. 67. As was said by the Supreme Court of Missouri, in a case where it was decided that a partition sale should be set aside because of improper acts and practices upon the part of the purchasers: "It is of importance that these sales in partition should be preserved free from all influences which may depreciate the value of the land sold. Such sales rarely take place but where infants are interested and they are too frequently prompted by a desire to obtain their inheritance, and that, too, at a sacrifice. Under such circumstances, courts cannot be too vigilant in guarding every avenue to improper practices in conducting them." Wooten v. Hinkle, 20 Mo. 290. This is wholesome doctrine; and we hold in the present case that the equitable petition, which charges that the purchasers of the land "went to prospective purchasers before the sale and requested them not to bid for the land," and, by falsely and fraudulently representing that "the heirs had agreed, to buy it, and wanted to get it as cheaply as they could, deterred such prospective purchasers from bidding at the sale," and thereby caused the land to bring less than its real value, and less than it would have brought "if no effort had been made to stifle the bidding," was good as against a general demurrer, and that the petitioners should have been allowed to submit evidence in support of their contentions.

2. As this petition originally stood, there appears one fatal defect, which would have prevented the court from entertaining it as an equitable petition brought for the purpose stated; and that is, there was no process nor prayer for process. But this defect was cured by the action of the defendants in error themselves, by appearing and pleading; for, upon the call of the case for the purpose of disposing of the objections, they appeared and demurred generally thereto. "Demurring generally to the plaintiff's petition is pleading to the merits. * * * The omission of a prayer for process is amendable, and is waived by appearance and pleading." Lyons v. Planters' Loan & Savings Bank, 86 Ga. 485, 12 S. E. 882, 12 L. R. A. 155. "The absence of process is immaterial, where the defendants have appeared and demurred generally to the merits of the petition." Savannah Ry. Co. v. Atkinson, 94 Ga. 780, 21 S. E. 1010.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

1. RAILROADS—ACCIDENT AT CROSSING—INSTRUCTIONS.

Upon a careful consideration of the charge of the court and the several requests to charge which were refused, we do not think there was any error in refusing to grant a new trial upon the exceptions thereto urged in the motion for new trial.

Fish, C. J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Henry County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by H. G. North against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. F. Wall and Hall & Cleveland, for plaintiff in error. Arnold & Arnold, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. The main inquiry is upon the general grounds. The homicide of the plaintiff's husband, committed about 1 o'clock in the afternoon by the servants of the defendant in the operation of its locomotives, cars, and other machinery, was proved by a witness who was walking along Church street, going in the direction of the crossing upon which the deceased was killed, and who was about 125 feet from the place of the catastrophe, but did not see the plaintiff's husband until he was struck, and knocked about 30 or 40 feet up into the railroad cut, while the train was running at a high rate of speed. The plaintiff then proved her relation to deceased, and his physical condition and earning capacity, and rested. This made a prima facie case. It was attempted to overcome the prima facie case, and defeat a recovery altogether, by proving that the injury was the result of the negligence of the plaintiff's husband. Civ. Code 1895, § 2322. The defendant's evidence was focused upon this contention. In order to sustain this defense the burden of proof was upon the defendant to make it affirmatively appear that the injury was the result of the negligence of the plaintiff's husband. The jury found against the defendant; and if it appears that there was any plausible theory, arising either out of a conflict of evidence or an insufficiency of evidence offered in support of the plea, upon which the verdict could have been rendered, it is our duty to decline to interfere with the discretion of the court below in refusing to grant a new trial.

The witness Lyons testified, without contradiction, that when the train was "away up the road," in his opinion about 1½ miles away, and when he and the plaintiff's husband were about 150 yards away from the crossing, he heard the whistle of the engine and asked plaintiff's husband what train it was, and was informed that it was the "fast train"; the plaintiff's husband saying that he had been informed, earlier during the day, that it was an hour or two late. Lyons testified, further, that as they walked on he heard a repetition of whistles from the engine and noise of the train, and finally came in full view of the train as he started to leave the awning, and was in full view of the train when he stopped in the street half way between the sidewalk and the crossing; that he then called Dr. North's attention to the approaching train, touched him, and said, "Doc, let us stop here until the train passes"; that "he paused a little bit, and walked on off," without making any answer to Lyons, or indicating in any other way that he did or did not hear the warnings or see the train. After reaching the spur track on the north side of the crossing, Lyons said North jumped over a little mudhole between the rails and then started in a run diagonally across the tracks, and kept running until he was struck. After he commenced to run, Lyons commenced to call to him, loud enough, he thought, to be heard; but North paid no attention to him. While Lyons may have heard and seen the train, and may have addressed Dr. North in the manner indicated, it does not affirmatively appear that North either saw or heard the train, or heard the suggestion of Lyons to stop and let the train pass. The circumstances were such that the jury could have found that he did hear and see, but not such as to demand such finding. It will not be presumed that North was negligent. The presumptions are the other way. His conduct upon leaving Lyons in the street was consistent with either having seen the train or heard the warning, or with not having seen or heard. Whether he did, or not, was for the jury, and it is sufficient to support the finding of the jury upon that point that one view of the evidence was consistent with the finding. Lyons and North were followed along the street by Donnehue, who was about 50 yards behind them, and, according to the maps introduced in evidence, had about as good opportunity to see and hear the train as Lyons and North had. Yet he testifies that he did not see or hear the train, or know it was coming, until it ran opposite him. Donnehue says there was a hard rain and wind blowing from the northeast, the direction from which the train was coming, and that North held his umbrella in such position as would have obstructed the view of the train. Donnehue also says that there were certain freight cars on the intermediate switch track, which for a part of the time would have obstructed the view. All of this was consistent with North's failure to see or hear the train. Lyons says that North approached the spur track in a walk, and immediately after jumping the mudhole between the rails of the spur track started in a run in a diagonal direction from the northeast to the southwest corner of the crossing, the point where he was killed. This course would have placed his back partly to the approaching train, and would have carried him in a straight line to the post office, right near the crossing. Lyons does not say that North saw the train when he started to run, or that he looked in the direction of the train. It may be that he was running to the post office for shelter from the rain, and unaware of the rapid approach of the train, or it may be that he was aware of the approach of the train and was running to get over before it reached the crossing. These were questions for the jury. If he was struck upon the crossing, where he had a right to be, without knowledge of immediate danger from the train, the case would not be at all extraordinary, and there would be ample precedent for a recovery. G. C. & N. Ry. Co. v. Matthews, 116 Ga. 424, 42 S. E. 771.

Under the peculiar surroundings of this case, the manner in which deceased went upon the crossing, and the speed of the train and its distance from the crossing at the time it is claimed that North left Lyons on the street and started towards the crossing, all are very important matters. Yet the defendant's witnesses are not entirely in harmony with respect to them. Sullivan, the telegraph operator, who was in his office, 150 or 200 yards distant from the crossing, testified substantially that he saw the two men together leave the awning and move towards the crossing. As the train came in sight they moved up closer to the crossing and stopped. As the train came still closer one of the men moved out and stopped again. He had an umbrella over him. He moved off further from the other man and looked towards the train, and as the train got very close to him he threw his umbrella over him and started on the track as fast as he could go, in a run. Donnehue, a witness for the plaintiff, who had followed North and Lyons up the street, testified that he saw North as he went towards the crossing, and that he was holding his umbrella down to avoid the wind and rain, and that he was just going in a "common walk." He did not see him stop or run at all. Lyons, the witness for the defendant, testified that they walked right out from the awning, and that he (Lyons) stopped, but that North "paused a little bit" and walked on without stopping, and that when he jumped the hole on the spur track he commenced to run and kept running. Lyons also testified: "When Dr. North left me on the final move, he did not stop until he got hit." Another witness for the defendant, Mr. Wells, testified that he saw the men from his front window at a distance, and said: "They crossed the walk and came to the middle of the street, and then Dr. North made a dash like he was going to run across ahead of the train." He does not seem to agree with Lyons that North walked to the spur track before commencing to run. Emerson, the engineer of the train, testified that he saw the two men before they separated. He says that when he first saw them they were within 40 feet of the track, and that he was 70 yards from the crossing. He says, further, that they were walking along leisurely, like they were going to walk a reasonable distance, and stopped within 30 feet of the track. "Mr. Lyons stopped plumb still, and Dr. North hesitated just a second, and stepped out 4 or 5 feet ahead of him, ducked his head down, drew his umbrella over between him and the engine, and started to run over." Lyons, though looking at North, did not remember seeing the umbrella used as Emerson relates, and places the train, at the time North left him in the street, at the old switch, about 600 or 700 yards from the crossing, which is quite different from the 70 yards, as related by the engineer. The engineer seems to differ with Donnehue, also, as to what was done with the umbrella and the manner in which North approached the crossing. If Donnehue was correct about the presence of the freight cars on the side track, it is altogether probable that the engineer did not have as good a view of North and Lyons while walking together, or of North after leaving Lyons, as he thought. Upon the whole, the evidence offered by the defendant was not so uncontradicted and convincing as to demand a finding that the plaintiff's husband knew of his danger at the time he went upon the track of the defendant. If the train was 600 or 700 yards off, as Lyons testified, and North went in a run from the spur track, and could not cross the main line, about 33 feet distant, before being struck by the approaching train, the speed must have been so great as to render it very questionable whether North could have saved himself after discovering, or after opportunity to discover, the existence of the defendant's negligence. While the train was more than 400 yards from the crossing, a recovery would not necessarily be defeated because the injured person did not anticipate that the defendant's servants would disobey the blow post law. Oomer v. Barfield, 102 Ga. 485, 31 S. E. 89.

Under the facts of this case, we think it is controlled by the reasoning in Williams v. Southern Ry. Co., 128 Ga. 710, 55 S. E. 948. In W. & A. R. Co. v. York, 128 Ga. —, 58 S. E. 183, there was a conflict of evidence as to whether the deceased knew of the near approach of the train, although, had he taken precaution to look, he could have seen the train 250 yards away and before walking on the track. As to whether, after the negligence of the defendant came into existence and was discoverable by the exercise of ordinary care, York by the exercise of ordinary care could have avoided the injury to himself, was the controlling question in the case. The jury having found in favor of the plaintiff, and the verdict having met the approval of the presiding judge, this court declines to interfere with the discretion of the trial court in refusing to grant a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except FISH, C. J., who dissents.

FISH, C. J. (dissenting). The positive and uncontradicted evidence, as set out in the record, to my mind conclusively shows that plaintiff's husband, miscalculating the time in which he could safely cross the railway company's track, ran on the same at a public crossing, immediately in front of a locomotive which he knew was rapidly approaching the crossing, and was struck by the locomotive and killed. His death was, therefore, directly attributable to his own negligence, and a verdict for the defendant was demanded, notwithstanding its negligence in violating the statute (Civ. Code 1895, § 2222) and a town ordinance regulating the speed of trains where the homicide occurred. See Hopkins' Pers. Inf. § 77; Central R. v. Smith, 78 Ga. 694, 3 S. E. 397; Southern Railway Co. v. Blake, 101 Ga. 217, 29 S. E. 288; Blake v. Southern Railway Co. 108 Ga. 764, 33 S. E. 396; Hopkins v. Southern Ry. Co., 110 Ga. 85, 35 S. E. 307; *Georgia R. By an affidavit of illegality a defendant may resist an execution, which has been issued against him upon the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage and levied upon the mortgaged property, upon the ground that the mortgage debt had been fully paid and satisfied before the execution was issued. #### 1. CRIMINAL LAW — MISTRIAL — FORMER JEOPARDY.

In a prosecution for a felony, the accused has the right to be present at every stage of the trial; and where the court in such a case, without the consent of the accused and during his enforced absence, he being confined in jail, ordered a mistrial because of the inability of the jury to agree, on a subsequent trial of the same case it was error, requiring a reversal, to strike a plea setting up such unauthorized mistrial and the former jeopardy of the accused.

The case of Lester v. State, 33 Ga. 329, wherein the decision, as applied to the facts, is contrary to the above ruling, being under review, is overruled.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fayette County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Footo Bagwell was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

Blalock & Culpepper and W. R. Daley, for plaintiff in error. O. H. B. Bloodworth, Sol. Gen., and Jno. C. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the State.

FISH, C. J. On his trial, under an indictment for murder, Footo Bagwell pleaded, in substance, that at a former term of the court he had been put on trial under the same indictment, and after the case had been submitted to the jury the court, without his consent and in his absence, he being at the time confined in jail, and in the absence of his counsel, discharged the jury without a verdict on the ground of their inability to agree. This plea was stricken on demurrer, to which ruling the accused excepted pendent lite. There was a verdict of guilty, with recommendation to life imprisonment. The case is before this court on writ of error sued out by the accused, assigning error upon his exceptions pendent lite and upon the overruling of his motion for a new trial.

"No person shall be put in jeopardy of life, or liberty, more than once for the same offense, save on his or her own motion for a new trial after conviction, or in case of mistrial." Const. art. 1, par. 8; Civ. Code 1895, § 5705. In Oliveros v. State, 120 Ga. 237, 47 S. E. 627, it was held, in effect, that a mistrial declared, not for legal cause, but, as in that case, erroneously, is a bar to another trial. And in Lovett v. State, 80 Ga. 255, 4 S. E. 912, Chief Justice Bleckley said: "It is not disputed that, where a mistrial has been properly declared, the prisoner may be again tried"—citing Nolan v. State, 55 Ga. 521, 21 Am. Rep. 281, and the Constitution of 1877, as above quoted. In Judge Bleckley's language there is a clear intimation that, where a mistrial has been improperly declared, the prisoner cannot be again tried. In this state it has been settled, as far back as Williford's Case in 23 Ga. 1, that the court may, over the objection of the accused, order a mistrial on account of the inability of the jury to agree, and that the discharge of the jury on that account does not amount to an acquittal. The question now before us is: Can the court, even for good cause, legally order a mistrial in the enforced absence of the accused and without his consent; and, if it cannot, has the accused, where a mistrial has been so ordered, been placed in jeopardy, which he may plead when again put on trial? It has been frequently held by this court that it is the right of the accused charged with a felony to be present at every stage of his trial, including his arraignment or waiver thereof (Wells v. Terrell, 121 Ga. 368, 49 S. E. 319), reading to the jury notes of the evidence taken by the court (Wade v. State, 12 Ga. 25), the argument of counsel for the state (Tiller v. State, 96 Ga. 430, 23 S. E. 825), during the charge of the court (Hopson v. State, 116 Ga. 90, 42 S. E. 412, and citations, Id.), and at the rendition of the verdict (Nolan v. State, 53 Ga. 137; 55 Ga. 521, 21 Am. Rep. 281; Barton v. State, 67 Ga. 653, 44 Am. Rep. 743).

In Wade's Case, supra, the court, after the jury had retired to consider the case, had them recalled to the courtroom and read over to them, in the absence of the accused, the written testimony as taken down by the court. In the opinion rendered Judge Warner said: "This was clearly error. The court has no more authority, under the law, to read over testimony to the jury, affecting the life or liberty of the defendant, in his absence, than it has to examine the witnesses in relation thereto in his absence. The defendant has not only the right to be confronted with his witnesses, but he has also the right to be present, and see and hear all the proceedings which are had against him on the trial before the court. It is said the presumption must be that the court read over the testimony correctly, and read over all that was delivered against the defendant, and therefore he was not injured. The answer is that it was the legal right and privilege of the defendant to have been present in court when this proceeding was had before the jury in relation to the testimony delivered against him, and he is to be considered as standing upon all his legal rights, waiving none of them." In Hopson v. State, supra, it was held: "Recalling a jury in a criminal case, who had retired to consider of their verdict, and, in the absence of the accused and his counsel, and without their consent, giving a second charge, is cause for a new trial, even though this charge be the same, in substance, as that which had been delivered in the first instance." Mr. Presiding Justice Lumpkin, in the opinion rendered in that case, said: "Nor does the fact that the 'recharge' was, in substance, the same as the original charge, dispense with the necessity for ordering a new trial. The great point is that the accused and his counsel have the right to be present at every stage of the proceedings and personally see and know what is being done in the case. To say that no injury results when it appears that what occurred in their absence was regular and legal would, in effect, practically do away with this great and important right, one element of which is to see to it that what does take place is in accord with law and good practice." In Oliveros v. State, supra, where the trial judge discharged the jury from the consideration of the case, because in giving his reasons for admitting certain evidence he expressed an opinion as to its effect and weight, this court held that such discharge was not authorized over the protest of the accused, and, when arraigned before a second jury, his plea of former jeopardy was good. Chief Justice Simmons said in that case: "But it is said, also, that it would have been a farce for the judge to have continued the trial after this expression of opinion, and consumed the time of the court and country in going on with a trial, when he knew that he would have to grant a new trial in case of conviction. That is a commercial argument, which amounts to nothing in the administration of law, especially when the life or liberty of a citizen is in danger."

In the case of State v. Willson, 50 Ind. 487, 19 Am. Rep. 719, it was held that where the court, on the trial of the accused for murder, discharged the jury because of their inability to agree, in the absence of the accused and without his consent, he being then confined in jail, such discharge might be pleaded in bar of further prosecution. Chief Justice Biddle, in the opinion rendered, said: "What the prisoner, in the case before us, if he had been present, might have offered to the court to show why the jury should not be discharged, or whether anything, indeed, it is impossible for us to know; but we are unwilling to adopt a rule which would deny him the right to offer whatever was in his power." This was followed by the Court of Appeals of Texas in Rudder v. State, 29 Tex. App. 262, 15 S. W. 717; it being there held that "It is beyond the legal authority of the trial court to discharge the jury in the absence of the accused." To the same effect are State v. Sommers, 60 Minn. 90, 61 N. W. 907, and Vela v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 95 S. W. 529. In State v. Vaughn, 29 Iowa, 286, and State v. White, 19 Kan. 445, 27 Am. Rep. 137, it was held that the discharge of the jury, in the enforced absence of the accused and without his consent, because of their inability to agree, is not a bar to his subsequent trial; for, while the accused has the right to be present when the jury is discharged for such cause, yet, if present, he could only object, and, since such objection would necessarily prove unavailing, no prejudice can result to him by reason of his absence.

In Lester v. State, 33 Ga. 329, the headnote is: "A discharge of the jury in a capital case, because they are unable to agree on a verdict, does not operate as an acquittal of the accused." In that case the point now under consideration was necessarily decided, although the fact that at the time the jury was discharged the accused was in jail and did not consent to such discharge was not mentioned in the opinion. The facts of that case, as they appear from the record of file in this court, were that during the June term, 1862, of Dougherty superior court, when Lester was put upon trial for murder, he pleaded that at the December term, 1861, of that court, "he was put upon his trial upon the same bill of indictment and the same accusation, a jury was impaneled, and the cause fully submitted, but the jury was discharged by the court from the consideration of said case, after retiring to their room to make up a verdict, without his consent thereto; he being in jail at the time, and without knowledge of the act." This plea was stricken on general demurrer, and Lester was convicted of manslaughter. Whether the plea was properly stricken was the only question dealt with by this court. All that was said in the opinion on the subject was: "We are clear that the decision of the court below was right. Whenever the jury in a criminal case like this is discharged by the court from the further consideration of the cause, because of the impossibility of the jury's agreeing on a verdict, or on account of illness of a juror, the prisoner, or the court, such discharge is an absolute necessity, and does not and cannot operate as an acquittal of the accused." Cases were cited, among them Williford v. State, 23 Ga. 3. The court then said that the case of Reynolds v. State, 3 Ga. 53, had no analogy to the one under consideration. Lester's Case is now under review. After a very careful consideration of the question involved, we are of opinion that the better view, both on authority and principle, is that the court cannot legally order a mistrial in a case of this character, in the enforced absence of the accused and without his consent, because of the inability of the jury to agree on a verdict, and that, where a mistrial is so ordered, the accused, on a subsequent trial, may plead former jeopardy. The ruling in Lester's Case, supra, contrary to this conclusion, is therefore overruled, and the judgment striking the plea in the present case is reversed.

It is unnecessary to deal with the assignments of error in the motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

GODWIN v. GODWIN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 10, 1907.)

1. WILLS—PROBATE OF COPY.

There is no law for probating a copy of a will, except where the will has been lost or destroyed after the death of the testator, or without his consent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, § 514.]

2. SAME—PETITION FOR PROBATE.

Where a petition was filed in the court of ordinary of one county, which on its face did not purport to offer the original will for probate, but affirmatively showed that the will had been propounded in the court of ordinary of another county by the person named as executor, and did not show that the proceedings thus begun had been terminated, or that the court in which the original will was propounded had been determined to be without jurisdiction, the petition was demurrable.

3. SAME—JURISDICTION—RESIDENCE OF DECEASED.

The residence of the testator at the time of his death gives jurisdiction to the ordinary of that county to probate his will. A legatee cannot have it probated in another county merely because the property devised is in the latter county and all of the parties in interest reside there.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Grady County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Application of Bedie Godwin for the probate of a will. W. B. Godwin contested the probate. From a judgment refusing to probate the will, petitioner brings error. Affirmed.

Bedie Godwin presented to the ordinary of Grady county a petition alleging as follows: Mary C. Godwin died on January 19, 1905, leaving an estate disposed of by will; petitioner being a legatee therein. The will has been offered for probate in common form in the court of ordinary of Decatur county by W. B. Godwin, who is named as executor, and all of the parties at interest are residents of that county. The petitioner desires the will to be probated in solemn form, and prays that citation issue and that the will be probated. A copy of the will is attached.

A demurrer was filed on the grounds that the petition had only a purported copy of the will attached, with no facts shown which would authorize the establishment of a copy of the lost or destroyed original; because no statement of facts was made which would authorize the use of an established copy, if such copy existed; and because the original will has been propounded by the executor named therein for probate in the court of ordinary of Decatur county. The ordinary sustained the demurrer, and an appeal was taken to the superior court, where other grounds of demurrer were added, to the effect that the petition was not accompanied by the original will, that no properly authenticated copy of the probated will was attached to the petition, and that the will had been offered for probate in the court of ordinary of Decatur county, and was not, therefore, within the jurisdiction of the courts of Grady county. Objection was made to this amended demurrer, on the ground that it was not an amendment, but a new demurrer, and could not be made on appeal. The objection was overruled, the demurrer was sustained, and Bedie Godwin excepted.

A. E. Thornton and J. O. Smith, for plaintiff in error. M. L. Ledford, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The bill of exceptions recites that the defendant offered an amended demurrer, to which objection was taken, but that the court overruled the objection and allowed the amendment; and, while the added demurrer did not in express terms state that it was an amendment, it was presented to the presiding judge as such, and allowed. But it is unnecessary to deal with the pleadings with technical nicety. Whether the original demurrer be considered alone (omitting some of it which is objectionable as "speaking"), or whether it is considered in connection with the amendment, which developed the grounds of the demurrer more clearly, in either event the court did right to dismiss the petition for probate. There is no law for probating a copy of a will, except in cases of establishing a will lost or destroyed after the death of the testator, or without his consent. Civ. Code 1895, § 3289. Here the petition showed on its face that the will was not lost or destroyed, but had been offered for probate in another county by the executor named therein. If the court where the executor offered the will for probate was without jurisdiction, the proper proceeding would have been to make that point and have it adjudicated. If the objection was well founded, and was determined in favor of the objector, the will could be tendered for probate in the proper county. But while proceedings were pending in one county, or after the merits had been there adjudicated, the law furnishes no authority for probating a copy of the will in another county.

Moreover, the petition shows no jurisdiction in Grady county. It alleges that the property devised by the will is situated in Grady county, and that all parties at interest reside there; but it fails to show the jurisdictional fact that the testator resided there at the time of her death. Civ. Code 1895, § 3279. Grady county was created in 1906. A portion of the territory included in it was taken from Decatur county. But the larger part of Decatur county was left unaffected, including the county site. It was not alleged that the testatrix resided, at the time of her death, in that part of Decatur county which was cut off and became a part of the new county; nor was any transfer of the case pending in Decatur county sought to be made to the proper court of the new county. A party in interest cannot oust a court of its jurisdiction, and transfer a case to another court which has no jurisdiction, at his mere option, by filing a petition in the latter court.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

2. SAME.

Under the circumstances above recited, the general rule that the right to set up the defense of the statute of limitations is a personal privilege did not prevent other creditors from contesting the claim of one who was seeking to obtain judgment and payment of a note barred by the statute of limitations.

3. SAME—NECESSITY OF PLEA.

Where the creditor who held such a note was made a party defendant, and in his answer set out the note which he sought to have paid, and which appeared on its face to be barred by the statute of limitations, but the creditor alleged that the claim was relieved from the bar by reason of certain acknowledgments or new promises, on the hearing before the auditors it was not necessary for the other creditors, in order to contest such claim, to file a plea setting up the statute of limitations.

4. SAME—NOTE.

Under the evidence the finding of the auditor, approved by the presiding judge, to the effect that the note was barred, was not without support, and will not necessitate a reversal.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Bartow County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action between H. I. Pendley and H. M. Powers and others. From the judgment, Pendley brings error. Affirmed.

Jas. B. Conyers, for plaintiff in error. Thos. W. Milner & Sons, Paul F. Akin, Joe M. Moon, T. C. Milner, G. H. Aubrey, J. T. Norris, and John W. & Paul F. Akin, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. Pendley had a promissory note against Harris, deceased. On its face it appeared to be barred by the statute of limitations. Under a bill to wind up the administration a receiver was appointed, and Pendley, who was one of the defendants, in his answer set up that he was entitled to a judgment and to share in the distribution. He sought to avoid the effect of the bar of the statute by reason of certain acknowledgments, which he claimed to exist from the receipts, entries, and a memorandum, which claim was set forth in his pleading. The auditor to whom the case was referred held that the note was barred by the statute of limitations. On exception the judge of the superior court sustained this finding, and this is the error assigned. Three questions arise in this case: (1) Was the right to set up the defense of the statute of limitations a personal privilege, which was confined to the administrator of the deceased maker of the note; or could it be set up by another creditor of the insolvent estate? (2) Was it necessary for the plaintiffs, who brought the petition under which the receiver was appointed and the reference to the auditor had, to file a regular plea setting up the bar of the statute of limitations; or could they, when Pendley sought to relieve the note from the effect of the statute by allegation and proof as to acknowledgments or new promises, contest the question of whether such relief had been effected, in connection with the determination of the debts against the estate and their legal priority? (3) Under the evidence was the finding of the auditor, approved by the presiding judge, that the note was barred, erroneous?

1, 2. It is well recognized as a general rule that the right to plead the statute of limitations to a suit is a personal privilege. A plea is the ordinary mode of setting up the defense. In some jurisdictions, although the note or cause of action sued on may appear on the face of the plaintiff's pleading to be barred by the statute of limitations, this is not a good ground for a demurrer; and it has there been held that the defense should be set up by plea, and, if this is done, a claim that the bar has not attached, by reason of a new promise, is then a matter of replication. In Georgia the practice of filing a replication by the plaintiff has been abolished. He sets out his cause of action, the defendant answers, and this makes the issue, without replication. From this difference in practice, doubtless, have arisen certain differences in rulings. In this state, if the petition of the plaintiff shows on its face that the cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations, advantage may be taken of it by demurrer. Lang v. Camp, 113 Ga. 1011, 39 S. E. 474; 9 Michie's Dig. 88. If the plaintiff desires to show that he is within any exception to the statute, it is incumbent on him to state it in his petition. This has long been held in equity cases. Worthy v. Johnson, 8 Ga., 236 (12). And under our present system of pleading it is equally true in common-law cases. Martin v. Broach, 6 Ga. 21 (6), 50 Am. Dec. 306; Jesup v. Epping, 66 Ga. 334. But the new promise may be added by amendment to the petition. Shumate v. Ryan, 127 Ga. 118, 56 S. E. 103. The present case is within the equitable jurisdiction of the court.

Without discussing at present the mode of procedure, the rule that the right to set up the defense of the statute of limitations is a personal privilege is not to be limited to a narrow and literal construction; or, if so, it is not without exceptions. An administrator or executor may plead the statute of limitations as to a liability of the decedent, a transferee may set up the defense when it is sought to subject the property transferred to him, and other instances might be cited. Where an insolvent estate has been placed in the hands of a receiver for administration and distribution, each creditor is interested to see that only existing claims against the deceased share in the distribution. The administrator, who is no longer in possession or control of the estate, which has been taken in charge by the court, cannot be allowed to favor one creditor and prejudice another by pleading the statute of limitations as to some claims and not as to others, and denying to the interested creditors the right to make the defense, on the ground that it is a personal privilege. It may sometimes be his duty on behalf of the estate to raise the point; but, if he does not do so, creditors may avail themselves of the statute as to their claims. It has been said that a creditor who comes in under the original bill cannot attack the claim on which it was founded as barred. But that question is not involved here. The rule as to usury is similar. The plea is a personal privilege; but creditors of an insolvent estate may set it up against other creditors who seek to lessen the common fund by claiming usury. Pope v. Solomons, 36 Ga. 545; Stone v. Georgia Loan Co., 107 Ga. 524, 530, 33 S. E. 861. In Shewen v. Vanderhorst, 1 Russ. & Myl. 347, it was held that "under the common decree in an administration suit," where the executors refused to set up the bar of the statute of limitations to a debt, a residuary legatee could do so. It was said that "it was competent for the plaintiff, or any other party interested in the fund, to take advantage of the statute before the master, notwithstanding the refusal of the executors." "The common decree," or, as it is also referred to in some cases, "the usual decree," in creditors' bills against an executor or administrator, was (to use the common Latin expression) "quod computet"; that is to say, it directed the master to take the accounts between the deceased and his creditors, and to cause the creditors, upon due public notice, to come before him to prove their debts, and to take an account of the personal estate of the deceased to be applied on payment of the debts and other charges in a due course of administration. In McCartney v. Tyrer, 94 Va. 198, 26 S. E. 419, it was held that any creditor interested in the fund might interpose the bar of the statute of limitations. Werdenbaugh v. Reid, 20 W. Va. 588; 1 Story's Equity Jur. (13th Ed.) § 548; Woodyard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 211 (7).

3. Under the English equity procedure, after the common decree had been entered and the case had been referred to a master, the practice was not entirely uniform as to the extent of the proof required of persons filing claims. Where one creditor desired to set up the bar of the statute of limitations against the claim of another, no very strict pleading appears to have been required. 1 Daniell's Chan. Pl. & Pr. *655; 2 Daniell's Chan. Pl. & Pr. *1210; Green v. Snead, 30 Beav. 231; Woodyard v. Polsley, supra. It is not necessary in this case to go to the extent of adopting in full the English practice before the master. Pendley, as a person claiming to be a creditor of the decedent, was made a defendant to the original petition. He set out his claim in his answer. On its face it was barred by the statute of limitations, unless relieved therefrom by reason of acknowledgments or new promises. He alleged and undertook to prove that it was so relieved from the bar. The whole case was referred to an auditor for a proper accounting and report. Pendley, therefore, went before the auditor, undertaking to show that he had a claim which was apparently barred, but which, for certain reasons, was not really so. The other creditors could contest this fact; and there was no necessity for a formal plea by them setting up the statute of limitations. In Willis v. Sutton, 116 Ga. 283, 42 S. E. 526, it was held that where an action was brought upon an administrator's bond, and he filed a plea setting up that there was existing, at the time of the death of his intestate, a partnership between him and the defendant, and seeking to discharge himself as administrator from liability on account of demands which he had as surviving partnier against the estate of his deceased partner, the plaintiff could reply to the claim so set up that the items thereof were barred by the statute of limitations, without filing a written plea to that effect, when there was no order requiring such plea to be in writing.

4. Under the evidence on the subject of the note held by Pendley, was the finding of the auditor, which was approved by the presiding judge, so erroneous as to require a reversal by this court? In the early case of Martin v. Broach, 6 Ga. 21, 50 Am. Dec. 306, it was held that "an acknowledgment or promise, to take a case out of the statute of limitations, must specify or plainly refer to the particular debt, or demand, or cause of action which is sought to be revived." And this ruling has since been followed. Sedgwick v. Gerding, 55 Ga. 264; Dobson v. Dickson, 62 Ga. 639; Gartrell v. Linn, 79 Ga. 701, 4 S. E. 918; Paille v. Plant, 109 Ga. 247, 34 S. E. 274; Kirven v. Thornton, 110 Ga. 276, 34 S. E. 848. In Walker v. Griggs, 32 Ga. 119, the headnotes state that: "Where the promise relied on refers to notes generally, without specifying amounts, dates, etc., the promise is insufficient. If the plaintiff, to identify the note sued upon as the subject of the written promise, introduces other proof which fails to satisfy the jury on this point, this court will not interfere to control their finding, although the court may be of the opinion that the aliunde testimony preponderated against the conclusion of the jury." Under these rulings, the auditor might well have found that the note held by Pendley was not relieved from the bar of the statute of limitations. The entries of credits upon it were unsigned, and not shown to have been in the handwriting of the debtor. The receipts which were relied on as acknowledgments or new promises were found among the papers of the decedent. They were signed by Pendley, the payee, although the body of some of them were in the handwriting of Harris, the maker of the note now sought to be enforced. They refer only in a vague way to the receipt by Pendley from Harris of certain amounts "on note," and one of them "as credit on his note." It does not appear whether there had been any other note or notes made by Harris to Pendley. The calculation which was introduced to aid in the identification does not coincide accurately with what Pendley claimed to be due on the note now brought forward. The evidence of the witness by whom it was sought to identify the receipts with the note and the calculation was quite uncertain and showed differences between him and Pendley in regard to the amount due. Upon the whole we cannot say that there was any error in the finding which requires a reversal.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

(122 Ga. 176)

McSWAIN et al. v. RICKETSON, Sheriff, et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1907.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ALLOWANCE TO WIDOW.

A return of appraisers setting apart a year's support, which does not purport to embrace the entire estate of the decedent, but merely designated items of property, which contains, as one item, the following: "175 acres of land, more or less, of lot of land No. 49 in the 6th district"—is, as to such item, too vague and uncertain to be capable of enforcement.

2. JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA.

Where a mother and her children are in possession of a tract of land, which was the property of a deceased husband and father at the time of his death, a judgment in a proceeding to eject the mother as an intruder is not binding upon the children, when it appears that they are not her tenants, do not claim under her, but are asserting, independently of her, their title as heirs at law of their deceased father.

3. ESTOPPEL—ACCEPTANCE OF BENEFITS—KNOWLEDGE.

The judge erred in not granting the injunction as prayed for.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Coffee County; T. A. Parker, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth McSwain and others against David Ricketson, sheriff, and another. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Elizabeth McSwain and others brought a petition in equity against Ricketson, sheriff, and J. J. Jowers, alleging that the plaintiffs were the children and heirs at law of Elijah Jowers, four of them being sui juris, and five of them being minors; that their father died seised and possessed of 150 acres of land, situated on the west side of lot No. 49 in the Sixth district of Coffee county, Ga., known as the "home place" of Elijah Jowers; that there was no necessity for administration upon his estate, and no administration was had; that plaintiffs are in possession of the land; that in 1906 J. J. Jowers made an affidavit to eject Sarah Jowers, their mother, from the land as an intruder; that she filed a counter affidavit, and the papers were returned to court, and, the defendant not appearing, judgment was entered that a writ issue directing the sheriff to dispossess the defendant; that in 1907, under such writ, Sarah Jowers was dispossessed; that since that time J. J. Jowers has insisted that the plaintiffs be also dispossessed under the writ, and the sheriff has stated that, unless restrained by law, he will dispossess them. It is alleged that, unless the sheriff is enjoined, the plaintiffs will be dispossessed and irreparably damaged. The prayers of the petition were that J. J. Jowers and the sheriff be enjoined from interfering with the possession of plaintiffs, for general relief, and for process. By amendment it was alleged that, if the plaintiffs were dispossessed, they would be forced to get homes, either by renting or purchasing, elsewhere, and if J. J. Jowers is placed in possession he will cut the timber, and such conduct on his part will be a continuing trespass, and work irreparable damage, and cause a multiplicity of suits. The answer of J. J. Jowers denied that three of the plaintiffs, who were sui juris, were in possession. It admitted the averments as to the suing out of the warrant to eject Sarah Jowers as an intruder, and the proceedings thereafter following, and also admitted that it was the purpose of the defendant to cause the sheriff to dispossess the plaintiffs, but denied the averments in reference to the irreparable damages. In the answer to the amendment the defendant averred that all of the timber suitable for sawmill and cross-tie purposes, as well as cypress timber, had been cut off the land, and that the timber thereon was not sufficient for plantation purposes, and that the plaintiffs were, notwithstanding, selling and cutting the same. The defendant J. J. Jowers also filed a demurrer, alleging that the plaintiffs had an adequate remedy at law and that there was no equity in their bill.

At the hearing it was established by evidence that Sarah Jowers had been dispossessed in the manner described in the petition. The evidence was conflicting as to whether some of the plaintiffs, who were sui juris, were in possession; but there seems to have been no conflict as to the fact that the minors were in possession of the land. The defendants offered in evidence a certified copy of the proceedings before the ordinary of Coffee county setting apart a year's support to Sarah Jowers out of the estate of her husband. The return of the commissioners did not purport to set apart the entire estate, but certain property was set apart by description. One item of the return was in the following language: "175 acres of land, more or less, of lot of land No. 49 in the 6th district." The plaintiffs objected to this evidence for various reasons, among them being that the description of the land therein was so vague and indefinite that no title or right passed under the judgment setting apart the year's support, so far as it related to the land. The evidence also disclosed various transactions between Sarah Jowers and J. J. Jowers, in which she seems to have dealt with the land in controversy as if it was her own property and she had a right to sell and convey the same. It appeared from the evidence that the land in controversy was all of the land owned by Elijah Jowers at the time of his death. There was evidence tending to establish that, in the different transactions with J. J. Jowers, Sarah Jowers was attempting to secure a more suitable home for herself and her minor children; but it does not appear that the minor children had directly received any benefit from these transactions. On the contrary, there was positive evidence that no part of the consideration of the deed from Sarah Jowers to J. J. Jowers was used either for the support of herself or her minor children. There was evidence that a part of the consideration of the deed was the payment of a mortgage made by Elijah Jowers in his lifetime upon a mule, which was also set apart as a year's support. The judge refused the injunction so far as it sought to restrain the sheriff from dispossessing the plaintiffs, and granted it so far as to restrain the defendant from cutting the timber on the land in controversy. The plaintiffs excepted.

Lankford & Dickerson, for plaintiffs in error. O. A. Ward and F. Willis Dart, for defendants in error.

COBB, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. Land may be set apart as a year's support, and the effect of the judgment is to vest the widow with such title or interest in the land that she may, in order to raise money for the purpose for which the year's support is set aside, convey the same in her own name and divest all interest of herself and her minor children therein. The judgment setting apart the year's support being, in effect, a conveyance to her of the interest of her deceased husband in the property, the description of the property must be such as to render it capable of identification. If the description is so vague and indefinite that the property cannot be identified, the title to the estate is not divested by the judgment setting apart the year's support. That certainty which is required in a deed or other conveyance is also required in a judgment setting apart a year's support, certainly so far as land is concerned. If the judgment now in question had purported on its face to have set apart all of the property, or all of the lands, of the deceased, parol evidence would have been admissible to show what lands were owned by the deceased. But there is nothing in the judgment to indicate that it was the intention of the commissioners to set apart the entire estate. They dealt with the property intended to be covered by items, certain articles of personal property being designated, and then what purports to be a description of a tract of land is inserted. The title to the estate is not divested, unless this description is sufficient to identify the land. The only description is 175 acres, more or less, in a lot of a given number in a given district. It does not appear, from the description, in what county the land is located, nor, so far as that is concerned, in what state. It might be inferred that it is in the state of Georgia; but can we infer that it was necessarily in Coffee county? The law does not require that a year's support should be set apart in the county in which the land is located. The year's support is set apart in the county in which the decedent died, and the property set apart may be located in another county. And, even if it be conceded that lot No. 49 in the sixth district of Coffee county was referred to, what portion of that lot is set apart? Even the number of acres is not definitely stated. The words of indefiniteness, "more or less," are used. The shape of the tract is not referred to, nor can it be, by any implication arrived at. If the description had been a definite number of acres in a given corner of the lot, the land could have been identified. Payton v. McPhaul, 128 Ga. —, 58 S. E. 50. The description of the land was so vague and indefinite that the judgment setting apart the year's support, so far as this item was concerned, was absolutely void. Luttrell v. Whitehead, 121 Ga. 699, 49 S. E. 691; Lee v. English, 107 Ga. 152, 33 S. E. 39. This case is distinguished from the case of Moore v. Moore, 126 Ga. 735, 55 S. E. 950, and the cases there followed, for the reason that the return of the appraisers did not purport to set apart the entire estate.

2. The children of Sarah Jowers were not parties to the proceeding to eject her as an intruder. They were not her tenants. They did not claim under her. Their claim of title rests upon ownership by their father at the time of his death. They were not bound by the dispossessory proceedings against their mother. The sheriff has no authority to dispossess them under that proceeding.

3. The judgment setting apart the year's support not having the effect to divest the title of the heirs, the transactions entered into by the mother, in which she dealt with the same as if she had acquired title in the proceeding setting apart the year's support, did not estop the heirs from asserting their title to the property, unless it appears that they have received some benefit from the transactions which she has entered into, with a full knowledge of the fact that she was dealing with their property. While there is evidence to indicate that the mother was looking after the interests of the minor children and seeking to acquire a more desirable home, it does not definitely appear that the minor children have received, directly or indirectly, any benefit from these transactions. Nor does it appear that the adult heirs have received any benefit therefrom. The evidence was not sufficient to make out a case of estoppel, either against the adult heirs or the minor children. The facts developed at the final hearing may show a different condition of affairs; but, so far as indicated by the present record, there was no estoppel upon any of the plaintiffs as to their right to assert their title as heirs at law to the land in controversy. There was a conflict of the evidence as to whether some of the adult heirs were in possession, but there was no dispute that the minor heirs were in possession of the property. They were rightfully in possession. J. J. Jowers has shown no right to dispossess them, and the judge should have granted the injunction as prayed for.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

TURNER v. NEWELL et al.

1. ERROR, WRIT OF—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—PARTIES.

Where, in a suit against two codefendants, the verdict and judgment is adverse to the defendants, and one of them makes a motion for a new trial which is overruled, the movant can except to the judgment overruling his motion and bring the case to the Supreme Court without making the other defendant a party to the bill of exceptions; and a failure to do so will not work a dismissal of the writ of error. Ruffin v. Paris, 75 Ga. 653; Jordan v. Gauden, 73 Ga. 181.

2. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS—VOLUNTARY DEED.

As a general rule equity will not, upon petition brought by the grantee in a voluntary deed, reform and correct the same. There are cases which constitute an exception to this rule, but the case at bar does not fall within the exceptions; and the general demurrer of the judgment creditor, whose judgment was obtained after the execution of the deed and before the filing of the petition to reform it, and who had been made codefendant with the grantor, should have been sustained.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Carroll County; R. W. Freeman, Judge.

Action by Fannie E. Newell, for herself and as next friend, against W. L. Newell and R. F. Turner. Judgment for plaintiff, and Turner brings error. Reversed.

Fannie E. Newell, for herself and as next friend for several named minor children, filed an equitable petition against W. L. Newell, the husband of petitioner, and R. F. Turner. The petition alleges that on the 31st day of March, 1899, W. L. Newell executed to petitioner and said minor children a deed to a certain tract of land, but that, owing to a mistake on the part of the scrivener, the land which was sought to be conveyed by the parties to the deed was not correctly described therein; that subsequently to the execution of the deed, and possession of the property by the plaintiff, W. L. Newell became indebted to R. F. Turner, and on the 24th day of July, 1902, the latter recovered a judgment against W. L. Newell upon said indebtedness, and, a fi. fa. having been issued upon said judgment on the 18th day of August, 1902, the same was levied upon the land claimed by plaintiff under the above-mentioned deed. Petitioner prayed that the deed from W. L. Newell to her and the minor children be so reformed as to properly describe the property sought to be conveyed thereby, and that R. F. Turner be restrained and enjoined from proceeding with the levy of said fi. fa. on the land. The defendant Turner filed a general demurrer to the petition, and also demurred on the ground that the consideration of the deed referred to in the petition is not alleged or set out. The defendant Newell did not demur or plead. The court overruled the demurrer, and Turner filed exceptions pendente lite. It appears from the deed which the plaintiffs sought to have reformed that it was a voluntary conveyance, the only consideration being "the natural love and affection which he [the grantor] has for his wife and three children." On the trial the jury returned a verdict finding in favor of the plaintiffs, that the deed be reformed as prayed for, and that the land was not subject to the fi. fa. Turner made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted. The defendants in error moved to dismiss the writ of error, because W. L. Newell was not made a party to the bill of exceptions.

W. F. Brown, for plaintiff in error. S. Holderness, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above).

1. The question of practice raised by the motion to dismiss is ruled in the first headnote.

2. But one question made by the record in this case need be discussed, and that is whether equity will reform a voluntary deed upon proceedings therefor brought by the grantee; and the principle controlling that question seems to be well settled by the adjudication of this and other courts, and to be so recognized by text-writers. That principle is set forth in Story's Eq. Jur. § 987: "The general principle is established that in no case whatsoever will courts of equity interfere in favor of mere volunteers, whether it be upon a voluntary contract, or a covenant, or a settlement, however meritorious may be the consideration, and although they stand in the relation of wife or child"—quoted and applied by the Supreme Court of Michigan (Shears v. Westover, 110 Mich. 505, 68 N. W. 286), following another case decided by the same court. See, also, the cases of Walt v. Smith, 92 Ill. 385, Eaton v. Eaton, 15 Wis. 259, Enos v. Stewart (Cal.) 70 Pac. 1005, and Gwyer v. Spaulding, 33 Neb. 573, 50 N. W. 681. In the case of Powell v. Powell, 27 Ga. 36, 73 Am. Dec. 724, it was said: "Is there anything to take his case out of the general principle? It is said that there is. It is said in the first place, that the case of a voluntary conveyance in favor of a wife or children is an exception to that principle. But we are not prepared to admit this proposition. The English decisions seem to be against it. See 1 Story Eq. § 176, and cases cited; Adams' Equity, 78." Jackson, C. J., speaking for the court in the case of Prater v. Sears, 77 Ga. 28, touching the question of the reformation of a voluntary deed, said: "On the face of the accepted conveyance, it is a mere voluntary deed. On the contract sought to be set up, it is a binding deed for value. The other side to it is dead. If a mere voluntary conveyance, a mistake in it will not be corrected against heirs, which is the case here; nor will a specific performance of it, when corrected, be decreed."

Counsel for defendant in error insisted that, as the grantees had gone into possession of the lands the description of which is sought to be corrected and reformed, the contract was executed, and that therefore they are entitled to the relief prayed, and rely upon the case of Wyche v. Green, 16 Ga. 49, in which the court held that "if a voluntary contract, however, be actually executed, then a court of equity will enforce all of the rights growing out of the contract against anybody." But a clear distinction is pointed out in Powell v. Powell, supra, between the case of Wyche v. Green and cases like the Powell Case and the one at bar. Such a mistake as that alleged in the petition "is a mere failure in a bounty, which, as the grantor was not bound to make, he is not bound to perfect." Adair v. McDonald, 42 Ga. 506. The fact that the recipients of the bounty had enjoyed the benefits thereof for a period of several years gives them no stronger equitable claim upon the grantor than if they had never enjoyed them at all. If both the grantors and grantees were in the same position relatively to this as they were when the deed was executed, and the grantor was consenting thereto, we could produce authority for holding that the deed might be reformed and corrected by a court of equity; but before the proceedings were instituted to reform the instrument in question a judgment had been obtained by the plaintiff in error against the grantor, which created a lien in favor of the former upon all the property of the latter. For the grantor to consent to the correction and perfection of an incorrect or imperfect voluntary conveyance is an act of liberality or generosity, an act similar in its nature to the bestowal of a bounty. Such an act he is not free to perform, if it tends to interfere with the rights and just demands of a judgment-creditor. We find in this salient fact a strong reason for holding that the present case is not entitled to be listed among the exceptions to the general rule that equity will not interfere to reform a voluntary deed because of mistake; and the general demurrer invoking the application of that rule should have been sustained.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

1. RAILROADS—INJURY TO PERSON ON TRACK—ACTION—PETITION.

When this case was before the Supreme Court on a former occasion (Kemp v. Central Ry. Co., 122 Ga. 559, 50 S. E. 465), it was held that the petition was good as against a general demurrer, but that the special demurrer should have been sustained. Before the remittitur was entered, the plaintiff offered an amendment to the petition, attempting to cure the defects pointed out in the special demurrer originally filed, as well as in the amendment to the special demurrer, which was filed to the petition as amended. While the amendment cured some of the defects, the petition as amended was still subject to some of the objections raised in the special demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Bulloch County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Kemp against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Pending the action, plaintiff intermarried with one Brandenburg, and the action was continued in the name of A. K. Brandenburg. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Mrs. Kemp brought suit for damages resulting from the homicide of her husband. The petition alleged that the defendant, by the operation of its locomotive and cars in a careless, negligent, and improper manner, ran over and killed her husband, in the county of Bulloch, at a point between Parish and Metter stations; that the killing was done by a passenger train going west, upon a straight track, and occurred on the 12th day of February; and that the conduct of the agents and employes of the railroad on the occasion in question was wrongful and wanton. It alleged that her husband was 26 years of age, able-bodied, and well educated, and was a farmer, merchant, and school teacher, and earning an annual income of $1,000. To this petition the defendant filed both general and special demurrers. These demurrers were overruled, and the defendant excepted. The judgment overruling the general demurrer was affirmed by this court, and the judgment overruling the special demurrer was reversed. Kemp v. Central Ry. Co., 122 Ga. 559, 50 S. E. 465.

Before the remittitur was entered in the trial court the plaintiff offered an amendment alleging, in substance, that the defendant was negligent at the time and place in question, in that it ran its cars at a high rate of speed, greater than was necessary or usual, or was required to make the schedule upon which the train was run; that this amounted to recklessness; that at the place where the husband of plaintiff was killed the public generally were accustomed to use the roadway of defendant as a path or passageway, and the servants in charge of the train had reason to anticipate that there would be persons passing at this point, and they negligently failed to keep a lookout for such persons; that the locomotive was not equipped with a proper headlight, and the headlight was not burning on the occasion in question; that the company failed "to equip said train with brakes, or air brakes, and other appliances necessary and requisite for the safe operation" of the train, and without which the servants in charge thereof could not stop the train, even after having become aware of the presence of the plaintiff's husband upon the track; that the servants and agents in charge of the train were careless and negligent in failing and refusing to stop the train after they had notice of the presence of the plaintiff's husband on the track and in imminent danger of being killed; that the locomotive and cars of the defendant were old, worn out, improperly equipped, and not suited for the purpose for which they were used; that the servants in charge of the train failed and refused to give any signal at the crossing near which the husband of plaintiff was killed, and to slacken the speed of the train on approaching the crossing, thereby failing to give him notice of the approach of the train in time for him to have saved himself; that the train was run in a reckless and wanton manner, without regard to the safety of the persons traveling along the highway; that the servants in charge of the train, after the presence of plaintiff's husband on the track was known to them, failed and refused to reduce the speed of the train, to give any signal, or perform any other act required to avoid the killing of her husband, and, even after the presence of plaintiff's husband became known, ran said train in a reckless and wanton manner, without regard to his life, striking and killing him; that the engineer in charge of the locomotive was an old man, with failing eyesight, who could see but a short distance, and was therefore an incompetent and unfit person for the duty required to be discharged; that the engineer and fireman failed and refused to keep a lookout, although they were running on a straight track, with nothing to obstruct their view for half a mile or more; and that the husband of plaintiff "was entirely free from any fault on his part."

The defendant filed both a general and special demurrer to the petition as amended. The special demurrer raised the objections that the petition did not show any duty or diligence on the part of defendant to the plaintiff's husband; that there was nothing in the allegations which would amount to wantonness on the part of the defendant; that it appears, from all of the averments, that the husband of plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided the consequences of the alleged negligence of the defendant; that it did not appear, from the averments, how the alleged acts of negligence caused or contributed to the injury of plaintiff; that it does not aver in what respect the locomotive and cars were improperly equipped; that it does not appear what degree of diligence was due by the defendant to the plaintiff's husband; that it does not appear that the plaintiff's husband was at or upon any public road crossing, or so near thereto as to render the failure of the defendant to observe the statutory signal for public road crossing negligence relatively to the plaintiff's husband; that it was not alleged in what respect the engineer was an incompetent or unfit person, nor does it appear in what manner the plaintiff's husband was free from fault, nor what care or diligence was exercised by him to avoid the injury, nor by what right or in what capacity he was upon the track at the time of the injury, nor how near he was to a public road crossing, nor does it appear whether he was walking, sitting, standing, or lying upon the track, and the allegation that he was free from fault was merely the conclusion of the pleader.

The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant filed exceptions pendente lite. The case proceeded to trial, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $5,000. The motion for a new trial, filed by the defendant, was overruled, and in its bill of exceptions it assigns as error each of the rulings just stated. The plaintiff, while the suit was pending, intermarried with Brandenburg, and the suit is now proceeding under the name so acquired by her.

COBB, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). The special demurrer to the petition, as amended, raises numerous questions. We all agree that some of the grounds of the special demurrer were not well taken. We are not agreed as to the proper decision of the other questions raised by the demurrer. Those matters upon which we are agreed, and which require special notice, will be first dealt with. The special demurrer raises objection that the mere allegation that the deceased was free from fault is too general, and that the facts which show such freedom from fault should have been set out. In Allen v. Augusta Factory, 82 Ga. 76, 8 S. E. 68, Mr. Chief Justice Bleckley said: "The allegation that the deceased was without fault is too general, and too much in the nature of a legal conclusion, to serve as a substitute for the proper allegation of his want of knowledge." It is to be noted that in that case freedom from fault depended largely upon want of knowledge on the part of the plaintiff, and, of course, this was a matter peculiarly within the knowledge of the plaintiff himself, and therefore he should not be allowed to place himself behind merely a general allegation, when it was so easy for him to make a specific averment. In the cases of Central R. Co. v. Hubbard, 86 Ga. 623, 12 S. E. 1020, and Georgia R. Co. v. Rayford, 115 Ga. 937, 42 S. E. 234, it was held that, as against a general demurrer, an allegation that the plaintiff was without fault was sufficient. See, in this connection, Pierce v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 122 Ga. 664, 50 S. E. 468. It is to be noted that in all of these cases the suit was by an employé or the widow of an employé against the master. Where a servant brings suit against a master to recover on account of an injury resulting from defective machinery, it is necessary to allege and prove that the defect was known to the master, or should have been so known by the use of ordinary care, and that it was unknown to the employé, and that he had not equal means of knowing the danger. Civ. Code 1895, § 2612. If the suit is by a railroad employé for a personal injury arising from the acts of fellow servants, negligence on the part of the other employés and freedom from negligence on his own are both necessary, and these must be alleged. Civ. Code 1895, § 2323.

In these cases absence of knowledge or negligence is a part of the plaintiff's case, and must be alleged as such. But generally, in other cases, where suit is brought by one against a railroad company to recover for a personal injury, the plaintiff is not bound to allege his own freedom from fault. Want of ordinary care on his part is a matter of defense. Its negation is not essential to setting out the plaintiff's case. This being so, if the plaintiff does not allege that he was free from fault, such allegation is not subject to demurrer on the ground that it is too general, and fails to set out how and wherein he was not negligent. If a cause of action is duly alleged against the defendant, entire freedom from fault is not necessary to a recovery. It is only a failure to use ordinary care, where by such use the consequences of the defendant's negligence could have been avoided, which will prevent a recovery. If entire freedom from fault on the plaintiff's part is alleged, it is not necessary to prove it to make out a case in his favor. If, under the evidence, he is guilty of some negligence, but not enough to bar a recovery under the rule above stated, there may be a recovery; but the damages would be diminished in proportion to the negligence attributable to each. The allegation of the greater (entire freedom from fault) includes the less (partial freedom from fault). It is not necessary, therefore, to allege in detail how, why, and wherein the plaintiff was entirely free from fault. Besides, when it is alleged that one is guilty of no negligence whatever, this negatives all possible negligence; and it is not necessary, to recite in detail all possible acts of negligence which he might have committed, and then deny that he did each of such acts separately. To allege that one did nothing negligent is enough. It is not necessary to describe all possible negligence, merely to deny that he committed it. So, if I should say that I did nothing, this would mean that I did not do anything or everything. It would not be any more complete if I should describe anything or everything, and then add that I did not do it.

In the present case the allegation that the deceased was free from fault was an unnecessary averment. As it was unnecessary, the defendant certainly had no right to require any elaboration of the averment, or any more detail in reference to the unnecessary allegation than the plaintiff saw fit to offer. If the case had been of a character where the averment was a necessary part of the plaintiff's case, then the defendant might have been entitled to more information as to the matter. The office of a special demurrer is to call for information which the defendant is entitled to have under the law. If the plaintiff makes an unnecessary allegation, the right of the defendant is generally either to have it stricken or require it to be proved, if the averment is of such a character as to be descriptive of the transaction in question. The amendment to the petition contained a paragraph which alleged that the defendant was negligent "in failing to equip said train with brakes, or air brakes, and other appliances necessary and requisite for the safe operation of such a train of cars, and without which the employes and servants of such railway company could not have stopped said train after having become aware of the presence of the plaintiff's husband upon said track in sufficient time to have stopped said train of cars, had they been properly equipped." This was sufficient to put the defendant on notice that the negligence claimed was the failure to equip its train with proper appliances for stopping the train, whatever those appliances might have been. It was notified that it would be required to defend this allegation of negligence in such way as to prove that the train was equipped with such appliances as reasonable diligence required them to use. Taking all of the averments together, the effect of the charge of negligence against the defendant was that the train was equipped in such way that it could not be controlled and managed in an emergency such as faced it at the time that the presence of the deceased upon the track was discovered. The averments were sufficient to put the defendant on notice of what it was to answer; and, if the train was equipped in the manner that the diligence required by law demanded, it could easily meet the charge of negligence referred to. The manner in which the train was equipped was more peculiarly within its own knowledge than the knowledge of the plaintiff, and the details as to the equipment come more properly from it in response to the charge of negligence than it would from the plaintiff in the specification of negligence.

On the remaining questions which will be specially dealt with we are not agreed; and the views of the majority of the court will be stated, as well as the views of the dissenting members. The special demurrer to the petition as amended raises the question that it did not show whether the deceased was walking, sitting, standing, or lying upon the track; nor did it show any duty of diligence on the part of the defendant to the plaintiff's husband, nor what degree of diligence was owed; nor did it appear that the plaintiff's husband was at or upon a public road crossing, or so near thereto as rendered the failure on the part of the defendant to observe the statutory signals required at such places negligence on its part relatively to the deceased; nor did it show by what right or in what capacity the deceased was upon the track at the time of the alleged injury. The views of the majority of the court on these matters are thus stated by them:

In the second paragraph of the original petition it was alleged that the plaintiff's husband was killed by the careless and negligent running of the locomotive and cars of the defendant company, and in the fourth paragraph thereto it was alleged that he was wrongfully and wantonly run over and killed by the locomotive and cars of the defendant company. On the first trial of the case the special demurrers to the petition were overruled by the trial judge, and his judgment, in this respect, was reversed by this court in Kemp v. Central Ry. Co., 122 Ga. 559, 50 S. E. 465, because the petition did not show (1) whether the deceased was an employe, licensee, or trespasser; (2) whether the homicide was at a public crossing, or at a point distant therefrom; or (3) whether the deceased was walking, standing, or lying on the track, and, if the latter, whether he was there voluntarily or because of some sudden access of sickness. In the amendment to the petition, filed before the remittitur was entered in the trial court, it was alleged that the homicide of the plaintiff's husband was caused by the negligent, reckless, and wanton acts of the agents and employes of the defendant company in the running of its locomotive and cars, which acts were, in a loose and general way, sought to be set out in the amendment. It is clear to our minds that the plaintiff did not intend, by the various allegations of negligence set forth in the amendment, to limit her alleged right to recover to a case wherein she relied solely upon the alleged wanton homicide of her husband; but she evidently endeavored to set out acts of negligence on the part of the defendant and its employes which caused the death of her husband, and which did not amount to wantonness, and upon which she relied for recovery. This being true, the amended petition was as much subject to special demurrer as the original petition, for failing to show by what right, or in what capacity, the plaintiff's husband was at or upon the defendant's railroad track at the time he was killed, whether the homicide was at a public crossing, and whether he was walking, standing, or lying upon the track.

The rulings made in this case when it was formerly before this court are the law of the case and must control it.

Mr. Justice ATKINSON and I cannot agree to this view. In our opinion the petition is not subject to the objections referred to in the views of the majority above set forth. In the petition as it originally stood, it was material for the defense that there should be some information given by the pleader as to the position of the deceased on the track, but under the amendment this becomes no longer material. It is distinctly alleged that the servants in charge of the train had notice that the deceased was upon the track and that by the exercise of ordinary care they could have avoided killing him. The effect of the allegations is that they knew of his presence and used no effort whatever to prevent injury to him. If this was true, his death was the result of a wanton act. Forrest v. Ga. R. Co., 128 Ga. 77, 57 S. E. 98, and citations. If the allegations of the petition as to the manner in which the deceased was killed are true, the defendants would be liable, without reference to his position upon the track at the time of his death. The petition, in effect, charged that the agents and servants of the railway company wantonly and willfully killed the deceased after they knew that he was upon the track in a place of danger. To say that this allegation is defective, for the reason that it did not allege whether he was walking, standing, or lying down, would be the equivalent of holding that an indictment for murder, which charged that the accused with malice aforethought did kill and murder a named person, was subject to special demurrer upon the ground that it did not appear whether he was walking, standing, or lying down at the time he was slain.

The amendment alleged that the defendant was negligent because "the locomotive and cars of said defendant company, which ran over and killed the plaintiff's husband, were old and worn out and improperly equipped, and not suited for the purpose for which they were used by said company, rendering them incapable of being managed or controlled in a way calculated to maintain the safety of the public, and in such a way as to have saved the life of the said Kemp, even when his presence on the track and his imminent danger of being killed became known to the servants of said company on said train, and sufficient time before he was struck to have saved his life, had said locomotive and cars been such as were reasonably suited for the purpose for which they were used, namely, that of a passenger train." We do not agree as to the proper construction of this paragraph. The majority of the court are of the opinion that, properly construed, the paragraph contains a general allegation that the defendant was negligent in reference to the entire equipment of the train, and that, when so construed, the allegation is too general under the former rulings of this court. See Hudgins v. Coca Cola Co., 122 Ga. 695, 50 S. E. 974, and citations; Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Olsen, 123 Ga. 612, 51 S. E. 591; Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Cody, 119 Ga. 371, 46 S. E. 429; Russell v. Central Ry. Co., 119 Ga. 705, 46 S. E. 858. Mr. Justice ATKINSON and I are of the opinion that the paragraph, properly construed, is not an allegation of negligence as to the equipment generally, but that it is a specific allegation that the train was not equipped with appliances necessary to stop the same. The majority think that the special demurrer should have been sustained; but Mr. Justice ATKINSON and I are of contrary views, for the reasons stated.

The numerous other grounds of special demurrer do not require any special notice. We are all of the opinion that they are without merit.

Judgment reversed.

YOW et al. v. SULLIVAN et al.

SULLIVAN et al. v. YOW et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1907)

1. COUNTIES—TAXATION—INDEPENDENT LEVY.

The order of the county authorities of Franklin county of July 4, 1906, providing for a tax levy for the expenses of the county for 1905, properly construed, is not a new and independent tax levy during the year 1906, but is an amendment to the tax levy of September 9, 1905, making the same conform to the law as laid down in the decision when this controversy was before this court on a former occasion.

2. SAME—CREATION OF NEW COUNTY—LIABILITIES UNDER TAX LEVY.

A new county was created by an act approved August 18, 1905, and was organized on December 6, 1905. The authorities of the county from which a portion of the territory of the new county was taken, on September 9, 1905, made a tax levy which embraced amounts necessary to pay for the erection of new bridges, contracts for which were entered into after the date of the act creating the new county. Held, that the property owners in the new county are not liable for that portion of the tax levy necessary for the purpose of erecting such bridges.

3. SAME—JUDGMENT—REVERSAL.

No sufficient reason has been shown for reversing the judgment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Franklin County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

Action by T. R. Yow and others against R. F. Sullivan, tax collector, and another. From the judgment, both parties bring error. Affirmed.

Yow and others, including the Southern Railway Company, filed a petition against the tax collector and the sheriff of Franklin county, alleging: That all of the plaintiffs, except the railway company, were residents in that portion of Stephens county which was formerly Franklin county, and the company is a foreign corporation, with a line of railway through those two counties, nine miles of its line being in that portion of Stephens county above referred to. That on August 18, 1905, an act was passed creating the county of Stephens, and the county was organized on the — day of December, 1905. That, notwithstanding the creation of the new county, the ordinary of Franklin county, on September 9, 1905, undertook to levy a tax upon the property of the plaintiffs, who filed petition to enjoin the collection of the tax, and an order was passed granting the injunction, which ruling was affirmed by the Supreme Court. On July 4, 1906, the ordinary of Franklin county, with the advice of the county commissioners, undertook to levy a tax for the year 1905; such levy being in the following words: "Georgia, Franklin County. July 4, 1906. Whereas, the ordinary of Franklin county, on the 9th of September, 1905, did pass an order assessing county taxes on all property and every species of value or specifics which is taxed by the state and which was subject to taxation for the year 1905; and whereas, an equitable petition was filed in the superior court of Franklin county on the 20th day of December, 1905, by T. R. Yow et al., praying for an injunction against R. F. Sullivan, tax collector of Franklin county, and on the 30th of December, 1905, his honor, R. B. Russell, judge of the superior court of Franklin county, granted an injunction, and enjoined said tax collector from collecting taxes due the county of Franklin by petitioners, and said decision having been affirmed by the Supreme Court of Georgia, declaring the order of the ordinary of Franklin county, levying said taxes for said county, to be void, because the order failed to specify the percentage levied for each specific purpose enumerated therein: Therefore, the ordinary of said county, in pursuance of the laws of this state, which require the ordinary of Franklin county, with the advice of the county commissioners of roads and revenues of said county, to levy a percentage tax on all taxable property sufficient to meet the requirements thereof for county taxes for the year 1905, and it is ordered by the ordinary of Franklin county 'that there be and hereby is levied a tax of $15.10 on each thousand dollars of taxable property for the year 1905, returned by each taxpayer and upon the tax digest of said county of Franklin for 1905,' which is subject to taxation ad valorem, and which tax is levied for the following purposes, to wit: $1.10% on each hundred dollars, to build and repair courthouses and jails, bridges, and ferries, and other public improvements according to contract; 10% cents on each hundred dollars, to pay sheriff's, jailer's, and other officers' fees that may be legally entitled to out of the county; eighty-four one-hundredths of 1 cent on each hundred dollars, to pay coroners all fees that may be due them by the county for holding inquest; 2½ cents on each hundred dollars, to pay expenses of the county for bailiffs at court, nonresident witnesses in criminal cases, fuel, servant hire, stationery, and the like; 8 cents and 4½ mills on each hundred dollars, to pay jurors a per diem compensation; 8 cents and 4½ mills on each hundred dollars, to pay expenses incurred in supporting the poor of the county, as prescribed by the Code; 8 cents and 4½ mills on each hundred dollars, to pay expenses of working the roads under the alternative road law; 2½ cents on each hundred dollars, to pay any other lawful charge against the county. It is also further ordered that the tax collector of Franklin county collect said taxes as provided by law, and pay the same to the county treasurer of Franklin county," —signed by the county commissioners and by the ordinary. Pursuant to this tax levy the tax collector has issued executions against all of the plaintiffs, except the railway company, and will, unless restrained, proceed to collect the same. The Comptroller General has issued execution against the railway company, based on such levy, which has been levied by the sheriff. By an act passed in 1906, the county affairs of Franklin county were taken out of the hands of the ordinary and commissioners, as the board existed on July 4, 1906, and were vested in a new board of commissioners; this act taking effect October 1, 1906. It is alleged that the tax levy of July 4, 1906, is illegal, for the reason that it violates that provision of the Constitution which requires that all taxes shall be levied and collected under a general law, and no authority has been given to collect any tax under such a levy from a resident of Franklin county as it now exists; that the levy cannot be the basis for an execution against the railway company, for the reason that the levy is, by its terms, limited to property "upon the tax digest" of the county for 1905; that it is void, for the reason that it purports to levy a tax of $15.10 on the thousand, while the aggregate of the different percentages is $15.16 on the thousand, and the first item does not specify what per cent. is to be used to build and repair courthouses, jails, bridges, ferries, and other public improvements, and there was no contract outstanding to build or repair courthouses, jails, bridges, etc., at the time that the original levy was made in 1905, nor at the time of the levy of July 4, 1906. The county authorities had determined to build a new courthouse, but thereafter a bond election was held for the purpose of raising money for this purpose, and the people assented to the issuance of the bonds. The plaintiffs are owners of property now embraced in Stephens county, and are not liable for the tax to erect a courthouse or other public improvements in Franklin county; the tax, as originally levied, and the contract for the courthouse being made after the passage of the act creating the county of Stephens.

The prayer is that the tax collector and sheriff be enjoined from proceeding to collect the executions.

The defendants answered that the tax was levied to raise the necessary funds to meet the expenses of the county, and that at the time the first levy was made there was a contract outstanding to build a bridge at a cost of $2,500; but it was not alleged that the contract was outstanding at the time Stephens county was created. The answer avers that the county authorities are not proceeding to collect any taxes on the second levy from those taxpayers who paid their taxes under the first levy, and there is no taxpayer in the county who is not required to pay the tax for the year, and there is no attempt to exempt any individual from his taxes; that it was the duty of the county authorities to meet all the necessary expenses during the year beginning September 1, 1905; that the bridges in the county had been neglected several years, were nearly all out of repair, and many of them were in such condition as to require the building of new bridges, and the levy was made for that purpose, which is alleged to be a part of the current expenses of the county; that the courthouse was in need of repair, as well as the jail, and the levy was intended to embrace these expenses; that there had been built, under contract made before the tax levy, four large new bridges, and a number of smaller and less expensive bridges, at a cost of more than $10,000, and the repairs on the bridges and jails have cost more than $1,300, and it is necessary to rebuild the bridges; that contracts for other bridges were made before the tax was levied, and the whole amount is necessary for this purpose; and that the county of Franklin has to maintain not less than 50 bridges over rivers and creeks. It is contended that the levy, in its entirety, is merely for the purpose of meeting the ordinary current expenses of the county for the year 1905.

At the hearing the only evidence introduced in behalf of the plaintiffs was an affidavit showing that the county of Stephens was organized on December 8, 1905; and the only evidence on behalf of the defendants was the affidavit of two persons in reference to the bridges of Franklin county and the cost of repairing and rebuilding them. The judge ordered an injunction against the collection of the tax provided for in the first item of the levy, for the purpose of building and repairing courthouses, etc., and directed that the county authorities ascertain what amount of that levy embraced the building of new bridges, and eliminate the same therefrom, and, when this is done, that the executions proceed for the collection of so much of that item as is necessary for the repairing of the courthouse, jails, etc. The order recites that it is necessarily to be inferred, from the allegations of the petition and the answer, that Stephens county was created before any of the indebtedness for new bridges was incurred, except as to the bridge over North Broad river, and that it was admitted at the hearing that the contract to build this bridge was made after the creation of Stephens county. The injunction was refused upon on all the grounds other than that stated. The plaintiffs excepted; because that the court erred in not granting the injunction generally and restraining the entire tax levy; and the defendants except, because the court erred in enjoining the tax levy so far as it related to the erection of new bridges.

J. B. Jones, Fermor Barrett, and John J. Strickland, for plaintiffs in error. J. H. Skelton and W. R. Little, for defendant in error.

COBB, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. The original tax levy of September 9, 1905, was before this court in the case of Sullivan v. Yow, 125 Ga. 328, 54 S. E. 173. It was then held that the collection of the tax under such levy was properly enjoined, for the reason that the order levying the tax did not comply with the provisions of the law requiring that the levy should specify the per cent levied for each specific purpose. It was said: "The order of the ordinary levying the tax not conforming to the plain requirements of the law, all proceedings under the tax levy in its present shape were properly enjoined. * * * All proceedings under the tax levy were properly restrained until the county authorities make the levy conform to the requirements of the law. In the light of what has been said, the county authorities may readily make the levy comply with the requirements of the law, as to the statement of the percentage of each item," etc. This court did not, in terms, direct that the tax levy should be amended; but the language in the opinion clearly indicates that this could be done. The order was held unenforceable in its then shape; but there was no ruling to the effect that the order was void in the sense that it could not be amended or completed by supplying the omissions which rendered it unenforceable in its then condition. After the decision in that case the county authorities passed an order which is set forth in the statement of facts. It is contended that this order is, in effect, a new levy, and that, being made in 1906, it is a nullity, and no taxes can be collected thereunder. The argument is that county taxes must be levied each year, and that, if no levy is made during the year, the county authorities have no power, in a subsequent year, to make a levy, as such action is retroactive in its nature. It would certainly be a great hiatus in the law if this is true. County authorities might negligently or willfully fail or refuse to make a levy before the end of the year, and, if the contention of counsel is correct, persons having claims or demands against the county would be without a remedy. We will not undertake to determine this question under the present record; for, when the order of July 4, 1906, is properly construed, we think it is merely an amendment of the levy of September 9, 1905, made in conformity with the suggestions which were thrown out when the controversy was before this court on the former occasion. The order recites the former case, and the decision of this court, and then proceeds to make a levy in exact conformity with the ruling of the court in reference to the various items therein contained. It is true it does not use the word "amend," or any similar expression; but, when the order is construed in its entirety, no other reasonable conclusion can be reached than that the county authorities were attempting to carry into effect, in reference to the levy of September 9, 1905, the law as laid down in the decision of this court.

2. The judge held that the property owners of that portion of Stephens county which was originally Franklin county were liable for the usual, ordinary, and current expenses of the county, as embraced in the tax levy made after the county was created, but during the year of its creation. He also held that the cost of the erection of new bridges was not a usual, ordinary, and current expense of a county, and that the property owners in the new county were not liable to be taxed for the same, unless there were outstanding contracts at the time that the new county was created; that the property owners in the new county could be justly charged with their proportion of the ordinary expenses of the county for the current year in which the county was created, but they could not be justly charged for permanent improvements made under a contract which was entered into after the new county was created. This decision is in accord with the reasoning in the decision of Pope v. Matthews, 125 Ga. 341, 54 S. E. 152. In that case it was held, where a contract for a new courthouse was entered into after the new county was created, but before it was organized, that the property owners in the new county were not liable for this unusual expense, but were liable for all usual and ordinary current expenses for the year in which the county was created. This decision was based upon the theory that the new courthouse was a new permanent improvement to the county, which necessarily had not been and would not be of any benefit to the property owners of the new county, and therefore the entire expense must be borne by the property owners of the old county. The repairing of public buildings, bridges, and like structures, brought about by the use of the same in past years, would be an expense properly chargeable against the taxpayers of the county as it existed, and it would not be inequitable or unjust to require the property owners in the new county to bear their proportion of the expenses of this character that had to be borne during the year in which the new county was created.

3. It is contended that the execution issued against the railroad company is invalid for the reason that the tax levy purports to levy a tax only upon the property in the county as it appears upon the tax digest of the county, and that therefore there is no basis upon which the Comptroller General can issue an execution. The county authorities are authorized to levy a tax upon all taxable property in the county and, when levied, it may be collected in the manner prescribed by law. The law requires the ordinary to certify to the Comptroller General the amount of the tax levy of the county, and then the Comptroller General, using this as a basis, ascertains the amount of taxes due by the railroad company by applying the rate to the returns of the railway company in his office. County authorities have no power to exempt the property of a railroad company from taxation, and it will never be presumed that such was their intention. The rate of tax is fixed by the order of the county commissioners. That portion of the order which relates to the tax digest of the county will be construed to refer to the taxes which are to be collected by the tax collector. The order of the county authorities was sufficient to authorize a certificate to the Comptroller General of the amount of the tax levy for the year, and with that certificate before him he had authority, under the law, to ascertain the amount of taxes due by the railroad company, and, upon its failure to pay, to issue execution therefor. The decision in Georgia Railroad Co. v. Hutchinson, 125 Ga. 762, 54 S. E. 725, dealt with an act of the General Assembly authorizing the levy of a tax, and not with the order of the county authorities levying the tax under existing laws. In that case it was held, where an act limited the authority to levy a tax to property upon the digest of the county, that no tax could be collected upon property of a railway company. The general law of the state levies the tax for county purposes on railroad property, and the mere fact that the county authorities, in the order providing for the collection of taxes, apparently limited the tax to property upon the digest of the county, does not prevent the rate therein fixed from being the basis for the Comptroller General to fix the amount due by the railroad company.

It is also contended that the levy was illegal, for the reason that it is stated to be a levy for $15.10 on the thousand in the aggregate, while the various items, added together, amount to $15.16. The law requires that the different percentages shall follow each item, and the aggregate, as indicated by the addition of these different percentages, would be the valid tax levy, and any other statement in the order conflicting therewith would be treated as simply surplusage. The difference between the amount stated in the preliminary part of the order and the aggregate of the percentages was evidently due to a clerical error; but, even if not, the aggregate indicated by the true addition of the different percentages would be the lawful levy. It was not necessary that the first item of the levy should specify the amount to be used for each of the purposes therein indicated. The levy was in the language of the Code. See Gaines v. Dyer, 128 Ga. 585, 38 S. E. 175.

Counsel for the county authorities, in their bill of exceptions, complain that the effect of the order, so far as the new bridges are concerned, is to prevent the collection of the tax from the Southern Railway Company on that portion of its property which is located in Franklin county as that county now exists. We do not think that this is a proper construction of the order of the judge. The purpose of the petition was to restrain the county authorities of Franklin county from collecting what was alleged to be illegal taxes upon the property located in Stephens county, and the order is to be construed in the light of the case as made by the pleadings. The county authorities are, under the order, required to eliminate from the levy, so far as the property owners in Stephens county are concerned, all amounts to be used in the erection of new bridges; and, when this is eliminated from the executions, they can proceed for the balance. The property owners of Franklin county as it is now constituted, whether individuals or railway companies, are liable for the entire amount fixed in the levy. The original levy of September 9, 1905, being defective, and this court having held that proceedings thereunder were properly enjoined until it was made to conform to the law, the taxpayers should have been given a reasonable time, after the levy was amended, to pay the taxes before executions were issued. There is no complaint that a reasonable time has not been allowed for this purpose. The action of the county authorities is attacked as being invalid, and not furnishing a basis for the collection of taxes at all. In the case as presented to the trial judge, we see no error in any of his rulings.

Judgment on each bill of exceptions affirmed. All the Justices concur.

SCHOFIELD v. LITTLE. (No. 306.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 10, 1907.)

1. ERROR, WRIT OF—PRESENTATION AND RESERVATION OF ERROR—EXCEPTIONS TAKEN PENDENTE LITE.

A plaintiff in error who has excepted in a proper bill of exceptions to the denial of his motion for a new trial may, at the hearing in this court, assign error on exceptions taken pendente lite to the overruling of his demurrer to the plaintiff's petition, though no mention of this interlocutory matter was made in the final bill of exceptions. Such exceptions pendente lite, if transmitted in the record, having once been certified, need not be certified again.

2. SAME.

When exceptions are made pendente lite to the ruling of the trial court, and error is not assigned thereon in the main bill of exceptions, error must be assigned, as to such interlocutory exceptions, before the beginning of the argument in this court, or, if there is no such argument, error may be assigned in the brief.

3. WORK AND LABOR—IMPLIED PROMISE.

There was no error in overruling the demurrer. The petition set forth, as a cause of action, a contract of employment, with an implied assumption for the reasonable value of the plaintiff's service.

4. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

The extracts from the charge of the court to which exceptions are taken, numbered 1 to 6, when considered in connection with the entire charge, are not erroneous.

5. ERROR, WRIT OF—REVIEW—ABANDONMENT OF ALLEGED ERROR.

The charge of the court that "it is admitted by the defendant in this case that he [the defendant] owed the plaintiff for the trip to Milledgeville and attention to his brother while in jail" does not require a new trial, in view of the subsequent agreement of counsel for both parties that the defendant did make the admission as stated by the court. The admission is an abandonment of the contention of plaintiff in error on this point.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 4219.]

6. CONTRACTS—ACTION FOR SERVICES—INSTRUCTIONS.

To charge the jury that "a party to a contract has a right to recover when he has performed his service in pursuance of such agreement and contract" is equivalent to instructing the jury that the services must have been such as were called for by the contract, and must have been performed according to the terms of the contract. Both ideas are included in the words "in pursuance of."

7. WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTIONS.

The jury having returned a verdict finding for the plaintiff without naming an amount, it was not error for the court to instruct the jury, before they retired to perfect such verdict, that their verdict in favor of the plaintiff should be "for such a sum as the evidence shows the services rendered by the plaintiff in the case were reasonably worth." Such instructions were harmless, as, by reasonable intendment, the verdict announced by the jury was a finding in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount sued for.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 4219.]

8. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the court in its charge fully defines to the jury the meaning of the contract and fully and fairly explains to them the contentions of both parties, as embodied in their respective understanding of its contents, the omission to further instruct the jury specially that they must determine what the contract was, its exact terms, the consideration, and the respective obligations, liability, and undertakings of each of the parties thereunder was immaterial. The evidence for the plaintiff clearly establishing all of the essentials, and the evidence for the defendant explicitly denying the same, the recital of the contentions of each party, fully and fairly, and appropriate instructions to the jury as to their finding in either event, dispensed with any statement that the jury should determine exactly what the contract was. If they believed the defendant, there was no contract as to the major portion of plaintiff's demand. If they believed the plaintiff, the court's rehearsal supplied the proper instructions.

9. WITNESSES — FEES — EXPERT — ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION.

While no statute in Georgia allows or prohibits fees to expert witnesses, and while there can be no charge beyond the legal fees of ordinary witnesses for attendance on the court in obedience to subpoena, still, as a physician cannot be required to make any examination or preliminary preparations, or to listen to the testimony, in order the better to give his opinion as an expert, he may for such services demand extra compensation.

TALLEY v. STATE (No. 537.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — TRIAL — EXCLUSION OF WITNESSES.

While section 1017 of the Penal Code of 1895 gives the right to the state and the accused to have the witnesses of the other examined out of the hearing of each other, and directs that "the court shall take proper care to effect this object so far as practicable and convenient," yet this matter is within the discretion of the court, and its exercise will not be controlled unless manifestly abused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 1549.]

2. SAME—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where the court, at the request of the solicitor and over the objection of the defendant, permitted a witness for the state to remain in court and assist in the prosecution, and said witness was first examined, there was no abuse of discretion.

3. SAME—EVIDENCE.

The evidence warranted the verdict.

NAPIER v. BROWN. (No. 371.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1907.)

1. ERROR, WRIT OF—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

"Where the error alleged is the granting or denying of a new trial, one assignment of error is sufficient to reach all the grounds of the motion on which the grant or refusal is based." The motion to dismiss is therefore overruled.

SAPP v. STATE (No. 623.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1907.)

1. HOMICIDE — VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER — EVIDENCE.

"If upon a sudden quarrel the parties fight upon the spot, or presently agree and fetch their weapons and fight, and one of them is killed, such killing is voluntary manslaughter, no matter who strikes the first blow." Gann v. State, 30 Ga. 67. The mutual intention to fight need not be proved directly, but may be inferred by the jury from the conduct of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 28, Homicide, §§ 86, 478.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW—REVIEW.

There being evidence in the record upon which the verdict can legally rest, this court has no power to grant a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 3075.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Screven County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Nelson Sapp was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and brings error. Affirmed.

E. K. Overstreet, for plaintiff in error. Alfred Herrington, Sol. Gen., and H. A. Boykin, for the State.

POWELL, J. The accused shot at one Brannen; and the shot, straying, struck a boy standing by, and killed him. It is conceded that the offense is the same as if Brannen had been killed, instead of the boy; and, indeed, this seems to be the law. A verdict of guilty of voluntary manslaughter was rendered, and the insistence through the present writ of error is that this verdict is contrary to law and without evidence to support it. It appears from the record that, a day or so prior to the homicide, Brannen had ordered one of the defendant's boys out of a mill operated by Brannen's father. On the day of the fatal encounter the wife of the deceased came to the store near by the mill, and remonstrated with Brannen for his having ordered her boy out of the mill, and he made her leave the store. We will give the account of the further details of the transaction leading up to the shooting in Brannen's words, as taken from the record: "I looked out, and about half way between the storehouse and the mill, which was about 50 yards distant, and I saw this man Sapp and his boy. He was sitting on a work bench, and I saw that he had a gun. I am pretty sure that he didn't have the gun in his hand, but, as well as I can remember, he and his boy were setting on the work bench, and the gun was leaning against an oak tree, about 20 or 30 feet from them; and I reasoned out in my own mind those negroes had been working there, but were not working there that day, and I had just decided that they had come there to attack me. So I picked up my father's gun that was left in the corner of the store, and I cocked it. It looked as if I was going to have trouble. Mr. Andrews says: 'What are you going to do, Harry?' And I says: 'I guess I had better prepare myself to defend myself.' And I started on, and he says: 'No; put the gun down.' And I took the gun and set it down there still cocked, and left it there setting in the corner and started over to my father's. When I got about half way, the negroes were still talking among themselves in a low tone of voice, and looked as if they were mad, and saying what they were going to do if I didn't let their boys have the privilege of going in the millhouse, and such as that; and this Sapp spoke up—the first time that he had spoke to me—and he says: 'Here is my boy now, and he can whip you.' And he says, if I remember right, 'We can fix you.' And he says: 'There is the boy right now.' And I says: 'What have you got to do with it? Shut your damn black mouth.' And he says, 'I will see,' or words to that effect, and jumped down off the bench, and run towards his gun, and I noticed he was making towards his gun. I was only a few feet distant from the store, and I broke and run back to the store and picked up my gun that I had left there, and run out, and, of course, the gun was already cocked, and as soon as I cleared the doorway I saw from the negro's actions that he was going to shoot. I judged that he was, at least, and, of course, I got ready to shoot, and as soon as I did clear the doorway, I did shoot one barrel. He shot also. The two guns—you couldn't distinguish one from the other. I have learned since, from the amount of shot that struck the store, that it was a very full charge at least in the gun." It further appears from the testimony of this witness that the defendant's gun was loaded with large shot. Further relevant portions of the testimony of this same witness are as follows: "I did go back to get a gun to shoot the negro. I did it to defend myself, for he was going after a gun to shoot me with. I started back to the store with the full determination of getting my gun to shoot the negro to defend myself. When I got to the door and got the gun, I immediately fired, and he did too at the same time. I know that my gun didn't fire first. I know that both guns were fired so close together that you couldn't distinguish which one fired first. I claim that he was about as quick as I was. When I reached the door, the gun was sitting side of the door, and I picked up the gun and fired immediately. I didn't have to go inside of the store to get the gun. I just did clear the door before I fired. I had the gun on my shoulder when I fired. I don't know whether the negro had the gun to his shoulder when he fired or not. I don't know how he had his gun, because I was shooting myself. Before I started back to the store, he didn't have his gun in his hands. It was standing against the work bench. When the negro first accosted me, he was sitting on this work bench, which was I should say about 20 yards from the store, and I had got very near about opposite the work bench on my way to the mill before he spoke to me. I was about 30 feet nearer the store than he was. I didn't have to go straight. I was kinder across from the work bench. I was about 15 yards from the store when I turned and went back to the store. He would have had plenty of time to have shot me, but he didn't have his gun. It was leaning against the end of the work bench, and he was sitting on the other end of it. He jumped down off the bench and started to run. He was within, I should say, 25 feet of his gun. He was nearer his gun than I was to the store, but I don't think it was possible for him to have got his gun and shot me before I got in the store, because he had to get down off the bench and go to his gun and pick it up and cock it, and raise it in a shooting position. I don't know whether his gun was cocked like mine or not. It may have been, I don't know. So far as I know, it wasn't cocked. He would have had to move pretty fast if he had shot me before I got back to the store, because I was moving pretty fast. The reason, one reason I know he was going for his gun, he said: 'We come here prepared for you.' And I was having the argument with him. It was an opinion of mine, a strong belief. When I started out there, Mr. Andrews requested that I leave the gun on the inside, and I left it there. I was expecting a difficulty, and only intending to defend myself. This woman had been in the store and raised this difficulty and went out there; and they were talking among themselves, and when I got a part of the way across the defendant here says, 'We come to fix you,' and then he got down and started for his gun, or started in the direction of it. I don't remember really whether the gun was leaning against the end of the work bench or against a tree nearby. When he turned and started, he went in the exact direction of the gun, and I knew there wasn't anything else for him to be going for. So I went for mine, and when I shot I saw him with his gun to his face; it was just a glance, only a few seconds." The shot fired by the defendant struck the boy. The defendant by his statement set up a complete case of self-defense. There was other evidence for the state, but since, if there was any theory of the evidence by which the jury could have reached the verdict rendered (and that set out above seems to us to authorize it), we are bound to adopt it and affirm the judgment. There being no other error assigned, we do not deem it necessary to set out more than we have already done. The verdict seems to be warranted upon the theory of mutual combat. The words and conduct of the defendant as detailed above seem to us to have authorized the jury to believe that the defendant was willing to fight the matter out, and that Brannen accepted the implied challenge. "If upon a sudden quarrel the parties fight upon the spot, or presently agree and fetch their weapons and fight, and one of them is killed, such killing is voluntary manslaughter, no matter who strikes the first blow." Gann v. State, 30 Ga. 67, and citations. This principal case has been frequently cited by our Supreme Court in subsequent cases, and is a clearly recognized principle of our law. It may be true that at the time the defendant actually fired the person at whom he shot was trying to kill him; but, before this fact can be set up in justification under Pen. Code 1895, § 73, which is applicable in cases of mutual combat, "it must appear that the person killed was the assailant, or that the slayer had really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle before the mortal blow was given." Stiles v. State, 57 Ga. 188; Heard v. State, 70 Ga. 602. If the testimony of Brannen be true, the defendant, by rushing for a weapon, coupled with a threat and an apparent present purpose of using the weapon, became the assailant, and there is no evidence that he declined any further combat. According to the record, the parties, by their mutual preparations for the encounter, by their quarrel, by their language expressing willingness to fight, by their simultaneous display, and use of deadly weapons, made just such a case of mutual combat as is contemplated by the language used in Gann's Case, supra.

Judgment affirmed.

HARRIS v. STATE. (No. 588.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where it appears, without contradiction, in the evidence, that the offense alleged to have been committed, if committed at all, occurred within two years prior to the filing of the accusation, an instruction that the state only has to prove that the transaction "happened two years prior to the date alleged in the accusation," was a harmless error.

2. SAME—RULES OF EVIDENCE.

Rules of evidence, especially addressed to the discretion of the court, are not appropriate subject-matter of instructions to the jury, but those given the jury in this case could not by any possibility be harmful to the plaintiff in error.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1877-1882.]

3. SAME.

Where the jury has been properly and fully instructed with reference to the statement of the defendant, it is not necessary, in the absence of a written request, to contrast the statement with the evidence or to give in charge to the jury any theory dependent upon the statement alone. Nor is it error to instruct the jury to take the testimony and the law as given in charge, and apply it to the testimony, and decide whether or not they believe the defendant did commit the offense alleged against him.

4. SAME—WEAPONS—CARRYING WEAPONS—EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

The verdict is authorized by the evidence, and, being approved by the trial judge, it will not be set aside for slight errors which could neither have induced nor have contributed to the finding of the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 3084.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Sylvester; Frank Park, Judge.

Edward Harris was convicted of carrying a concealed pistol and pointing the pistol at another, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Payton & Hay, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Tipton, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. Ed. Harris was arraigned in the city court of Sylvester, at the April term, 1907, upon two accusations; one charging him with the offense of carrying a concealed pistol, and the other charging him with the offense of pointing a pistol at another, both cases growing out of the same transaction. The two cases were tried together, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty in both cases. Harris thereupon filed his motion for new trial in both cases; and, his motions being overruled, he brings writs of error to this court.

The plaintiff in error insists that it is not sufficiently shown by the evidence that the transaction testified to by the witness for the state was within the statute of limitations. This is the only assignment of error based upon the evidence; and we think it without merit, for the reason that, while the witness could not be certain that the occurrence to which she was testifying was in the year 1905, still she swore positively that it was on the third Sunday in February of year before last. As the trial was had in 1907, and the accusation was preferred in 1906, the testimony was amply sufficient to show that the offense was committed within two years prior to the accusation. The remaining exceptions are all predicated upon alleged errors in the charge of the court.

The fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth grounds of the motion all relate to the charge of the court on the subject of impeachment. Under repeated decisions of the Supreme Court, it would not have been erroneous for the court to have omitted altogether the charge upon this subject; at least, not such an error as would grant a new trial. We find no error in the instructions as given to the jury upon this subject; and, if a fuller charge was desired, it should have been requested. A brief recapitulation of these grounds convinces us that there was no error in the charge of the court on the subject of impeachment and the credibility of the witnesses that can, under any previous decision, be held to have been harmful to this defendant.

The fourth ground of the motion complains that the court erred in charging the jury that "It is the duty of the jury to make all the witnesses speak the truth, if that can be done, and not impute perjury to any witness." In view of the conflicts in the evidence of the prosecutrix, Margaret Caldwell, and the witness Tison, on the one hand, and J. O. Rogers, on the other, there is no merit in this exception.

In the fifth ground of his motion the defendant assigns the following charge of the court as error: "If there be a conflict between the testimony of witnesses, it is your duty to reconcile the conflicting testimony, and, if this cannot be done, then you are to give credit to those witnesses which, in your opinion from all circumstances of the case, are most entitled to credit; the jury being always the judges of the credibility of the witnesses." The plaintiff in error contends that this charge of the court was not authorized by the evidence; and, further, that it put the jury to seeking a conflict, impressed the fact that the defendant had not brought witnesses to court to contradict the state's witnesses, and, further, that the court, having attempted to give the jury the rules for determining the credibility of the witnesses, did not instruct them with that fulness and clearness required by law. In support of the last statement counsel cites the decision in Rouse v. State, 58 S. E. 416, that "reference in the charge to subjects upon which, by law, no charge is necessary without request, requires that the jury be properly instructed on such subjects thus referred to." We think this charge is authorized by the evidence, and that it does not put the jury to seeking a conflict, because one already existed; nor does it, in any sense, contain any intimation, as contended by plaintiff in error, that defendant had not brought witnesses to court to contradict the state's witnesses. In so far as the decision in the Rouse Case, supra, is concerned, the charge is not in conflict with the principle therein announced, because the only subject in which reference is made in the excerpt quoted is to the duty of the jury where there is a conflict in the evidence, and the rule in such event is fully and correctly given by the statement that it is the duty of the jury to reconcile any such conflict, if possible, and that if this cannot be done, the credit is rather to be given to those witnesses which, in the opinion of the jury, are most entitled to credit. This is a very general and absolutely harmless reference of the testimony to the jury, without any reference to any of the rules by which they should measure the credibility of the witnesses. The principle announced in the Rouse Case would have been violated if the court had referred to any one or more of the circumstances by which the credibility of the witnesses may be measured, and in the same connection had omitted to mention other circumstances usually referred to the jury to be used by them in weighing the testimony. For instance, if the court had called the attention of the jury to the fact that they might consider the witnesses' manner of testifying, their intelligence, their means and opportunities of knowing the facts as to which they testified, and the nature of the facts to which they testified, it would have been error not also to have called the attention of the jury to the fact that they should consider the probability or improbability of the testimony and the interest or lack of interest of the witnesses, as well as their personal credibility, so far as the same might legitimately appear from the trial. In other words, to use the principle in the Rouse Case as it is sought to be applied by counsel for plaintiff in error, the judge would have had to refer to one or more of the circumstances which may tend to affect the credibility of the witnesses. If he had done so, he would have been required to charge fully upon the subject. But as he was not required, in the absence of request, to charge upon this subject, there was no error in not referring at all to any of the rules by which the credibility of witnesses is measured. So far as the conflict in testimony was concerned, the excerpt, taken in connection with the whole charge, was properly given and sufficiently full in the absence of a written request.

The sixth, seventh, and eighth grounds assign error on extracts taken from the charge. That portion of the charge referred to by these three exceptions is as follows: "A witness may be impeached by disproving the facts testified to by him. A witness may be impeached by contradictory statements previously made by him as to matters relevant to his testimony and to the case; but, before contradictory statements can be proved against him, his mind should be called with as much certainty as possible to the time, place, person, and circumstances attending the former statement for laying the foundation before introducing such testimony. A witness may be impeached by evidence of general bad character. The impeaching witness should be first asked as to his knowledge of the general character of the witness; and, next, as to what that character is; and, lastly, he may be asked if, from that character, he would believe him on oath. The witness may be sustained by similar proof of character." We cannot fully approve this extract from the charge, for the reason that it was not proper to give to the jury rules which are especially addressed to the discretion of the court; but we fail to see how this could have been harmful to the defendant. This case is not similar to that of R. & D. R. Co. v. Mitchell, 92 Ga. 83, 18 S. E. 290, to which we are cited. Chief Justice Bleckley in that case says: "We have scrutinized the evidence very carefully, and there is no conflict in it on any material issue, and no charge upon the subject was appropriate. No harm would have been done by an instruction merely to reconcile conflicts in the evidence, if any existed and if the jury could reconcile them; but to put the jury on the lookout for other witnesses, witnesses not introduced or accounted for, was rather a dangerous thing, and every one knows to which of the parties this was dangerous." The charge excepted to in that case was: "If you find, from the evidence, that there is a conflict, * * * and you should find that there is a witness or witnesses accessible whose evidence would throw light upon that issue, and that witness or those witnesses were not introduced or accounted for, that circumstance may be considered by you in passing on that issue." There is nothing similar to this in the case at bar, and there is conflict in the evidence, especially between the prosecutrix and the witness Rogers. In the Mitchell Case, supra, the Supreme Court held that the vice in the charge then under consideration was that the court assumed that by possibility the jury might find a conflict in the evidence. In this case the conflict really exists.

In the ninth ground of the amended motion error is assigned as to the following charge: "The state contends that this defendant did on the occasion alleged in the accusation, or within two years prior to that date—that being all that the state has to do in a criminal case, is to prove the transaction alleged in the accusation or indictment having happened two years prior to the date alleged in the accusation," etc. The charge complained of is not a correct statement of the law. The court should have instructed the jury that the state must prove the alleged offense to have been committed within two years prior to the finding of the indictment, or the filing of the accusation, as the case may be. But no harm could have resulted to the defendant, inasmuch as the evidence was uncontradicted that the offense, if any, was committed within less than two years prior to the date of the accusation. If there were conflict in the evidence as to this point, it would be so vital as perhaps to require a new trial. There being no dispute as to this phase of the case, the inaccuracy in the charge of the court falls into the category of harmless errors.

Exceptions are taken, in the tenth ground of the motion, to the charge of the court for failure to instruct the jury as to what facts constitute the crime referred to in the accusation; and complaint is made also that the extract therein contained is an intimation by the court to the jury as to the evidence. The charge complained of is as follows: "The state alleges and contends that they have proven that this defendant did have and carry about his person, not in an open manner and fully exposed to view, a certain pistol." Were this extract the only statement of the court upon the subject, we might concur in the argument with the learned counsel for plaintiff in error that the charge is erroneous. But an examination of the entire charge shows that the court defined to the jury, at the very outset of his instructions, and in the very language of the Code, both of the offenses for which the defendant was being tried. In the absence of request for fuller explanation to the jury, the definition afforded in the terms of the statute is sufficient, and the lack of further instruction is not reversible error.

The complaint in the eleventh ground of the motion is that the court eliminated the defendant's statement from the consideration of the jury by concluding with the following injunction to the jury: "You take this testimony, gentlemen, and the law as given you in charge, and apply it to the testimony, and decide whether or not you believe the defendant did commit either offense or both offenses alleged against him." The jury were properly instructed as to the defendant's statement in another portion of the charge. The statement is not in any technical sense evidence; and, the court having already referred properly to the statement, there was no error in the charge above quoted, nor did it eliminate the statement from the consideration of the jury.

Upon a review of the entire charge, with exception of the errors to which we have referred, and which, in our judgment, were clearly harmless, the case was fairly submitted to the jury. With the credibility of the prosecutrix at issue, with the contentions of the defendant as fairly stated as those on the part of the state, with no expression of opinion on the part of the trial judge to induce their finding, we are not prepared to say that the jury erred in their verdict, or that the court erred in sustaining it by overruling the defendant's motion for new trial. Upon first view the assignments of error seemed grave, but, considered in connection with the charge as a whole, they either disappear from sight or become so shrunken as to afford no obstruction to administration of the law. As said by Chief Justice Bleckley in Brown v. Matthews, 79 Ga. 1, 4 S. E. 13: "A charge torn to pieces and scattered in disjointed fragments may seem objectionable, although, when put together and considered as a whole, it may be perfectly sound. The full charge being in the record, what it lacks when divided is supplied when the parts are all united. United they stand, divided they fall."

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Moultrie; R. L. Shipp, Judge.

Ed. Newsome was convicted of an illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, and brings error. Affirmed.

J. D. McKenzie, Alfred Kilne, and James Humphreys, for plaintiff in error. W. F. Way, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error was convicted on the 16th day of May, 1906, upon an accusation filed that day, in which he was charged with the offense of selling intoxicating liquors in Colquitt county on the 29th day of October, 1907. He waived arraignment, copy of accusation, and list of witnesses, and pleaded not guilty. He did not demur to the accusation. On the trial the evidence showed that he had made a sale of spirituous liquor in Colquitt county on the 29th day of October, 1906. He moved the court to direct a verdict of not guilty, on the ground that the accusation alleged a crime at some subsequent day or impossible date, and that the accusation was not sufficient, on account of this date, to authorize a conviction. The court overruled this motion, and, after argument and the charge of the court, a verdict was rendered finding defendant guilty. On the same day the defendant made a motion in arrest of judgment, upon the following grounds: First, "because the accusation, upon which defendant was tried, alleged and charged that the crime was committed on a day and time subsequent to the day and time of filing the accusation and the trial thereon; the day of filing being May 16, 1906, and the day and time alleged and charged in said accusation being October 29, 1907"; second, "because the verdict and judgment is void and of no effect, based upon an accusation charging a crime subsequent to the date of filing said accusation." The motion in arrest of judgment was overruled. The plaintiff in error excepts to the refusal to direct a verdict of acquittal, and to the judgment in overruling his motion in arrest of judgment.

The only question in the case is whether conviction was warranted on the accusation as written. The insistence of the plaintiff in error, that every indictment or accusation, to support a valid conviction, must charge the crime to have been committed on a definite date previous to the finding of the indictment or filing of the accusation, even though the proof might be any time within the statute of limitations, is not a new one in this state. Counsel for plaintiff in error recognize this fact, and on that account request that we certify this case to the Supreme Court in order that that court may review and reverse the decisions in McMath v. State, 55 Ga. 303, Jones v. State, 55 Ga. 625, Williams v. State, 55 Ga. 391, Harris v. State, 58 Ga. 333, Johnson v. State, 90 Ga. 444, 16 S. E. 92, Adkins v. State, 103 Ga. 5, 29 S. E. 432, Spencer v. State, 123 Ga. 133, 51 S. E. 294, and other similar cases. If the decision in Adkins v. State, supra, were the last utterance of our Supreme Court upon the point, and if the Supreme Court had not so recently passed upon the question, as in the case of Spencer v. State, we would be inclined, simply on account of the intimation in the Adkins Case, to certify the case to the Supreme Court as requested. Regardless of the decisions in other states, and as to whether the Supreme Court was wrong in basing the decisions in the cases of McMath and Jones upon the case of Conner v. State, 25

Ga. 515, 71 Am. Dec. 184, we think that the date on which the offense is laid is immaterial, unless the defendant, before pleading to the merits, demurred thereto. The defendant must demur before pleading, or else he will be held to waive his right to have the essential elements of time and place stated with the certainty required by the Code. In Harris v. State, 58 Ga. 333, Jackson, J., delivering the opinion, says: "This court has often held that after arraignment and plea the indictment alleging an impossible day or the day after the bill was found true would be held good, but not where it was excepted to in time on special demurrer in writing." In Bailey v. State, 85 Ga. 411, the court held that an indictment naming neither a day nor month was defective, and should be quashed on special demurrer before the arraignment; but cited the Harris Case, and said that the defendant was entitled, if he demanded in time, to have a perfect indictment in form as to the essential elements of time and place, and when he demurred specially, before arraignment, he ought to have the time stated with reasonable certainty at least. The Penal Code requires that all exceptions that go merely to the form of the indictment shall be made before trial. If they are not made then, they are held in contemplation of law to be waived. Hill v. State, 41 Ga. 484, 86 Ga. 427. The case cannot be made stronger when an impossible date is stated than when no date is stated at all; and yet it was held in Phillips v. State, 12 S. E. 650, and Braddy v. State, 102 Ga. 508, 27 S. E. 670, that a defect in an indictment in not alleging any date or month when the alleged offense was committed must be taken advantage of before arraignment, and that it is too late after conviction to make the point for the first time.

Judgment affirmed.

MILL v. STATE.

STATE v. MILL. (Nos. 552, 629.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — INSTRUCTIONS — PREPONDERANCE OF EVIDENCE.

The law of the preponderance of evidence is not applicable in criminal cases; and, where in a particular case there is testimony in behalf of the state and the defendant, and the issue to be determined depends upon the weight which the jury may give to the conflicting evidence, it is error to charge said law.

2. SAME — REASONABLE DOUBT.

The only appropriate charge in a criminal case on the subject of the weight of evidence is the fundamental principle that the state is required to prove the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt.

3. SAME — POSITIVE AND NEGATIVE TESTIMONY.

The law of positive and negative testimony was not applicable to the facts of this case, and a charge thereon was calculated to confuse and mislead the jury, and was especially erroneous without an instruction that in weighing the testimony of witnesses the jury should also consider and pass upon their credibility.

4. SAME — NEW TRIAL.

The evidence indicating the guilt of the defendant is weak and not entirely satisfactory; but there is some slight evidence to support the verdict, and we cannot hold that the court erred in the exercise of its discretion in refusing to grant a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, §§ 3074-3083.]

5. SAME — CROSS-BILL BY STATE — COSTS.

There is no law by which the state can maintain a cross-bill of exceptions in a criminal case; and in such a case, there being no provision of law for taxing the cost against the state, the cost will be taxed, under Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5512, 5501, against the solicitor bringing the cross-bill.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Wrightsville; Wm. Faircloth, Judge.

Otto Mill was convicted of maliciously killing a hog, and brings error, and the state assigns cross-error. Reversed.

See 57 S. E. 969.

E. L. Stephens, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Kent, Sol., for the State.

HILL, C. J. Otto Mill was convicted in the city court of Wrightsville on an accusation charging him with the offense of maliciously killing a certain described hog. He filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled. This is the second time that plaintiff in error has appeared before this court. The verdict of guilty against him was set aside in the first instance because of the failure to prove the venue.

If we had authority to do so, we would be inclined to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial on the ground of the weakness of the evidence for the state; but, if the jury believed the prosecutor, there was some evidence on which a verdict of guilty could have been predicated, and therefore we cannot hold that the trial judge abused his discretion in refusing to grant a new trial. The only evidence against the defendant is that of the prosecutor, who testified that he found his hog dead just outside of the field of the defendant with wounds upon its body, indicating that death had been caused by violence, and the statement by the defendant to him that he had killed the hog and thrown it over the fence. This confession was denied by the defendant, and there was much evidence in his behalf which tended to prove that no hog had been killed by him, several witnesses swearing that they had made diligent search at and near the place where the prosecutor located the body of the dead hog, without finding it, and several other witnesses testified that they had seen the hog described by the prosecutor as having been killed subsequently alive in the prosecutor's lot, and there were no marks upon its body except that its tail had been recently bitten off or cut off. The defendant stated, on his trial, that the hog in question had been committing depredations in his cornfield, and that he set his dog on it to run it out, and that the dog had bitten off the hog's tail. The prosecutor testified that this tailless hog was not the one that the defendant had killed, but that this hog had been without a tail since its "plghood." In addition to the weakness of the evidence indicating guilt, there was shown to be a very bad state of feeling between the prosecutor and the defendant. In view of the character of the evidence, we think the court erred:

1. In charging the law of the preponderance of evidence. The entire charge of the court is not given in the record. The excerpt from the charge on the subject of the preponderance of evidence led the jury to believe that they would be authorized to base a conviction on the greater weight of the evidence. We think, under the facts of this case, that this instruction was not only calculated to mislead the jury, but was hurtful to the defendant. This is especially true where there was, as in this case, only one witness for the state and many for the defendant, and the court told the jury that, while they could consider the number of witnesses in deciding upon the weight of the evidence, the preponderance was not necessarily with the greater number. Williams v. State, 125 Ga. 302, 54 S. E. 108; Jackson v. State, 125 Ga. 101, 53 S. E. 607.

2. The court charged the jury the law of positive and negative testimony as defined in Pen. Code 1895, § 985. This charge was not applicable to the facts of the case, and was calculated to mislead and confuse the jury. Besides, the court, in this connection, failed to instruct the jury that in weighing the testimony of the witnesses they should also consider and pass upon their credibility. This, we think, was error. Wood v. State, 1 Ga. App. 684, 58 S. E. 271; Phillips v. State, 1 Ga. App. 687, 57 S. E. 1079.

3. Error is also assigned because the court failed to charge the jury the law of confessions; it being insisted that such law was especially applicable in this case, where the only evidence incriminating the defendant was his confession, and this confession was corroborated only by circumstances proving the corpus delicti. While we think that such charge would have been appropriate to the facts of this case, we cannot hold that court committed error in not so charging where there was no request to do so.

For the reasons stated in the second and third paragraphs in the foregoing opinion, the judgment refusing a new trial is reversed.

There is no law in this state authorizing the state to maintain a cross-bill of exceptions in a criminal case.

Judgment reversed.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. LEWIS. (No. 438.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1907.)

1. DISCOVERY—PRODUCTION OF BOOKS AND PAPERS—MATERIALITY—QUESTION FOR COURT.

Summons of garnishment having been served upon a corporation, and it having answered by its agent, denying that it had any money, property, or effects belonging to the defendant, which answer was traversed by the plaintiff, who thereupon served the garnishee with notice to produce certain vouchers and original checks, as well as certain letters described in the notice, which were not produced, it was error for the court to pass an order peremptorily requiring the production of such papers until satisfied by competent evidence that the contents of such papers were in fact necessary and material to the issues involved between the parties. It was therefore error to render judgment against the garnishee in pursuance of such peremptory order.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 16, Discovery, § 115.]

2. SAME.

The determination of the materiality of evidence involves the exercise of a judicial function; and the conclusion of a witness that the contents of a paper are material, where there is no proof as to what the paper contains, is no proof that the papers sought to be produced are in fact necessary, and cannot relieve the court from the duty of passing upon the question of materiality.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by W. C. Lewis against the Macon Fair Association. A writ of garnishment was served on the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff on the garnishment, and the railway company brings error. Reversed.

R. D. Feagin and Wimberly & Jordan, for plaintiff in error. Hardeman & Jones, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant in error brought a suit against the Macon Fair Association, and had summons of garnishment served upon the plaintiff in error, the Central of Georgia Railway Company. The garnishee answered that it was not indebted, and the plaintiff (present defendant in error) traversed that answer. On April 1, 1907, the court entered judgment against the garnishee as in case of default for $1,301.31, and to this judgment the garnishee excepts.

The action of the court was based upon the failure or refusal of the plaintiff in error (the garnishee in the lower court) to satisfactorily respond to a notice to produce, and upon a refusal thereafter to produce certain vouchers and other papers after being required so to do by order of the court. Error is assigned upon this order of the court rendering judgment by default, and complaint is also made that there was no proper service of the notice to traverse. It appears from the record that "on Saturday, March 30, 1907, the case was called for trial before the judge without a jury; and counsel for the garnishee asked for further time within which to respond to a notice to produce, filed in said case by the plaintiff and served upon counsel for the garnishee on March 16, 1907, stating that the garnishee had endeavored to get the papers called for, but had been unable to hear from the agents of the garnishee in Savannah, Ga., in whose custody the papers (if in possession of the garnishee) were." The notice filed in the case, and to respond to which counsel for garnishee requested additional time, was as follows: "To the Central of Georgia Railway Company: You are hereby notified to produce upon the trial of the said case in the city court of Macon, to be used as evidence for the plaintiff, the originals of all vouchers issued by the Central of Georgia Railway Company to the Macon Fair Association, or to Eugene Anderson, secretary of said Macon Fair Association, or to Bridges Smith, president of said Macon Fair Association, or to any other officer or agent of said Macon Fair Association, or to any one else for said Macon Fair Association; also the original checks with which said vouchers were paid; also the copies retained by the Central of Georgia Railway Company of all letters transmitting said vouchers, or any of them." This was signed by the plaintiff's attorneys, and an acknowledgment of service thereon, dated March 16, 1907, was signed by Mr. Feagin as attorney for the garnishee. Counsel for garnishee stated in his place that he had delivered the notice to produce (the copy) to Messrs. Wimberly & Jordan, division counsel, at Macon, Ga., on March 20, 1907, his first opportunity to do so after receiving it from plaintiff's counsel, and that the division counsel at once, on March 20, 1907, wrote to the proper authorities at Savannah, requesting that the papers called for by said notice be forwarded to Macon at once, if in the possession of the garnishee, and that no reply had been received as yet to said request. The court then announced that counsel would be given until 9 o'clock Monday morning, April 1, 1907, to respond to said notice and to produce said papers, and, over the objection of counsel for the garnishee, passed the following order and judgment: "The within notice to produce having been duly served on March 16, 1907, and it appearing that the papers required are in existence and are in possession, power, and control of the garnishee, the person notified to produce the same, and that said papers are material to the issue, it is so found, and it is thereupon ordered that the garnishee, the Central of Georgia Railway Company, do have and produce the papers described in the within notice before the court on April 1, 1907, at 9 o'clock

a. m., or, in default, that judgment be entered thereon and thereupon against said garnishee as in case of judgments by default. This March 30, 1907." The plaintiff in error contends that this judgment was error, because there was no evidence before the court upon which to base it. The judge certifies that "counsel for the party giving notice stated in his place that the papers called for were material to the case, and that they were in the custody of the garnishee in the city of Savannah, Ga., and were not in the custody or control or possession of the applicant, and that as a matter of fact the applicant could get along if one little voucher were produced under the notice, and that the same was in garnishee's possession in Savannah, Ga. Counsel for the garnishee then said that he wanted further time to produce this voucher which was in Savannah, and the court then asked would Monday following be sufficient time." On Monday, April 1, 1907, before the case was called by the court for trial, counsel for the garnishee filed the following demand in writing for a jury: "Now comes the Central of Georgia Railway Company, garnishee in the above-stated case, and at the term of court at which said garnishment was answered and before the trial of the issue raised by the traverse to the answer of the garnishees filed in said case, and in terms of the law, demands a trial by jury, on the issue raised by the traverse in said case." Signed by the garnishee's attorney. When the case was called, counsel for the garnishee called the court's attention to this demand and insisted that the same be allowed; but the court refused to consider said demand, holding that the same was not in order, and called upon the garnishee to know if it were ready to respond to the notice to produce.

Two questions are raised as presented by the record, to wit: Should the traverse have been dismissed? Did the court err or abuse its discretion in entering judgment by default, because of the failure of the garnishee to produce the voucher? A notice to produce is a harsh procedure, and the law relative thereto must, for that reason, be strictly construed and followed closely. We think the court erred in granting the peremptory order requiring the garnishee to have the papers in court by 9 o'clock a. m. of April 1, 1907, and also in the judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff against the garnishee. The learned counsel for defendant in error would be right in his conclusion of law if his premises were correct. The court should have had evidence before it on which to base the proceedings taken, and the party giving them notice (defendant in error) should have made the showing required by Civ. Code 1895, § 5250. Counsel for defendant in error relies upon the recital of the court in the bill of exceptions that "counsel for the party giving notice stated in his place that the papers called for were material to the case, and that they were in the custody of the garnishee in the city of Savannah, Ga., and were not in the custody or control or possession of the applicant, and that as a matter of fact the applicant could get along if one little voucher were produced under notice, and that the same was in garnishee's possession in Savannah, Ga." This evidence was competent and sufficient in some respects, and yet it was fatally defective in a most important particular. It was shown that the voucher was in Savannah by the admission of the counsel for the garnishee, and he asked for time in which to produce it, and, although it was not necessary, under the ruling in Morrison v. Hilburn, 126 Ga. 114, 54 S. E. 938, the judgment was introduced in evidence, but there was no evidence as to the contents of the paper sought to be produced, nor that they were material to the issue, and, for this reason, the court should not have granted the peremptory order in the first place, and rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the garnishee thereafter. It is true that, according to the certificate of the presiding judge, counsel stated that the papers called for were material, but this was a mere conclusion of the witness, and not competent evidence, which substituted the judgment of the counsel as to the materiality of the testimony for that of the court, and so far as the trial court knew or could know, and so far as this court can know, there is not a single fact as to the contents of the papers in question from which it can be judicially determined whether the contents of the papers sought to be produced are or are not material to the issue, and as to whether the witness was or was not correct in his conclusion of law. At any rate, in the exercise of harsh remedies, the law should be strictly construed. It would have to be very loosely construed for the statement of a witness, no matter how truthful, that the contents of a certain paper or papers are material to be allowed to oust the judicial function of passing upon the materiality of evidence. Had the trial judge, upon evidence of the contents of the vouchers, properly held them to be material, we might be able to determine, upon review, that such evidence was material, and for that reason, we might be prepared to say that the judgment rendered against the garnishee was correct. In the absence of such evidence, the judge could not say that the evidence was material. Nor can we. It is unnecessary to discuss the remaining assignments of error, for the reason that the error of the judge in passing upon the case without sufficient evidence goes to the root of the whole case and demands a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

LEE v. STATE. (No. 556.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 19, 1907.)

HOMICIDE—VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

The verdict of the jury is sustained by the evidence, the law was correctly presented by the trial judge in his charge, and no reason appears why a new trial should be granted.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Clayton County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Will Lee was convicted of manslaughter, and brings error. Affirmed.

Watterson & Blalock, Candler, Thomson & Hirsch, and R. L. D. McAllister, for plaintiff in error. W. S. Howard, Sol. Gen., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error was indicted for murder, and convicted for voluntary manslaughter. He excepts to the overruling of his motion for a new trial, and assigns error as to certain instructions given by the trial judge in his charge to the jury, as well as upon the judge's refusal to charge. He complains of the admission of evidence as to dying declarations and of the failure of the state to introduce the testimony of a certain witness. In view of the fact that the plaintiff in error was only found guilty of voluntary manslaughter, and not of murder, some assignments of error are immaterial in their effect on the defendant; but we will consider each assignment seriatim.

The first assignment of error alleges that the charge of the court confused the provisions of sections 71 and 73 of the Penal Code of 1895, and tended to create upon the minds of the jury the impression that the provisions of section 73 qualify and limit the provisions of section 71. It is well settled that section 73 does not qualify or limit the law of justifiable homicide contained in section 71, Pen. Code 1895. Section 73 applies exclusively to cases of self-defense in a mutual combat in which both parties have been at fault. Section 71 refers to cases of apparent danger when the homicide is committed in good faith to prevent the commission of any of the offenses mentioned in section 70, or under the fears of a reasonable man that such an offense will actually be committed unless the person who is actually or apparently about to commit the wrong be killed. Our Supreme Court has held that "Instructions as to these two branches of the law of justifiable homicide should not be so given as to confuse the one with the other." In the cases of Teasley v. State, 104 Ga. 738, 30 S. E. 938, and Ragland v. State, 111 Ga. 211, 36 S. E. 682, new trials were granted because the practical effect of the charges therein complained of was to deprive the defendant of any right of self-defense unless his life were actually in dan ger, while as a matter of law the defendant had an equal right to kill in order to prevent a felony upon his person or as to his property.

In this case the trial judge, after charging the jury that "if, at the time of the killing of White by the defendant (if the defendant is shown to have killed White), the circumstances were such as to excite the fears of a reasonable man that a felony was about to be committed on his person, and if, under the influence of such fears, if such existed, Lee shot and killed White, he would not be guilty of any offense, but would be entitled to a verdict of not guilty," and repeating the same principle by instructing the jury, "If you believe from the evidence or from the defendant's statement the deceased was not, at the time he was slain by the accused, attempting to commit a felony on the person of the accused by taking his life or otherwise, yet if the circumstances at the time were such to the defendant as a reasonable man that he believed it was necessary for him to shoot and kill in order to save himself from an assault amounting to a felony upon him, the killing would be justifiable," proceeded to say: "If a person kill another in self-defense, it must appear that the danger was urgent or was apparently so to the defendant at the time of the killing; that in order to save himself from a serious personal injury, or to save his own life, the killing of the other was absolutely necessary. It must appear, also, that the person killed was the assailant, or that the slayer had really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle when the mortal blow was given."

We are of the opinion that, had the court charged section 73 in immediate connection with the instructions first quoted, the exception might have been well taken, because the jury might have been confused; but the judge, after saying that it must appear that the danger was so urgent and pressing, also referred to the other separate defense by adding, "or was apparently so to the defendant," and instead of limiting the jury to a killing done in order to save the defendant's own life he adds as an additional right of the defendant the right to kill "to save himself from a serious personal injury," so that, instead of confusion, the legal right contained in sections 71 and 73 were both clearly presented to the jury. One who slays another can only claim immunity under the doctrine of absolute self-defense when the danger is urgent and pressing, and the danger must at least appear to be equally as urgent and pressing before the doctrine of reasonable fears will apply. "The doctrine of reasonable fear as a defense does not apply in any case of homicide where the danger apprehended is not urgent and pressing, or apparently so at the time of the killing." Jackson v. State, 91 Ga. 271, 18 S. E. 298 (1), 44 Am. St. Rep. 22. In the case of Williams v. State, 120 Ga. 873, 48 S. E. 368, it was insisted that an instruction similar to the one of which complaint is made in this case was not applicable, and could only be applicable in a case where the evidence disclosed a mutual intent to fight; but the Supreme Court refused to concur in that view.

Plaintiff in error also insists that the law contained in section 71 of the Penal Code of 1895 is confused with that contained in section 73, and that the impression was created upon the minds of the jury that the law contained in section 73 qualified and limited that contained in section 71, by the following charge of the court: "If you have a reasonable doubt, gentlemen, as to whether the defendant acted, when he shot, under circumstances calculated to excite the fears of a reasonable man, or whether he felt at the time he shot, or had reason to feel from the circumstances, that it was necessary to shoot to save his life, limb, or person, he would be justified in so doing. But, gentlemen, I charge you, further, if you believe from the evidence in this case, or from the statement of the defendant, that White, the deceased, made an assault upon the defendant with a dangerous weapon, such as a fire poker, and you find that such a weapon, if it had been used upon the defendant by White, would have been a weapon, thus used, that would likely have produced death, yet if you believe that the deceased desisted, and put down the weapon, and was making no effort with such weapon, or any other weapon, to inflict an injury upon the defendant at the time he was shot by the defendant, and it further appears that the defendant shot him, not in the fear of a reasonable man that he was in any serious personal danger at the time, but that he shot him in a passion aroused as a result of an assault that had ended, and for no other cause, then, gentlemen, the defendant would not be justifiable in thus killing him, but would at least be guilty of the offense of voluntary manslaughter." In our opinion the defendant could not reasonably expect a more favorable charge than the foregoing, and there is no merit in the objection that sections 71 and 73 are confused by the language employed.

The instruction just quoted is also objected to because of the use of the words "at least," and because it is contended that the law relating to homicides growing out of mutual combat was not applicable to the case. We do not agree to the contention that the use of the words "at least" amount to an intimation of opinion on the part of the judge as to the guilt of the accused. It is a deprecatory, rather than an inflammatory, expletive. As a matter of fact, if the defendant shot the deceased after an assault already ended and when he was in no possible danger, the court could have very aptly instructed the jury that the killing might be murder.

As to the remaining objections, it is well settled that mutual combat can exist where there is mutual intent to fight, though only one of the parties strikes a blow. We have not discussed the two foregoing assignments of error more at length, for the reason that no complaint is made as to the instructions given by the trial judge on the subject of voluntary manslaughter, and the evidence fully authorized the verdict of the jury finding the defendant guilty of that grade of homicide.

Certain evidence was admitted as to statements, alleged to have been made by the deceased, which it is contended were improper and prejudicial to the defendant. Mrs. Tigner testified that the deceased said it was not done in self-defense; that Will Lee did not have to do it; that he regretted very much that it happened; that he wanted to live; that he had lots to live for, but was not afraid to die. "He said that he would like to live for the sake of his old mother, who was blind." Upon defendant's counsel objecting to this evidence, and moving to strike out, the court sustained the objection by merely saying, "yes," and certified that he intended thereby to sustain the objection, and was so understood by counsel. As no further ruling of the court was invoked consensus tollit errorem, the plaintiff in error cannot be heard to complain. Niagara Ins. Co. v. Williams, 1 Ga. App. 603, 57 S. E. 1018.

We cannot sustain the objection made to the admission of the evidence relating to dying declarations, upon the ground that the proper foundation had not been laid, inasmuch as it appears to show that there was ample evidence that the deceased was in articulo mortis and conscious of his condition. Certainly the evidence was sufficient to require the court to submit to the jury, under proper instructions, as he did, the question as to whether the statements were really dying declarations. Nor did the court err in refusing to charge the requests of the defendant's counsel upon the subject of dying declarations, because the legal principles contained in the request, so far as pertinent to the case, were fully covered in the charge of the court upon that subject.

Plaintiff in error insists that the court erred in refusing to charge the jury, as requested in writing, that "where a party has evidence in his power and within his reach by which he can establish a fact, if it be true, or a condition, if it exists, and omits to produce it, or, having more certain and satisfactory evidence in his power, relies upon that which is of a weaker and inferior nature to prove his claim, a presumption arises that the facts are not as claimed by him, or that the circumstances do not exist." Movant contends that this charge was pertinent and applicable, and should have been given to the jury, for the following reasons: "It appeared from the evidence of the witness R. O. Settles, as contended, that at the time when movant went into the office of the railroad company, just prior to the shooting, there was present, besides the deceased, White, and the witness Settles, one John Taylor, who heard and saw everything that occurred between the deceased and movant up to the time of the shooting; that both Taylor and Settles left the room prior to the shooting, Taylor leaving before Settles; that at the time the shooting occurred Settles was in such a position that he could not possibly have seen the parties, but that when Settles arrived on the platform outside the office where the difficulty took place, immediately afterwards, he found Taylor standing just outside a window commanding a view of the interior of the office. It thus appeared from the state's own evidence that the only witness to the shooting was Taylor, who was present in the courtroom at the time of the trial, but was never introduced as a witness. No reason was given by the Solicitor General why Taylor was not introduced in evidence. It affirmatively appeared that Settles did not see the shooting, and that there was no eyewitness, unless it was Taylor. Taylor was in no way connected with deceased or movant, and in view of these facts, all of which appeared on the trial of the case, and in view of the argument of counsel for the defendant thereon, movant contends that it was the duty of the court to have submitted to the jury the question whether Taylor did see the shooting, and, if so, to charge the rule of law embodied in the request quoted." There is no merit in this ground of the motion, in view of the fact that the defendant could have introduced the witness as well as the state. There was no evidence showing that the witness Taylor actually saw the combat, or that his testimony would be any more certain or satisfactory than that of the witness Settles; and the state, as any other party, has the right to rely upon the rule that the testimony of a single witness is generally sufficient to establish a fact.

There is no merit in any of the remaining grounds of the motion for new trial, all of which relate to requests to charge which were not given by the court. The principle involved in each of these requests was fully and clearly presented to the jury in the charge as delivered, and no possible ground for complaint appears. The defendant might well have been convicted of the offense of murder. He certainly has no reason to complain of the leniency extended by the jury in basing their verdict upon the theory advanced by his own statement as to the offense, and very fully and fairly presented by the judge in his charge to the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

DEAN v. DONALSON. (No. 141.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 19, 1907.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—JURISDICTION—DISTRESS WARRANT.

Any justice of the peace within the county where the debtor may reside or where his property may be found can issue a distress warrant for rent, and unless the amount claimed exceeds $100 such justice has jurisdiction to try the issue made by a counter affidavit, whether the defendant resides in his district or the property be found in his district or not, provided the county be that of the defendant's residence.

2. EXECUTORS—ACTIONS BY—DISTRESS.

An executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee can sue out a distress warrant in his individual capacity, and terms indicating a representative capacity, if used, may be treated and disregarded as surplusage.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; Albert H. Russell, Judge pro hac.

Action by J. R. Donalson, executor of C. U. Curry, against Frank Dean. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Byron Bower, for plaintiff in error. A. E. Thornton, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. J. R. Donalson, as executor of the will of C. U. Curry, rented certain premises to Frank Dean. The rented premises were part of the estate of the deceased. On the 8th of November, 1905, a distress warrant was issued by W. G. D. Tonge, notary public and ex officio justice of the peace of the 513th district, G. M., of Decatur county, in favor of Donalson, executor, and against Dean, for the sum of $100. The constable levied on certain personal property of the defendant in the 1,188th district of said county. The defendant filed a counter affidavit and bond, and the papers were returned to the justice of the 513th district, who had issued the warrant. When the case was called in its order the defendant filed a plea to the jurisdiction, showing that he resided in the 1,188th district, G. M., and had never resided in the 513th district. Counsel for Donalson in open court admitted the facts set up on the plea. Thereupon defendant moved to dismiss the levy and quash the warrant, upon the ground that the justice of the 513th district had no jurisdiction of the person or property of the defendant. The magistrate overruled the motions and refused to transfer the case to the court which defendant claims had proper jurisdiction, and over defendant's objection proceeded with the trial. On the trial the plaintiff put in evidence the affidavit and distress warrant, the entry of levy, the will of his testator, showing that he was therein named executor, and testified that as executor he rented the premises to Dean, and that the rent was due and unpaid. On cross-examination he testified that Frank Dean did not owe him anything individually, that there was no contract between the defendant and himself individually, and that the amount due was due the estate of C. U. Curry, the deceased, of which he was executor. Plaintiff having then closed, the defendant moved that the levy be dismissed and the warrant quashed, and for a judgment in his favor, upon the ground that the evidence showed that whatever debt or contract existed was with the estate of C. U. Curry, and not with Donalson, and that the proceedings were one for James R. Donalson individually; the words "as executor of the estate of C. U. Curry" and the word "executor" being merely descriptive personæ. This motion the court also overruled, and granted a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, as executor of the estate of C. U. Curry, against the defendant (now plaintiff in error) and the securities on his bond. The plaintiff in error insisted that both rulings were erroneous, and carried the case by certiorari to the superior court; but the certiorari was dismissed by his honor, Albert H. Russell, judge pro hac vice.

Three questions are made by the record: (1) Could the justice of the peace issue the distress warrant? (2) Did the justice issuing the warrant have jurisdiction to try the issue raised by the counter affidavit, when it was admitted that the defendant lived in a different district? (3) Was the plaintiff entitled, under the evidence, to a judgment in his favor?

1. As has heretofore been held by this court in Woolsey v. Lawshe, 1 Ga. App. 817, 57 S. E. 1039, any justice of the peace of the county where the debtor resides or has property can issue a distress warrant; for this is the express provision of section 4818, Civ. Code 1895. See, also, Almand v. Scott, 83 Ga. 403, 11 S. E. 653 (2); Jones v. Wiley, 82 Ga. 745, 9 S. E. 614. So that the right of the justice to issue the distress warrant in this case cannot be questioned.

2. The answer to the second question is not so absolutely clear, so far as direct authority is concerned. At least, we have been unable to find any Georgia case where it has been distinctly decided in terms that any justice of the peace of the county can try the issue made by distress warrant and the counter affidavit. But in the case of Jones v. Wiley, while this question was not then before the court, Justice Simmons, in rendering the opinion, draws a distinction between the foreclosure of liens in a justice's court and the issuance of a distress warrant, and the intimation is strong that the justice who issues a distress warrant, if the amount be not greater than $100, would have jurisdiction to try any issue arising thereon. The motion made in this case was to dismiss the levy, and Chief Justice Bleckley in Almand v. Scott, 83 Ga. 403, 11 S. E. 653, in the latter portion of the third headnote, holds that the fact that a distress warrant is returnable to another district does not entitle a claimant to have the levy dismissed. No opinion was delivered in the Almand Case, but from the statements of facts in that case it appears that it was tried in the district of the defendant's residence, and from the reading of the whole third headnote it is clear that the learned Chief Justice construed the words "the court having cognizance thereof," in section 4819, Civ. Code 1895, as we do, as meaning the court which issued the warrant; this subject, however, to the exception provided in section 4818, that if the sums claimed to be due exceed $100 the issue shall be tried either in a county, city or a superior court. We think there is no question that the words "having cognizance thereof," quoted above, give the justice of any district in the county of defendant's residence, who has issued a distress warrant, the right to try any issue which may be raised by a counter affidavit. In ordinary parlance, to have cognizance of means to have knowledge of, and the only court necessarily presumed to have knowledge of the issuance of a summary proceeding, such as a distress warrant, would be the justice who has issued it. But the legal meaning of the word "cognizance" is broader than its ordinary meaning. It not only implies knowledge of the subject-matter, but power to deal with it. "Cognizance" is a word of the greatest import, embracing all power, authority, and jurisdiction." Webster v. Commonwealth, 59 Mass. 386. And the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in Clarion County v. Western Hospital for Insane, 111 Pa. 339, 3 Atl. 97, held that the word "cognizance," as used in a statute providing that an application may be made "to any judge learned in the law of any court within this commonwealth having immediate cognizance of the crime," is used in the sense of "the right to take notice of and determine a cause."

3. As to the third point, it is sufficient to say that there is no variance between the judgment rendered and the affidavit and warrant, and, treating the words "executor of the estate of C. U. Curry" as being really descriptio personae, both the proceedings and the judgment may be treated as in favor of Donalson as an individual. And yet, as it is undisputed that the contract of rent was made by the defendant for realty belonging to the estate of the testator and that Donalson is his executor, he could sue and recover, as he has, as an individual. It has frequently been held that a note made payable to an administrator is the property of such individual, and not of the estate of his intestate, and the rule would be the same in regard to any other contract as if it were evidenced by a note. "The legal title to promissory notes and other evidences of debt taken by a guardian, executor, or administrator is in such guardian, administrator, or executor, and he has the right to collect or sell and transfer the same, passing the legal title thereof to the transferee." Fountain v. Anderson, 33 Ga. 379 (6). And the court proceeds to say that, although the purchaser of a note in such a case may know that the note belonged to an estate, the purchaser is not liable to account for the amount of the note so purchased or any loss accruing thereby if the transaction is made in good faith. "Every guardian, administrator, or executor is prima facie liable to his ward or the estate represented for all notes taken by him" (and, we may say, for all debts becoming due to him) "in the discharge of the duties of his office, such as notes taken for property, sold, rented, or hired, etc." See, also, Zellner, Administrator, v. Cleveland et al., 69 Ga. 633; Saffold v. Banks, 69 Ga. 289, 293. This ruling is made upon the theory that the descriptio personae should be rejected as surplusage, and that the entire proceeding can properly be treated as being carried on by Donalson individually. So far as the evidence in this case shows, the defendant in error could have sued out the distress warrant in the first instance in his own name, under the third exception provided in section 3037, Civ. Code 1895. Morgan v. Morgan, 65 Ga. 493; Spence v. Wilson, 102 Ga. 764, 29 S. E. 713; Fargason v. Ford, 119 Ga. 343, 46 S. E. 431, and cases therein cited.

HARRIS v. STATE. (No. 608.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 19, 1907.)

HOMICIDE—VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—VERDICT.

The evidence submitted authorized the charge made by the court upon the subject of voluntary manslaughter, as well as the verdict of the jury finding the defendant guilty of that offense. The case is controlled upon the facts, as to part of the evidence, by the decision in Gann v. State, 30 Ga. 67. The verdict was not a compromise; but, the evidence presenting three theories as the truth of the case, the right and duty of selection, being upon the jury, was properly exercised by them.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Homicide, §§ 56, 59, 540.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Coweta County; R. W. Freeman, Judge.

Ben Harris was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and brings error. Affirmed.

W. A. Post and W. C. Wright, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Terrell, Sol. Gen., and W. L. Stallings, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error was indicted for the offense of murder, and found guilty of the offense of voluntary manslaughter. He excepts to the judgment overruling his motion for new trial. Only two questions are made in the record: Did the evidence authorize the verdict? and did the court err in charging the jury upon the subject of voluntary manslaughter?

It is insisted by learned counsel for plaintiff in error that a new trial should have been granted on each of the grounds of the original motion, and especially on the ground set forth in the amended motion, which complained that the court erred in charging the jury the law of voluntary manslaughter, for the reason that under the evidence and statement of the defendant this law was wholly inapplicable to the case. The rule may be stated to be that where the evidence, in every view, requires a finding of murder or of not guilty, the law of voluntary manslaughter should not be given in charge, though if the evidence and defendant's statement clearly shows that the defendant should have been found guilty of murder, and he is only convicted of voluntary manslaughter, he will not be heard to complain, although the jury may have been instructed as to the law of voluntary manslaughter when it was not applicable to the case. In the present case the court properly instructed the jury as to the law of voluntary manslaughter.

The charge upon this subject, which is excepted to as inapplicable to the evidence, is as follows: "You will observe, gentlemen, that one of the material facts in the bill of indictment to which I call your attention is that if it be true that Ben Harris did, in the county of Coweta, on or about the time charged in the indictment unlawfully make an assault upon Pete Boozer, as charged in the bill of indictment, with a loaded gun, and if you further believe that the assault was unlawful, yet, gentlemen, if you do not believe that it was made with malice, and if you believe that he shot and killed him, yet, gentlemen, if you do not believe that he killed him with malice why then, as before stated, you could not convict him of the crime of murder; but you could consider, gentlemen, whether or not under the evidence in this case he was guilty of the offense of voluntary manslaughter. Now, manslaughter, the law says, is the unlawful killing of a human creature, without malice, either express or implied, and without any mixture of deliberation whatever. Murder, you will note, is the unlawful killing with malice. Manslaughter is the unlawful killing without malice. In both cases the killing is unlawful and intentional. The deliberative intent to kill is the distinctive element that differentiates murder from manslaughter. In all cases of voluntary manslaughter the result must be some actual assault upon the person killing, or an attempt by the person killed to commit a serious personal injury on the person killing, or other equivalent circumstance to justify the excitement of passion, and to exclude all idea of deliberation or malice, either express or implied. Provocation by words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures shall in no case be sufficient to free the person killing from the guilt and crime of murder. The killing must be the result of that sudden, violent impulse of passion supposed to be irresistible; for if there should have been an interval between the assault or provocation given and the homicide, of which the jury in all cases shall be the judges, sufficient for the voice of reason and humanity to be heard, the killing shall be attributed to deliberate revenge, and be punished as murder. You will observe, gentlemen, from the definition I have given you, to reduce a killing that is unlawful from murder to manslaughter, the law says there must be some actual assault upon the person killing, or an attempt by the person killed to commit a serious personal injury on the person killing, or other equivalent circumstances to justify the excitement of passion, and to exclude all idea of deliberation or malice. Now, an assault is defined to be an attempt to commit violent injury upon the person of another. A serious personal injury means an injury greater than a provocation by mere words, and less than a felony. So, gentlemen, you look to the evidence in this case, and determine from the evidence whether or not this man Pete Boozer, the deceased, made an assault upon the person of Ben Harris. If he made an assault, gentlemen, then determine whether it was a felonious assault. If he made an assault, gentlemen, but it was not a felonious assault, why, gentlemen, you could consider whether or not the assault made, if less than felonious, whether or not such an assault would justify the excitement of passion and exclude all idea of deliberation and malice, either express or implied. You can consider, gentlemen, whether or not the deceased, Pete Boozer, made an attempt to commit a serious personal injury upon the defendant, Ben Harris—an injury, gentlemen, that would be less than felony. You can consider whether or not there were other equivalent circumstances; that is, circumstances that would produce the same state of mind that an assault would produce. If you should believe, gentlemen, that this excitement of passion that is supposed to be irresistible was thus engendered by an assault, or by an attempt to commit a serious personal injury by an assault that is less than a felony, on the defendant, or if there were other equivalent circumstances that would justify the excitement of passion and to exclude all idea of malice, either express or implied, and if the defendant acted under such a passion, and not in a spirit of revenge, and shot and killed Pete Boozer, why then, gentlemen, he would not be guilty of murder; but, if not acting under circumstances of justification, he would be guilty of the offense of voluntary manslaughter. But to reduce a crime from murder to voluntary manslaughter the killing must be the result of that sudden, violent impulse of passion supposed to be irresistible; for if there should have been an interval of time between the provocation and the homicide sufficient for the voice of reason and humanity to be heard, of which the jury in all cases shall be the judge, the killing shall be attributed to deliberate revenge, and shall be punished as murder. So, gentlemen, in applying the law of voluntary manslaughter to this case, if you do apply it, you may look to the evidence, taking into consideration the statement of the defendant, to see what assault less than a felony was made by Pete Boozer upon Ben Harris. If not, see what attempt was made, if any, to commit a serious personal injury upon Ben Harris, if any was made, less than a felony. Take it all into consideration, gentlemen. If such an assault was made, or such an attempt to commit a serious personal injury was made, by the deceased upon the defendant, and it engendered that sudden, violent impulse of passion which is supposed to be irresistible, and the defendant acted under the impulse of passion, if the passion was thus engendered, and he acted under it, and shot and killed Pete Boozer under the influence of this passion, and not in a spirit of revenge, as before stated, he should not be guilty of murder, but would be guilty of voluntary manslaughter, if you find that the killing was not done under circumstances of justification, to which I will presently call your attention. So that, gentlemen, upon this branch of the case, if you find that it is true that Pete Boozer is dead, and that the defendant, Ben Harris, killed him, as charged in the bill of indictment, and you should find that he killed him intentionally, and that the killing was unlawful, and you find that the killing was the result of that sudden, violent impulse of passion supposed to be irresistible, and not under circumstances of justification, and you further believe that the interval between the assault or provocation given, if any was given, and the homicide, was not sufficient for the voice of reason and humanity to be heard, of which time the jury in all cases shall be the judges, then, gentlemen, the defendant, under such circumstances, would be guilty of the offense of voluntary manslaughter."

We have quoted the above portion of the charge to the jury, which is excepted to in its entirety, because we think it especially pertinent to the evidence and clearly expressed to the jury; and in view of the evidence in the case the excerpt from the charge complained of is its own best answer to the complaint. We have very closely scrutinized the evidence and applied it to the above quotation from the charge, with the result that we are satisfied that voluntary manslaughter was involved in the case. The jury were properly instructed upon the subject, and their verdict, finding the defendant guilty of manslaughter, was authorized. The evidence in the case was very voluminous. It could be of no practical benefit to indulge in a long and tedious rehearsal of the facts submitted to the jury, and we have, therefore, contented ourselves with simply stating the conclusions deducible from the evidence. According to some of the testimony for the state the deceased was standing still and looking downward when he was shot by the defendant. This evidence would authorize a verdict finding the defendant guilty of murder. Evidence from a number of witnesses, introduced in behalf of the defendant, say that the deceased was attacking the defendant with an extremely dangerous knife, that he was in imminent danger of losing his life, and that the killing was necessary. This evidence, if believed by the jury, would have required a verdict of acquittal, especially in view of the fact that it was supplemented by proof of threats made by the deceased against the defendant and which had been communicated to the defendant. But in addition to all this there was also evidence clearly showing a mutual intent to fight on the part of both the defendant and the deceased; that the parties had a sudden quarrel, and in the heat of blood, without any previous deliberation or malice, and both being armed with and using deadly weapons, the defendant killed the deceased. If this evidence was preferred by the jury, a verdict for voluntary manslaughter is authorized. As the jury had to consider all the evidence, and base their verdict upon such of the testimony as they preferred to believe, the charge of the court was clearly applicable.

Omitting two of the witnesses, whose testimony the jury may not have believed, the case, upon its facts, is controlled by the decisions in Gann v. State, 30 Ga. 67, and Caruthers v. State, 95 Ga. 343, 22 S. E. 837, which are very similar. It does not appear from any source that there was premeditation, and the current of the evidence leads our minds, as it did that of the lower court and jury, to the conclusion that upon a sudden quarrel the parties fought upon the spot, the combat being with deadly weapons, no undue advantage was taken on either side, and the killing was voluntary manslaughter. As said by Judge Lyon in Gann v. State, whenever the killing is the result of irresistible passion, "and not from any mixture of malice or deliberation, then the killing is not murder, but voluntary manslaughter, no matter how that passion may be aroused; for if there is no malice, either expressed or implied, or criminal neglect, there can be no murder. * * * When the provocation given is of such a character that it so excites the slayer with such passion that he cannot resist its influence, and when the killing is caused by such passion, and not solely on account of the provocation given, the defendant is guilty of manslaughter, and not murder." Any other presentation of section 65, Pen. Code 1895, would leave a large number of cases of homicide unprovided for, which are neither murder, involuntary manslaughter, nor justifiable. See 1 Hale, P. C. 453; 1 Hawkins, 31, §§ 22, 29; 4 Black.

Com. 191. If "upon words of reproach or any sudden provocation the parties come to blows, and a combat ensues, no undue advantage being sought or taken on either side, and death ensues under such circumstances, the offense of the party killing will amount only to manslaughter." 1 Russell on Crimes, 585.

No question of constitutional construction is involved, such as to require certification of the case to the Supreme Court.

2. SAME.

The court erred in striking the plea in bar on demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 408.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Dodge County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Le Roy Burnam was indicted for an assault with intent to murder, and, from the judgment for the state striking his plea of former jeopardy and acquittal, he brings error. Reversed.

De Lacy & Bishop and John R. Cooper, for plaintiff in error. E. D. Graham, Sol. Gen., for the State.

POWELL, J. The defendant, being arraigned upon an indictment charging him with an assault with intent to murder Mrs. Ray on January 31, 1905, filed a plea of former jeopardy and former acquittal. He alleged that at a preceding term of the court he had been arraigned, tried, and acquitted on an indictment charging him with the murder of M. P. Livingston, "alleged to have been committed at the same time and place as in the present indictment, and an acquittal on the same evidence was had, and the same issues made as exist and would necessarily be made in this case, and which is the very same offense which he is now charged with, and called upon to be tried in this very court." It was further alleged that the two transactions were identical, and that the former trial was in a court of competent jurisdiction. A copy of the record in the former trial was attached. The Solicitor General filed a demurrer, and the plea was stricken.

1. We fully discussed in the case of Fews v. State, 1 Ga. App. 122, 58 S. E. 64, the question as to whether such a plea presents any necessity for constitutional construction. We do not deem it necessary to say more now than is there said.

2. Of course, we do not know what is the real truth as to the allegations of the plea. If the facts of the matter are such as they are stated to be by the Solicitor General in his argument in this court, the acquittal on the first indictment was probably not a bar to the prosecution of the second case. However, by filing demurrers instead of traverse, the Solicitor General gave to the allegations of the plea a constructive verity, which in this court is absolute. That the allegations of the plea are sufficient against demurrer, see Lock v. State, 122 Ga. 780, 50 S. E. 932 (2). The same transaction test adopted in this state may make a trial for the murder of one person a bar to a prosecution for assault with intent to murder a different person. For instance, if the defendant shot at A., intending to kill him, and by reason of bad marksmanship struck and killed B., whom he did not intend to kill, the transactions, the assault with intent to murder A., and the actual murder of B., are legally the same. As intimated by this court in the Fews case, if by separate shots the defendant wounded two persons, the transaction would be single if the shooting was done in repelling a joint assault of these two persons. The intent of the defendant determines the matter. Crocker v. State, 47 Ga. 570; Johnson v. State, 65 Ga. 94; Fews v. State, supra.

TAYLOR et al. v. FOLDS. (No. 394.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1907.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—SALES—STOCK IN BULK—SALE TO PARTNER.

The act of August 17, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 92), regulating sales of stocks of goods in bulk, being in derogation of the common law, is to be strictly construed. A sale by one partner of his interests in a mercantile business to his associates is not within the purview of the act.

2. ATTACHMENT—CLAIMS OF THIRD PERSONS.

The evidence demanded the verdict finding the property not subject.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 5, Attachment, §§ 1102-1113.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by D. J. Folds against Max Ney. On levy of attachment Charles Taylor and Rosa Moskowitz filed a claim. Judgment for plaintiff, and claimants bring error. Reversed.

Frank M. Hughes and Morris Macka, for plaintiffs in error. W. C. Munday, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The defendant in error, Folds, sued out an attachment against Max Ney, setting out that he was doing business under the name of Central Bakery, and obtained judgment thereon. This attachment was levied upon a delivery wagon as the property of defendant. Charles Taylor and Rosa Moskowitz filed a claim to the property. It appeared from the testimony that the debt for which the attachment issued was due Folds for repairs made by him upon the wagon. There was no evidence that Ney had title to or possession of the wagon at the date of the levy or subsequently thereto. Folds did not know at the time he did the work or at the time he sued out the attachment that any one except Ney had any interest in the Central Bakery. The wagon was brought to his shop by a son of Rosa Moskowitz; and this young man told him that Ney would pay for the work. Folds also testified that young Moskowitz afterwards came and got the wagon, and made the statement that his father, A. Moskowitz, had bought out Ney and would pay the bill. To this testimony the claimant objected, but the court overruled the objection. Folds afterwards presented the bill to A. Moskowitz, who declined to pay it. The testimony of the claimant showed that the Central Bakery was a partnership, formerly composed of Ney, Taylor, and Rosa Moskowitz. Prior to the levy Ney had sold to his other partners his interest in the business, and also this wagon. At the time of the levy Taylor and Mrs. Moskowitz owned the wagon, and Ney had no interest in it. No notice of the retirement of Ney from the partnership was given. The property was found subject. The claimants obtained a writ of certiorari; but at the hearing the same was overruled, and the claimants bring error. It is the contention of the defendant in error that the sale from Ney to his other partners was void, because violative of the act of 1903, relating to sales of goods in bulk.

1. While at least one state (See Block v. Schwartz, 76 Pac. 22, 27 Utah, 387, 65 L. R. A. 308, 101 Am. St. Rep. 971) has declared that a law similar in terms to our act of August 17, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 92), regulating sales of goods in bulk, is unconstitutional and beyond the police powers of the state, the better opinion seems to be that such laws are valid. McDaniels v. Connally Shoe Co., 71 Pac. 37, 30 Wash. 549, 60 L. R. A. 947, 94 Am. St. Rep. 889; Carstarphen Warehouse Co. v. Fried, 124 Ga. 544, 52 S. E. 598; Parham v. Potts-Thompson Liquor Co., 127 Ga. 303, 56 S. E. 460; Sampson v. Brandon Grocery Co., 127 Ga. 454, 56 S. E. 488. Yet, since this statute is in derogation of the common law and tends to restrain the liberty of contract, it is to be strictly construed. A sale by one partner of his interest in a mercantile business to his other partners is not within the letter of the act; and the courts will not by construction give the act such an extension as to include it.

2. The sale from Ney to his partners not being void by reason of the act of 1903, it follows that the property was not subject. The title to the property was not adjudicated, as against the claimants, by the judgment upon the attachment. Rogers v. Bates, 19 Ga. 545. The attachment was not against the Central Bakery as a partnership, but against Ney alone; and therefore the cases of Gazan v. Royce, 78 Ga. 512, 3 S. E. 753, and Deleon v. Heller, 77 Ga. 740, holding that an attachment against a partnership which does not specify the names of the partners is not void, is not applicable. Folds' lien arose only upon the levy of the attachment. The title of the claimants arose prior to that time, and was therefore superior. It is possible that by a direct action Folds might have sued Taylor and Mrs. Moskowitz and have obtained judgment against them by reason of their connection with the partnership for which he did the work on the wagon; but that issue was not and could not have been on trial in the claim case. The quasi equitable character of a claim case is not so broad as to permit the introduction of a collateral issue of this nature. Especially is this true in the absence of equitable pleadings. Howard v. Porter, 99 Ga. 649, 27 S. E. 725. The fact that no notice was given by Ney of his retirement from the partnership may have caused him to remain liable for debts contracted by his partners in the partnership name, but did not have the effect of making the property of his partners subject to attachments and judgment against him individually. The statement of the son of Mrs. Moskowitz made to Folds that his father would pay the debt contracted by Ney was clearly objectionable.

Judgment reversed.

JOHNSON v. STATE. (No. 584.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1907.)

1. LARCENY—FROM THE HOUSE—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

To steal articles of value from the porch of a building used as a restaurant, it being shown by the evidence that said porch was also used as a part of the restaurant, is larceny from the house, and it is not error to instruct the jury that if they "find from the evidence that the basket containing these articles was taken from an ice box which was jammed up between the front steps and the front part of the restaurant, and if you further find that the ice box was part of the appurtenances belonging to that restaurant, and that, besides this, the offense is proven to you beyond a reasonable doubt, it would be larceny from the house."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Larceny, § 47.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—INVASION OF PROVINCE OF JURY—INTIMATION OF OPINION.

To charge the jury that "the state contends before you, gentlemen, that this defendant was seen by a certain witness to take and start away and carry away this basket containing the articles testified to you about, that it was afterwards found in a wagon he was in charge of and driving, and that this is the only way possible to account for the theft," so particularizes and argumentatively enforces upon the jury the inference of guilt as to amount to an intimation of opinion, within the terms of section 4334 of the Civil Code of 1895, and is reversible error.

3. SAME—PROOF OF GOOD CHARACTER OF DEFENDANT—MATTER NOT SUPPORTED BY EVIDENCE.

To charge the jury that "good character proven by a reliable witness goes to the credit of a witness, but I charge you, further, to take all the surrounding circumstances of this case together, and see if you can learn the facts and arrive at a truthful verdict" is not a correct charge where the defendant has put his character in issue. It does not give the jury the proper rule applicable to proof of good character of the defendant. It was unauthorized by the evidence in the case, for the reason that no evidence was adduced as to the good character of any of the witnesses; and, in the absence of instructions as to the effect of evidence of good character, the latter portion of the charge was calculated to diminish the force of the evidence for good character in behalf of the defendant, if it did not, indeed, entirely withdraw it from the consideration of the jury.

2. SAME—ARGUMENTATIVE INSTRUCTIONS.

To charge the jury as follows: "See in this case what, if anything, the evidence shows with reference to this defendant's connection with the keeping or maintaining of this establishment. You have heard the testimony. Did he furnish keys to persons, enabling them thereby to gain access to this establishment? If so, for what purpose did he furnish them? Why did he furnish them? What was his object in furnishing them? Did he cash checks for those who won money at games played there? If he did, what was his reason for doing so? Did he have an altercation with witness Graham with reference to the destruction of cards in the establishment? If so, what concern was it of his? Look to the evidence, and see what those things indicate. See what conclusion the evidence leads your minds to. Of course, those things may happen without showing any proprietorship. That is true with reference to the last transaction. A man who would resent the destruction of cards in an establishment and get into an altercation with another on that account would not necessarily be concerned in the proprietorship of the establishment. All those things are matters that the jury should consider in connection with all the facts and circumstances. See what those things indicate"—is so prejudicially argumentative, and so strongly intimates to the jury that certain facts and circumstances have been proved, as to render the grant of a new trial obligatory upon this court. WHITE v. STATE. (No. 595.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1907.)

HOMICIDE—INSTRUCTIONS—VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER—JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE.

The charge of the presiding judge was not, for any reason, erroneous. It is a clear, impartial, and comprehensive presentation of the law applicable to the evidence adduced in the case.

(a) Evidence for the state showing that the killing occurred shortly after the deceased's attempt to kill the defendant, but after the deceased had been disarmed, and while the deceased was making an assault upon the defendant, fully authorized the charge of the court upon the subject of voluntary manslaughter. If the jury believed this testimony, the killing could be attributed either to the sudden irresistible impulse of passion, aroused by the attempts of the deceased to slay the defendant before being disarmed, or to the fact that the defendant, no longer being in danger of losing his life or having a felony committed upon his person, killed the deceased merely to prevent an assault or an assault and battery. If this testimony was believed by the jury, the killing, in either event, would be voluntary manslaughter.

(b) There was no error in not charging the jury the principle of law contained in Pen. Code 1895, § 72. This section refers only to homicides having their origin in a forcible attack and invasion of the property or habitation of another; and, as there was no evidence tending to show that any attack or invasion of the habitation of the defendant was intended by the deceased, but that on the contrary he was a guest or visitor at defendant's residence before the beginning of the difficulty, a charge upon section 72 would have been unauthorized and erroneous.

LIGHTSY v. STATE. (No. 607.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1907.)

1. HOMICIDE — INSTRUCTIONS — JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE.

This case is controlled by repeated rulings, of the Supreme Court that the law embraced in Pen. Code 1895, § 73, does not qualify or limit the law of justifiable homicide as contained in sections 70 and 71, and that instructions as to these two separate branches of the law of justifiable homicide should not be so given as to confuse the one with the other, to tend to perplex the jury in making appropriate application of the law to the facts.

2. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—ON MATTER NOT SUPPORTED BY EVIDENCE.

In no view of the evidence or the statement of the accused was the law of justifiable homicide as laid down in Pen. Code 1895, § 73, applicable to this case, and the court erred in giving in charge that section.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Homicide, § 622.]

3. SAME.

In a homicide case, where the evidence and the statement of the accused present only the conflicting theories of murder or justifiable homicide, it is error for the court to give in charge the law of voluntary manslaughter, and a verdict against the accused for that offense should be set aside.

4. ERROR, WRIT OF—REVIEW.

The other assignments of error are without merit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chattooga County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Bob Lightsey was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and he brings error. Reversed.

J. M. Bellah, F. W. Copeland, and W. M. Henry, for plaintiff in error. W. H. Ennis, Sol. Gen., for the State.

HILL, C. J. Bob Lightsey was tried for murder, and convicted of voluntary manslaughter, in the superior court of Chattooga county. He made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled. We find three of the grounds meritorious.

1. Under the evidence and the defendant's statement, the court erred in giving in charge section 73 of the Penal Code of 1895. The Supreme Court has repeatedly ruled that this section should never be given in charge, unless there is some evidence tending to show that there was a mutual combat between the accused and the deceased, or an agreement between the parties indicating a mutual intent to fight. Among the many cases expressly so ruling, we cite Powell v. State, 101 Ga. 9, 29 S. E. 309, 65 Am. St. Rep. 277, where Mr. Justice Little elaborately treats the subject of justifiable homicide under Pen. Code 1895, §§ 70, 71, 73, pointing out clearly when either or all of these sections would be applicable and when not. See, also, Stubbs v. State, 110 Ga. 916, 36 S. E. 200; Wheeler v. State, 112 Ga. 43, 37 S. E. 126; Freeman v. State, 112 Ga. 48, 37 S. E. 172; Heard v. State, 114 Ga. 90, 39 S. E. 909; Jordan v. State, 117 Ga. 405, 43 S. E. 747. In this case there was no witness to the act of killing. The accused, by his statement, put his defense squarely on Pen. Code 1895, §§ 70, 71. The evidence in behalf of the accused strengthened the position of self-defense made by the statement, and neither by the evidence nor the statement was there any fact or circumstance tending to show any mutual combat or any agreement evidencing a mutual intention to fight. The theory of the state was that the accused, after the quarrel with the deceased, threatened to kill him, armed himself, sought and found him, and without any real or apparent danger shot him as soon as he saw him. It is not necessary to give in detail the evidence of the state and the accused, or to attempt to evolve the truth from these conflicting theories. That is a problem for the jury. It is sufficient to state generally that under neither theory was the law of mutual combat as defined by Pen. Code 1895, § 73, in any respect applicable. The evidence both for the state and the accused, including the defendant's statement, made a case of murder or justifiable homicide under Pen. Code 1895, §§ 70, 71. Nevertheless, the court, after giving to the jury a charge covering the code definitions of murder and voluntary manslaughter, further instructed them as follows on the subject of justifiable homicide: "Justifiable homicide is the killing of a human being in self-defense, or in defense of his person, as applicable to this case. A bare fear of any of these offenses to prevent which the homicide is alleged to have been committed shall not be sufficient to justify the killing. It must appear that the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man, and that the party killing really acted under the influence of these fears, and not in a spirit of revenge." Again: "If a person kill another in his defense, it must appear that the danger was so urgent and pressing at the time of the killing that, in order to save his own life, the killing of the other was absolutely necessary; and it must also appear that the person killed was the assailant, or that the slayer had really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle before the mortal blow was given, or that the deceased was manifestly intending or endeavoring, by violence or surprise, to commit a felony upon him." Now, this charge qualified the right of self-defense as laid down in Pen. Code 1895, §§ 70, 71, by the more exacting limitations of justifiable homicide under section 73. This charge was calculated to impress the jury with the fact that the law of justifiable homicide would not give the right in self-defense to slay one who was manifestly intending and endeavoring by violence or surprise to commit a felony on his person, unless it also appeared that the deceased was the assailant, that the slayer had really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle before the mortal blow was given, and that at the time of the killing the danger was so urgent and pressing that, in order to save his own life, the killing was absolutely necessary. This is not the law, and imposes upon one who is entirely faultless, and who exercises his right of self-defense under sections 70 and 71, the greater burden imposed upon one who is not without fault, but who voluntarily enters into a deadly mutual combat, and who therefore must show, in order to justify the killing of his adversary, an absolute necessity to do so to save his own life. It is true that the judge further on, in applying the law to the contentions of the parties, restricted his charge to the law of justifiable homicide as laid down in Pen. Code 1895, §§ 70, 71. But we do not think this corrected the erroneous intermingling of the Code sections, but rather tended to add to the confusion of the jury on the subject.

2. It is also insisted that the court erred in the manner in which he charged the three Code sections under consideration. They were all charged together and in immediate connection with each other, and without drawing any distinctions between the sections as constituting different kinds of justifiable homicide. We think this exception is well taken. There may be cases of homicide when it would be entirely proper to charge all three of these sections to meet different theories presented by the evidence; but, whenever it is proper to do so, the court should by specific instructions make clear to the jury the application of each section to the different theories arising from the facts and circumstances of the particular case.

3. In our opinion there was no evidence in this case that required the court to give in charge the law of voluntary manslaughter. If the evidence relied on by the state for a conviction was the truth of the case, the accused was guilty of murder. If the statement of the accused and the evidence in his behalf was the truth of the case, he was not guilty of any offense, but his defense of justifiable homicide was fully sustained. There is no fact or circumstance in the record upon which a verdict for voluntary manslaughter can be legally predicated, and such verdict should be set aside as contrary to law, McBeth v. State, 122 Ga. 737, 60 S. E. 931; Berry v. State, 122 Ga. 429, 50 S. E. 345; Tolbirt v. State, 119 Ga. 970, 47 S. E. 544.

Judgment reversed.

DAVIDSON & GRINSTEAD v. WAXELBAUM & BRO. (No. 446.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1907.)

1. PARTNERSHIP—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS.

While the testimony of an alleged partner is competent to prove the fact of partnership, his mere declaration, written or spoken, is not admissible for that purpose. Abel v. Jarratt, 28 S. E. 453, 100 Ga. 732.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Partnership, § 70.]

2. SAME.

Where there is independent prima facie proof of a partnership, the declarations of either one of the alleged partners, written or spoken, are admissible in corroboration. Ham v. Brown, 58 S. E. 316; Jones v. Harrell, 35 S. E. 690, 110 Ga. 380.

3. ERROR, WRIT OF—INSTRUCTIONS—EXCEPTIONS.

A general exception to the charge as not being "full enough to clearly explain to the jury the law as to the distinction between a corporation and a partnership, and did not fully set forth the contention of the defendant," is not sufficiently specific, and presents no question for the determination of this court. Austell v. James, 22 S. E. 953, 97 Ga. 334; Chambers v. Walker, 6 S. E. 165, 80 Ga. 642; Footte v. Kelley, 55 S. E. 1045, 126 Ga. 799.

4. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

The written request to charge, in so far as it is sound, is covered by the general charge in much clearer and more pertinent language.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Trial, §§ 651-659.]

5. SAME.

The entire charge in this case is a full and fair presentation of the issues involved, and the law applicable thereto. The assignments of error are wholly without merit, and the verdict is amply supported by the evidence.

GOODWYN v. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. (No. 336.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 19, 1907.)

1. EVIDENCE—HEARSAY—DECLARATIONS AS TO PAIN.

The declaration of the plaintiff, made to a physician, that he felt no sensation of pain resulting from sticking a needle into his finger, does not fall within any of the exceptions to the rule as to hearsay, and was properly excluded. Atlanta Street Railroad Company v. Walker, 93 Ga. 463, 21 S. E. 48; Broyles v. Prisock, 97 Ga. 643, 25 S. E. 389; Atlanta, K. & N. Ry. Co. v. Gardner, 122 Ga. 82, 49 S. E. 818. Especially was there no error in excluding the declarations of the plaintiff as to his physical symptoms and suffering, which were no part of the res geste of the injury, when the plaintiff himself as a witness fully described the character and extent of his injuries. "The higher and better evidence is that of the person who has actual knowledge of the truth of the pains and other feelings to which the complaint relates." Atlanta Street R. R. Co. v. Walker, supra.

2. ERROR, WRIT OF—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

An objection that the court erred in refusing to allow a witness to answer a question asked on the direct examination will not be considered, where the expected answer is not set out, so that the court can determine whether the evidence would have been admissible. Hagerstown Steam Engine Co. v. Grizzard, 86 Ga. 574, 12 S. E. 939.

3. EVIDENCE—EXPERTS—OPINIONS.

The testimony of the engineer of the backing train that at the time he struck the car in which plaintiff was at work he was moving back at the usual speed necessary for switching and making couplings of that character was properly admitted. Civ. Code 1895, § 5287.

4. NEGLIGENCE—ORDINARY CARE—REASONABLE DILIGENCE.

The court instructed the jury that the law required the defendant railroad company to show that at the time of the injury its agents and servants were in the exercise of "ordinary care," instead of charging the rule of diligence in the language of section 2321, Civ. Code 1895, to wit, "all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence." The words "ordinary care" embody the same degree of diligence as the words "ordinary and reasonable care and diligence," and have substantially the same significance. The words "ordinary" and "reasonable," descriptive of diligence, are synonymous, and are used interchangeably in statutes and by the courts. Especially is this true when the court defined correctly the meaning of "ordinary care" in a proximate portion of the charge.

5. SAME.

The court charged the jury that "ordinary care" is "that care that a prudent man would exercise under like or similar circumstances." The use of the word "a," instead of the word "every," made no material change in the definition, and could not have misled the jury.

6. DAMAGES—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "The plaintiff alleges, and asks for damages for, pain and suffering. In determining the question as to whether you will allow damages for pain and suffering, the court can give you no rule. There is no rule, except the enlightened conscience of intelligent, honest jurors." Considered alone, this instruction would be error; but, in connection with the entire charge, it is clear that the court in this excerpt was referring to the measure of damages for pain and suffering, and not to plaintiff's right to recover damages for pain and suffering.

7. ERROR, WRIT OF—REVIEW.

The other assignments of error are wholly without merit, and the verdict, approved by the trial court, is fully warranted by the evidence.

ARSON—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In cases of alleged arson, where nothing appears but the burning, the law presumes that the fire was the result of accident or some providential cause, and the burden is on the prosecution to overcome this legal presumption and prove beyond a reasonable doubt the existence of a criminal design. In the opinion of a majority of this court, the facts and circumstances in the record do not even tend to show that the fire was a felonious one, and the verdict is without legal support, and must be set aside and a new trial ordered.

POWELL, J. (specially concurring). I think that the circumstances introduced by the state, tending to show that the burning was not accidental, but was felonious, were sufficient to give "scope for legitimate reasoning by the jury," and therefore sufficient to support the verdict as to that point; but I concur with the majority of the court in holding that the circumstances by which the state claims to have connected the defendant with the crime are too wholly inconclusive to justify a verdict of guilty.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; S. B. Hatcher, Judge pro hac.

Attachment by Simons & Co. against one McGhee. B. I. Burt interposed a claim to the fund garnished. Verdict finding the fund subject and claimant brought certiorari. Final judgment for claimant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

J. E. Chapman and A. W. Cozart, for plaintiffs in error. T. T. Miller and Ed. Wohlwender, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Simons & Co., plaintiffs in error, instituted suit by attachment against McGhee, which was levied by serving summons of garnishment on Pou & Co. The answer of the garnishees admitted an indebtedness of $127.70. Burt dissolved said garnishment, claimed the fund, and traversed the answer of the garnishees; and issue was joined thereon by plaintiffs in attachment. On the trial of the claim case in the justice court to which the attachment was made returnable, a verdict was rendered finding the fund subject to the attachment. The claimant carried the case to the superior court by certiorari. On the hearing, the certiorari was sustained by the judge pro hac vice, and a final judgment entered in behalf of the claimant. Exceptions were taken to this judgment, because contrary to law and without evidence to support it, and for the reason that such final judgment depended upon an issue of fact, there being no question of law which must finally govern the case, and the court erred in rendering it.

The claimant by his evidence showed that, before the attachment was levied by service of the summons of garnishment, he had bought from the defendant in attachment 110 cords of wood, which had been shipped by his (claimant's) directions to the garnishees, to whom claimant had sold said wood. It was contended by plaintiffs in attachment that the sale of said wood was not complete; that there had been no separation and delivery of the 110 cords of wood by the defendant in attachment to the claimant, but that said 110 cords was a part of 175 or 200 cords which were shipped by defendant in attachment to the garnishees. There was much conflict in the evidence as to whether the sale of the 110 cords was a completed sale, or only an executory contract. There was also conflict in the evidence as to the amount of wood shipped to the garnishees. If the judge of the superior court was of the opinion that the evidence preponderated in favor of the claimant, or plaintiff in certiorari, he had the right, in the exercise of his discretion, to sustain the certiorari and remand the case for another trial; but he erred in rendering a final judgment. This would be so, even where there was no conflict in the evidence, if there was no controlling question of law, "because it could not be known with certainty that the evidence on another trial would be the same." Williams v. Bradfield, 116 Ga. 705, 43 S. E. 57; Bass Dry Goods Co. v. Electric Storage Battery, 123 Ga. 640, 51 S. E. 579.

We think, therefore, that the court erred in rendering a final judgment for the claimant, and we reverse this judgment, and direct that the case be remanded to the justice court for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

McLENDON BROS. v. FINCH. (No. 380.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1907.)

1. COVENANTS—IMPLIED COVENANTS—SALE OF STANDING TIMBER.

A conveyance of standing timber for saw-mill purposes being a sale of real estate, and not a lease, the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 3613, that "in a sale of land there is no implied warranty of title," are applicable thereto. Where the vendor has given such a conveyance containing no covenant of warranty, and has taken purchase-money notes from the vendee, the latter cannot defend against a suit upon the notes by any plea predicated upon the theory of a breach of an implied covenant of quiet enjoyment under such instrument.

2. EVIDENCE—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING DEED.

While a vendee may recover from his vendor, who includes in a subsequent conveyance to a third person the land already sold (upon the theory of money had and received), such portion of the consideration of the second conveyance as is represented by the land so improperly included (Niles v. Groover, 78 Ga. 461, 3 S. E. 899), it is competent for the vendor to show that the land contained in the first conveyance was inserted in the second conveyance by mutual mistake, and that no part of the consideration of the second conveyance was given therefor.

(a) If a vendor fraudulently makes a second deed of conveyance to the same land, a cause of action ex delicto will arise in favor of the first vendee, if he suffers damage thereby, although his conveyance may have contained no covenant of warranty.

(b) Such a cause of action, being ex delicto, cannot be set off against a suit upon promissory notes.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 1912; vol. 43, Set-Off and Counterclaim, § 32.]

3. ELECTION OF REMEDIES—RIGHT OF ELECTION.

A person who has suffered an actionable wrong may pursue any number of consistent concurrent remedies against different persons until he obtains satisfaction from some of them. He is not permitted to pursue inconsistent remedies.

(a) No matter what right the party wronged may have of electing between remedies or of pursuing different defendants for the same cause of action, when he once obtains full satisfaction from one source, his cause of action ends, and he can assert it no further.

(b) If the plaintiff in a suit brought upon a given cause of action accepts a sum of money in full settlement thereof, he cannot thereafter set up the same cause of action against another whom he had the election of suing in the first instance.

(c) A settlement of a cause of action by a partnership stops the individual partners, at least those who participated or acquiesced therein, from afterwards asserting the same cause of action as their own.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Election of Remedies, § 1.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Paulding County; A. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by J. T. Finch against McLendon Bros. on promissory notes. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

R. E. L. Whitworth and J. J. Northcutt, for plaintiffs in error. A. J. Camp and W. E. Spinks, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. In March, 1902, Finch, for the consideration of $1,000, sold to Smith & Tomlin all of the timber on certain lots of land, together with sawmill privileges, including right of ingress and egress, but limited the time within which the timber was to be cut and the privileges exercised to two years from date. The instrument of conveyance contained no clause of warranty. As a part of the transaction Smith & Tomlin gave promissory notes for the purchase money of the timber. In September, 1902, Smith & Tomlin transferred their conveyance to McLendon Bros., and Finch took the notes of the latter partnership in lieu of the notes of the former. Afterwards the partnership of McLendon Bros. & Smith, composed of the same persons as the partnership of McLendon Bros. with the addition of Smith, acquired the conveyance; but the record is silent as to just how this was done. In May, 1903, the East & West Railroad Company sought to condemn a right of way through the lands on which the timber stood; and, to avoid the statutory proceedings, Finch, in consideration of $800, executed and delivered to the railroad company a warranty deed to the strip of land sought as a right of way, and made no exception as to the timber. At the time this conveyance was executed McLendon Bros. & Smith were in possession of the timber and were actually engaged in cutting it. The railroad company proceeded to open and grade its right of way, and, in addition to cutting down a considerable quantity of the timber, also impeded the ingress and egress to and from the mill and timber of McLendon Bros. & Smith; and this partnership brought suit against the railroad company for these damages. In settlement of this suit the railroad company paid to McLendon Bros. & Smith $425, and took from them a receipt in full for all damages done by the cutting of the right of way. Subsequently to this transaction Finch sued McLendon Bros. upon the notes which they had given for the timber. In defense to this action several pleas were filed, all of them based upon the fact that Finch had executed the deed to the railroad company without excepting the timber and milling rights previously conveyed. They first set up the transaction as a plea of failure of consideration, asserting that the second conveyance was a violation of the former contract, and that through the violation of this contract the defendants had been damaged in a sum far in excess of the amount due on the notes, by reason of the fact that the railroad company had destroyed their timber and mill rights, and that the consideration of the notes had therefore failed. They also set up the same transaction in the form of a plea of recoupment, and prayed judgment for the excess of the damages above the amount of the notes. They further set up that, in conveying the land to the railroad company, Finch had also conveyed the timber; that the timber conveyed was of the value of $500; that, this amount of money having been received by Finch for timber belonging to defendants, he should in equity and good conscience account to them for it; and they therefore prayed a set-off of this amount. It appeared from the testimony that the railroad company had notice of the timber conveyance at the date on which they bought the right of way, and that no part of the $800 consideration was paid on account of the timber. The defendants objected to this testimony, so far as it went to show that Finch had received no consideration for the timber, on the ground that it contradicted the recitals of the deed from Finch to the railroad company, which asserted that in consideration of $800 Finch conveyed the land and did not except the timber. The court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendants bring error.

1. The relation between the parties to a conveyance whereby the one sells to the other the timber on land is that of vendor and vendee, and not that of landlord and tenant; and the conveyance is a deed, and not a lease, although the time within which the timber is to be cut and removed is limited to less than five years. Baxter v. Mattox, 106 Ga. 344, 32 S. E. 94; McRae v. Stillwell, 111 Ga. 65, 36 S. E. 604, 55 L. R. A. 513; Morgan v. Perkins, 94 Ga. 353, 21 S. E. 574; Coody v. Gress Lumber Co., 82 Ga. 793, 10 S. E. 218. In cases of landlord and tenant, no estate passes out of the landlord further than a mere usufruct, which is not assignable without the landlord's consent. Civ. Code 1895, § 3115. The conveyance of timber, on the other hand, authorizes the grantee, not merely to use it and return it, but to take it away, sell it, and otherwise possess it. The time limit within which the timber must be removed is not a limitation directly upon the estate owned in the timber, but upon the concurrent license of ingress and egress necessary to the use of the timber. These conveyances are further distinguishable from leases, by reason of the fact that they are assignable without the consent of the grantor. McRae v. Stillwell, 111 Ga. 65, 36 S. E. 604, 55 L. R. A. 513; Baxter v. Mattox, 106 Ga. 355, 32 S. E. 94. The conveyance from Finch to Smith & Tomlin, being a deed and not a lease, is within the purview of Civ. Code 1895, § 3613, that "in a sale of land there is no implied warranty of title." It is to be treated as a quitclaim deed. McDonald v. Beall, 55 Ga. 289 (9, 10); Wright v. Shorter, 56 Ga. 72 (4, 5); McDonough v. Martin, 88 Ga. 675, 16 S. E. 59, 18 L. R. A. 343; Nathans v. Arkwright, 66 Ga. 186. Whether it is such a deed as falls within the purview of Civ. Code 1895, § 3609, which provides that a title after acquired by the vendor inures to the benefit of the vendee, is not in point in this case and is not decided. See Morrison v. Whiteside, 116 Ga. 459, 42 S. E. 729; and Taylor v. Wainman, 116 Ga. 795, 42 S. E. 58. But it has no express contract of warranty, and none will be implied. This conveyance being a deed, and not a lease, this case is distinguishable from Perry v. Wall, 68 Ga. 70, and Williams v. George, 104 Ga. 599, 30 S. E. 751; for statutes declaring "that no covenants shall be implied in a conveyance of real estate have been considered as not applying to leases, because they are not conveyances of real estate within the meaning of the statute." Brewster on Conveyancing, § 211. The case is likewise distinguishable from Sanderlin v. Willis, 94 Ga. 171, 21 S. E. 291, and Gibson v. Carreker, 91 Ga. 617, 17 S. E. 905; for in those cases there was involved the breach of the express covenant of a bond for title.

We have thus defined the character of the timber conveyance executed by Finch to McLendon Bros., as prefatory to the statement that, since it contained no covenant of warranty and since none will be implied, Finch committed no contractual breach by his subsequent deed to the railway company. Finch having committed no contractual breach in executing the second conveyance, it follows that the court did not err in disregarding such of the defendant's pleas as were necessarily founded upon this theory. This is especially applicable to the plea of recoupment. Further, as to the plea of failure of consideration, let us inquire as to what was the consideration of the notes. It was the execution of the timber conveyance by Finch and the passage of the title to the timber from him to his grantees. Has this consideration failed in any respect? It is not insisted that the conveyance was not executed, or that the title did not pass. The title did pass, and it is not shown to have failed in the slightest degree; for, when it came into conflict with the railroad company's subsequent deed, it prevailed and damages were recovered for an invasion of it. There was, therefore, no failure of consideration.

2. As to the plea in which the defendants sought to set off a portion of the money received by Finch from the railway company on the theory of money had and received by him for their benefit, we will proceed to discuss this point for the moment, without reference to the fact that the defendants, instead of ratifying the deed Finch made to the railroad company, repudiated it and asserted their superior title, and took payment from the company in settlement for the value of the timber taken. In Niles v. Groover, 78 Ga. 461, 3 S. E. 899, the Supreme Court held: "Where an owner of land sold a portion thereof and subsequently sold a right of way to a railroad company passing through both his own land and that which he had previously sold, in an action for money had and received, brought by a person holding by conveyances under the original vendee against such vendor, she would be entitled to recover, not merely the value of the land so illegally sold by the vendor as a right of way, but the amount received by him for that portion of the land belonging to her which he thus sold; and if, in the sale to the railroad company, all parts of the land conveyed by him were treated as equally valuable, and the purchase money was paid as a gross sum, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover a proportion of the purchase money corresponding to the proportion in which she held the land sold as to quantity." In that case the deed from Niles under which Mrs. Groover claimed was not recorded, and the subsequent deed made to the railway company was superior to hers, so that no redress was left to her other than to demand that Niles pay her the money which he had received from the sale of her land. We think, as to the case at bar, that if Finch had received from the railway company any money on account of a sale of the timber belonging to the defendants, they might have ratified the sale and have held him responsible for so much money as he received on that account. But under the testimony no sum was received by Finch on account of the timber; and this testimony was competent, for it did not contradict the deed, but merely explained the recital as to the consideration. See Civ. Code 1895, § 3599. And compare Delvin on Deeds (2d Ed.) § 896. Since the plaintiff received no money from the sale of property belonging to the defendant, the plea of set-off on this ground necessarily fell.

We do not mean to say that a vendor may not become responsible to his vendee by the execution of a second deed covering the same property, even though the first conveyance be by quitclaim only. One "who fraudulently makes a second deed of conveyance to any land or real estate" is not only guilty of a crime (Pen. Code 1895, § 669), but commits an actionable wrong against the person injured. In this case, if Finch, having conveyed the timber to the defendants, although by only a quitclaim deed, had deeded the land, not omitting the timber, to the railroad company, and it had taken as a purchaser without notice, the defendants would have had a cause of action against him; but it would have sounded in tort, and not ex contractu. The plaintiff's action upon the notes being purely ex contractu, the defendants could not set off against it a cause of action arising in their favor from the plaintiff's having made, even though fraudulently and tortiously and to their damage, a second deed; for a cause of action arising ex delicto cannot be set off against an action ex contractu. Civ. Code 1895, § 4944; McKleroy v. Sewell, 73 Ga. 659.

3. So far we have discussed the questions as if the defendants in the court below had never received satisfaction for these very damages by which they sought to defeat or diminish the plaintiff's cause of action. However, it appears from the record that McLendon Bros. & Smith, a firm composed of the defendants and another, had sued the railroad company for a recovery of these very damages, and had accepted a sum of money in full settlement of the cause of action. That there can be but one satisfaction for the same cause of action is elementary, and the justness of the rule must appeal to every one not possessed of "an unnatural insensibility to the essential fitness of things." No matter what right of election the plaintiff may have as to choice of remedies, or as to whom he shall sue or join as parties defendant or as to waiving tort and suing on contract; still, when once he has received satisfaction for the cause of action, his right to further sue in any form forever ends. "A plaintiff may pursue any number of consistent concurrent remedies against different persons until he obtains satisfaction from some of them." Civ. Code 1895, § 4945. He is not permitted to pursue inconsistent remedies. Equitable Life Assurance Society v. May, 82 Ga. 648, 9 S. E. 597. A careful reading of the opinion by Chief Justice Bleckley in the case just cited, and an application of the principles there outlined, will make it plain that it is utterly inconsistent that McLendon Bros. should sue and recover from the railroad company on the theory that the conveyance which they held to the timber was perfect as title and superior to the deed of the railroad company, and then afterwards seek to recoup or set off against Finch, on the theory that the second conveyance impaired or invalidated the first conveyance; and likewise it is inconsistent that they should sue and recover from the railroad company on the theory that its payment to Finch for the timber afforded no protection against their prior title, and afterwards seek to appropriate to their benefit, as money had and received to their use any portion of the sum so paid to Finch by the company. Nor is it any reply to an application of this principle that in the settlement with the railroad company McLendon Bros. and their partner accepted less than the amount sued for and less than the actual damage done them. There is no intimation that the settlement was unfair or fraudulent. They voluntarily accepted the sum in full satisfaction. They pursued their action until the defendant therein tendered in settlement a sum which their judgment dictated they should accept. Such a settlement is as complete an estoppel against another suit upon the same cause of action as a judgment recovered and paid off would have been. Atlanta Elevator Company v. Fulton Mills 106 Ga. 431, 32 S. E. 541.

Nor is application of this doctrine to be withheld because the suit and satisfaction against the railroad company was in favor of McLendon Bros. & Smith, while McLendon Bros. alone are involved in the present transaction. It appears from the record that McLendon Bros., as well as their partner, Smith, participated in the settlement made with the railroad company and shared in the proceeds. This estops them. Compare McRae v. Stillwell, 111 Ga. 65, 36 S. E. 604, 55 L. R. A. 513.

The verdict directed by the court was the only legal result of the case.

Judgment affirmed.

SIMS v. SCHEUSSLER. (No. 329.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 19, 1907.)

1. EVIDENCE—DOCUMENTARY—COPY.

A copy of an instrument required by law to be recorded, taken from the proper registry and duly certified, is presumptive evidence of the existence of an original.

2. SAME—SECONDARY EVIDENCE.

The proper custodian of a canceled mortgage is the mortgagor, and of an outstanding uncanceled mortgage is the mortgagee. Where it appears that due notice has been served on the mortgagee to produce the original mortgage, and that the mortgagor resides beyond the jurisdiction of the court, a sufficient foundation was laid to admit as secondary evidence a properly certified copy of the mortgage.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Floyd County; Harper Hamilton, Judge.

Action by G. W. Sims against Christine R. Scheussler. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Judgment refusing new trial reversed.

Denny & Harris, for plaintiff in error. O. N. Featherston and Dean & Dean, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Sims brought suit against Mrs. Scheussler on a note made by her and indorsed by her husband. In her plea she admitted the execution of the note and that the plaintiff was the holder thereof. She defended on the ground that the note was without legal consideration, and was made by her in assumption of the debt of her husband to the plaintiff, or as security for such debt, and was therefore void and could not be enforced as to her. The jury found in favor of the defendant, and plaintiff's motion for a new trial was overruled.

The evidence in the record shows that Sims and defendant's husband were partners, engaged in the hardware business, and that prior to the execution of the note sued on Sims sold his interest in the business to Scheussler for the balance of the purchase price amounting to $2,460.96. These notes were not paid at maturity, and the note for $1,200 sued on was the outcome of efforts made by Sims to collect them. To this point the evidence presents no conflict. The plaintiff contended that, soon after the sale of his interest in the hardware business to Scheussler, the latter gave his wife a mortgage for $6,000 on the whole stock of hardware goods; that, when he made an effort to collect his purchase-money notes, he was met by this claim of the wife; that he thereupon employed an attorney and threatened to attack the validity of this mortgage as against his notes; that in the negotiations which followed the wife finally gave him the note sued on for the notes held by him, made by her husband for the purchase of the goods covered by the mortgage, in full settlement of his claim of priority of payment out of said stock of goods; that these purchase-money notes were thereupon transferred and delivered to the defendant, and the mortgage canceled by a transfer to the mortgagee of the stock of goods, and that the consideration of the note sued on was the notes made by Scheussler in payment of the hardware stock, and the settlement of any claim, legal or equitable, based upon said notes; that therefore the note sued on and made by the wife was for her own benefit, and to protect her interest in the property covered by her mortgage. If this was the truth of the transaction, the note made by the wife was a valid contract, and enforceable against her under the law of this state. A wife can buy the notes of her husband, or she can make a valid obligation in settlement of such notes, if they apparently constitute a prior claim against property derived from her husband and to which she has title or interest. Daniel v. Royce, 96 Ga. 566, 23 S. E. 493; Lowenstein v. Meyer, 114 Ga. 709, 40 S. E. 726; Atlanta, etc., Land Co. v. Austin, 122 Ga. 374, 50 S. E. 124.

The defendant denied the foregoing contention of the plaintiff. She denied that she held any mortgage on the hardware stock, or had any interest in said stock, or any claim against her husband in connection with said stock of goods. She contended that the note sued on was made by her solely for the purpose of paying or assuming the debt of her husband to the plaintiff, as represented by the notes held by him against her husband, and that her said note was given by her as security for the payment of said notes by her husband. If this contention was the truth of the transaction, the note was invalid and void as against the defendant. Civ. Code 1895, § 2488. Any contract of the wife to which a creditor of the husband is a party, the purpose of which is to make the wife the husband's surety, or by which she assumes the payment of her husband's debt, is invalid, and cannot be enforced against her. Berry v. Goodger, 80 Ga. 620, 6 S. E. 19; Nelms v. Keller, 103 Ga. 746, 30 S. E. 572; Carlton v. Bank, 96 Ga. 470, 23 S. E. 388; Johnson v. Leffler Co., 122 Ga. 670, 50 S. E. 488; White v. Stocker, 85 Ga. 200, 11 S. E. 604; Bank of Cartersville v. Bayless, 96 Ga. 684, 23 S. E. 851; Chastain v. Peak, 111 Ga. 889, 36 S. E. 967.

The evidence in the case was close and directly conflicting as to the material facts, and it was doubtful what was the real transaction between the parties. Every fact and circumstance was, therefore, valuable and weighty which tended to support the contention of either side. The learned trial judge in his charge submitted the issues and the law fairly, fully, and correctly. In our opinion, however, he erred in excluding certain testimony offered by the plaintiff. A copy of a mortgage for $6,000, dated December 29, 1886, in favor of Mrs. Christine R. Scheussler, covering a stock of hardware, as security for a note of even date with the mortgage and payable to Mrs. Scheussler January 10, 1887, recorded in the clerk's office of the superior court of Fulton county January 24, 1887, and duly certified by the clerk of said court, was offered in evidence by the plaintiff. This certified copy also showed a cancellation of said mortgage signed by Mrs. C. R. Scheussler on April 30, 1888, in consideration of the transfer by the mortgagor to the mortgagee of a stock of hardware described in the mortgage. This satisfaction, the certified copy stated, was entered of record December 17, 1885. Of course, this last date was a palpable clerical error. Before the certified copy of the mortgage and note was offered in evidence, proof was made that the defendant had been duly served with notice to produce the original, and that she had responded that she was unable to comply, and denied the existence of the original, or that it had ever been in her possession or control. The court excluded this testimony on the ground that there was no proof of the existence of the original. We think this was error. Clearly the ground upon which the ruling was based was erroneous. If the testimony was for any reason inadmissible, the reason for its exclusion would be immaterial. In our opinion, under the facts before the trial court, this testimony was competent. If the mortgage in question had been paid off and canceled, the proper custodian was the mortgagor. The defendant denied the existence of the original, but insisted that, if a genuine original had ever existed, the entry from the record showed that it had been paid before the giving of the note sued on, and the testimony was, therefore, not relevant and material. If the mortgage had been paid off, its proper custodian was the mortgagor, and the evidence showed that he had died out of the State, beyond the jurisdiction of the court, seven years before the suit was brought. If the mortgage had not been paid off, its proper custodian was the mortgagee, the defendant, who had been duly served with notice to produce. These facts show proper diligence as foundation for the introduction of the certified copy. The existence, genuineness, and contents of a deed showed to be lost or destroyed, or beyond the jurisdiction of the court, may be proved by a certified copy of it, if it has been properly and legally probated for record. Bady v. Shivey, 40 Ga. 684; Hayden v. Mitchell, 103 Ga. 435, 30 S. E. 287; Brown v. Oattis, 55 Ga. 416; Lunday v. Thomas, 28 Ga. 537; Civ. Code 1895, § 5172. The proper registration of the mortgage was presumptive evidence of the existence of an original, and the evidence that all the search for the original had been made which the law required entitled the plaintiff to the benefit of this secondary evidence. The testimony was relevant and material. It tended to strengthen the contention of the plaintiff that the defendant had an interest in the stock of hardware sold by him to her husband in which he also claimed an interest, and that her note was made for her benefit to protect that interest.

We think the court also erred in ruling out the statement of J. H. Lumpkin, a witness for the plaintiff, that "Mrs. Scheussler had some kind of a claim on the property," referring to the stock of hardware. This witness had testified that he was present with the plaintiff, Mr. Scheussler, Mrs. Scheussler, and Mr. Burton Smith, attorney for plaintiff, when the note sued on was signed by Mrs. Scheussler. He was representing Mr. and Mrs. Scheussler as attorney in the negotiations leading up to the execution of the note, and gave testimony as to what took place at the negotiations, stating that "Mrs. Scheussler had some kind of a claim on the property. Whether this was called a mortgage, or bill of sale, or transfer, in the negotiations with Sims and his attorney which resulted in the giving of the note by Mrs. Scheussler, I am not quite positive." Objection was made to the statement that "Mrs. Scheussler had some kind of a claim on the property," and the court excluded it. This was not an effort to prove the contents of a written instrument, but was the statement of a substantive fact. Especially was this testimony admissible in view of the evidence of Mrs. Scheussler that she had no claim of any sort on the stock of hardware, or against her husband. That she had some kind of claim on the property at the time she executed the note sued on was material, as tending to show a valid consideration for the note.

The other assignments of error are without substantial merit; but we think the plaintiff, in view of the great conflict in the evidence, was entitled to every fact and circumstance relevant to the issue of the validity of the note sued on and tending to establish the truth of his contention.

The judgment refusing a new trial is reversed.

KELLAM v. STATE. (No. 540.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 19, 1907.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—SALE OF CROPS—CRIMINAL LIABILITY.

The facts in this case do not show a violation of section 672 of the Penal Code of 1895, and the verdict is set aside and a new trial ordered.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Wrightsville; Wm. Faircloth, Judge.

Tilman Kellam was convicted of a violation of Pen. Code 1895, § 672, and brings error. Reversed.

E. L. Stephens, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Kent, Sol., for the State.

HILL, C. J. Plaintiff in error was a tenant, and was convicted of a violation of section 672 of the Penal Code of 1895. The evidence showed that the tenant delivered to the landlord two bales of cotton, which paid his rent, being all the cotton made by him during the year; that he also owed the landlord $59 for three tons of guano, advanced to him during the year in which the crop was made to aid in making it. The tenant was also indebted to the landlord $114 paid for him by the landlord before he moved to his place. The tenant, in addition to the two bales of cotton delivered in payment of rent, tendered to the landlord all the "stuff" that he had made during the year on the place, and the landlord refused to accept it, because "it was nothing but a little trash of corn and fodder, and was worthless." The tenant also turned over to the landlord his mule, buggy, and harness, and the landlord allowed him $110 for the property on what he owed him. The tenant sold the seed out of one of the bales of cotton for $5.16. He stated that he was compelled to do this to get something to eat, as the landlord did not furnish him any rations. For the sale of these seed, and using the money therefrom, the landlord prosecuted the tenant for a violation of section 672, Pen. Code 1895.

We think the facts in this case do not show that essential element of this offense, a fraudulent intent. The tenant seems to have acted in the utmost good faith. He paid his rent in full, and offered to turn over to the landlord his entire crop, which was refused, and did turn over to the landlord his mule, buggy, and harness. The tenant owed $59 for advances made to make the crop. His mule, buggy, and harness, according to the landlord, was worth $110. This was more than sufficient to pay the advances, and we think should have been first applied in payment of the debt for the advances. But it does not appear that the value of the property delivered to the landlord by the tenant and the value of the crop which he tendered to the landlord would not have been sufficient to have fully paid the debt due for advances and the old debt contracted before the relation of landlord and tenant existed. The facts in this case show that the tenant was acting honestly, and had done everything possible to pay his landlord, and had in fact paid him in full for all advances made to aid in making the crop. It would be unjust to let this verdict stand, and the judgment refusing a new trial is reversed.

Judgment reversed.

A. G. RHODES & SON FURNITURE CO.
v. FREEMAN. (No. 411.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 19, 1907.)

1. ACTION—WAIVER OF TORT—SUIT ON CONTRACT.

Where personal property of A. is delivered into the possession of B. under a promise to be returned on a certain named contingency, and B. refused to return the property to A. on the happening of said contingency, A. has an election of remedies. He can sue in trover, or he can waive the tort and bring an action ex contractu on account for the value of the property.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Action, §§ 198, 199.]

2. SALE—RESCISSION—RECOVERY OF PRICE PAID.

There was no error in overruling the certiorari.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by Diana Freeman against the A. G. Rhodes & Son Furniture Company. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed on certiorari, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, C. A. Picquet, and Walter Pearce, for plaintiff in error. Austin Branch, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Defendant in error brought suit in a justice court against plaintiff in error on open account for the sum of $35 and obtained a judgment. On certiorari this judgment was affirmed. The uncontroverted facts make the following case: The Rhodes & Son Furniture Company sold to Diana Freeman a set of furniture for $165. As part of the purchase price she was to be allowed $35 for an old set of furniture which she delivered to the vendor. The purchase was made by Diana Freeman on condition that it should be approved by her husband. He did not approve, and Diana demanded the return of her old furniture by the Rhodes Company according to the understanding; but the company refused to return it, and subsequently sued out an attachment for the $130, balance of the purchase money of the new furniture, and seized the same, and Diana Freeman brought suit on account for her old set of furniture. It is contended by plaintiff in error that the judgment overruling the certiorari was error for two reasons: (1) Because the evidence established a conversion of the furniture by the Rhodes Company, and the remedy was either in trover for the conversion, or for damages on account of the breach of duty by the company in failing to comply with its agreement, and that, such suits sounding in tort, the justice court was without jurisdiction. (2) Because the plaintiff in error, as defendant in the justice court, pleaded that in the particular matter out of which the claim of $35 arose it had sworn out a purchase-money attachment, and that said cause was still pending, the evidence supported this plea, and that, pending the controversy in the attachment case, plaintiff could not maintain her suit for the old set of furniture; it being a part of the purchase money.

1. The rule is well settled that the plaintiff may waive the tort and sue for money had and received to his use, where the property has been turned into money. James v. Smith & Bros., 62 Ga. 347; Buchanan v. McClain, 110 Ga. 480, 35 S. E. 665; Clark on Contracts, p. 776. It is only where personal property has been wrongfully taken and converted in some other manner than by a sale, and where no money has been received for it, that the remedy against the wrongdoer is restricted to an action ex delicto. But where personal property has been delivered to one under a contract, express or implied, to be returned on certain conditions, and such personal property is not returned as agreed, suit can be brought either in tort, or the tort can be waived and suit brought in assumpsit for the value of the property. Spencer v. Hewett, 20 Ga. 426; Buchanan v. McClain, supra; Pomeroy, Code Remedies, § 569. The undisputed evidence in this case is that the contract of purchase was to be rescinded, and the old set of furniture returned to the defendant in error, if the trade was not approved by her husband, and that the value of the said old set of furniture was $35. The contingency which was to prevent a complete consummation of the sale did happen, but the furniture company refused to rescind, and kept the old furniture, and sued for the purchase price of the new. It seems clear that the plaintiff in the court below had a selection of remedies—suit in trover, or in assumpsit for the value of the property.

2. The pendency of the attachment suit for the purchase money presented no legal reason why the plaintiff could not sue for the value of the furniture. The evidence does not show that she was making any resistance to the attachment suit. On the contrary, it seems that she treated the contract of sale as rescinded, and, failing to get her property returned to her, was suing for its agreed value. Under the facts, and without reference to any mere technical question of procedure, we think the justice of the case is with the defendant in error. The furniture company has retaken its property, and should either return or be made to pay for that of the defendant in error.

Judgment affirmed.

NELSON et al. v. SPENCE et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 10, 1907.)

1. BANKRUPTCY—EFFECT ON FORECLOSURE.

Where the main purpose of the suit is to foreclose a mortgage, and there is also an incidental prayer for relief appropriate to insolvency proceedings, a receiver's possession thereunder, as to the property included in the mortgage, will not be affected by a subsequent adjudication in bankruptcy. Merry v. Jones, 119 Ga. 643, 46 S. E. 861.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 6, Bankruptcy, §§ 7-9.]

2. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS—OMISSION BY MISTAKE.

Even if the instrument sought to be foreclosed in equity is, on its face, not a mortgage, but a bill of sale to secure a debt, it is within the power of a court of equity, upon proper allegations of omission from the instrument, made through the mutual mistake of both parties thereto, and upon sufficient evidence submitted on the trial to sustain the allegations of such an omission through mutual mistake, to reform the instrument so as to make the omitted stipulation a part of the instrument in question.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Reformation of Instruments, § 74.]

3. SAME.

The amendment offered by the defendant in error to his original petition for the foreclosure of the alleged mortgage, while inartificial in form and somewhat indefinite in its allegations, and upon this ground subject to special demurrer, was, in the absence of such demurrer, sufficient to authorize the admission of evidence tending to show that both parties to the instrument intended that it should contain words making it a mortgage covering the stock of goods as "a stock in bulk changing in specifics, and including the soda-fountain in the store."

(a) The instrument reformed takes effect from the time when it was originally executed, except as to bona fide purchasers without notice and those standing in like relations.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Reformation of Instruments, § 112.]

4. SAME.

After the amendment seeking to have the instrument reformed, it was competent to show by parol evidence what the intention of the parties thereto was, as upon the ascertainment of their mutual intention depends the determination of the rights of the plaintiff in the equitable petition to the reformation of the paper as prayed. Such parol testimony was not admissible to vary or explain the terms of the instrument as it was originally executed, but was admissible for the consideration of the jury in passing upon the question as to whether certain other terms should be added to it, because they were originally intended as a part of the paper, but had been omitted from it by mutual mistake of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Reformation of Instruments, § 156.]

5. CORPORATIONS—MORTGAGE—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where the name of a corporation as mortgagor, together with its common seal, is affixed to a mortgage by one signing his name as treasurer of such corporation, the presumption is that such officer had authority to execute the instrument in behalf of the corporation. Carr v. Georgia Loan & Trust Co., 108 Ga. 757, 33 E. 190.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, § 1723.]

6. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

The presumption in favor of the authority of the officers executing the paper referred to was rebuttable; but, there being no evidence impeaching the presumptive authority in this case, the admission of the other evidence tending to establish the authority, if error, was harmless.

7. CONTRACTS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

It was error for the court to submit to the jury the decision of the question "as to whether this instrument sued on is a deed or bill of sale, or whether or not it is a mortgage." The construction of the paper, inasmuch as it was unambiguous, was a question for the court. Besides, while the paper itself is free from ambiguity, this part of the charge is not, as it might be understood by the jury as referring to the paper as it stood before or after being reformed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 11, Contracts, § 167.]

8. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

The court having properly instructed the jury that the power of a court of equity to grant relief in cases of the kind under consideration is exercised with caution, and that to justify its exercise the evidence must be clear, unequivocal, and decisive as to the mistake, the fact that the court in a subsequent part of the charge instructed the jury that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of evidence that such a mistake had been made before the jury would be authorized to overcome the prima facie presumption which arises upon this instrument upon the face of it was not error requiring the grant of a new trial.

9. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—KNOWLEDGE OF GRANTEE.

The court charged the jury as follows: "I charge that even if the intent to delay and defraud creditors existed on the part of the corporation, Perry's Pharmacy, but that at the time J. M. Spence was not aware, didn't know, of that intent, and that the circumstances were not such as to put a reasonable man upon notice that it was time for him to investigate that it was a suspicious transaction, then I charge you on that issue you should find in favor of the plaintiff, J. M. Spence." The plaintiff in the foreclosure proceedings having been shown to be president of the corporation, a part of whose duties it was to familiarize himself with the books and accounts of the corporation, as to transactions between the corporation and such officer, whatever intent to delay or to defraud creditors might have existed on the part of the corporation would be presumed in law to be known by the president thereof, and the ruling requiring "circumstances sufficient to put a reasonable man on notice," especially as the jury were not cautioned to take into consideration the superior opportunities of an officer for obtaining information as to the intent with which the act or deed was done, was harmful error.

10. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

It appearing that the plaintiff in the foreclosure proceedings was president of the corporation, and there being no controversy under the pleadings and evidence as to this fact, the court should not have so charged the jury as to leave upon their minds the impression that it was an open question for their decision whether or not he was actually an officer of the corporation.

11. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—INTENT OF PARTIES—INSTRUCTION.

The intention and purpose of the parties to the instrument under consideration in the making of the same being a material question for determination, it was error for the court to refuse an appropriate request to charge embracing the following: "You may take into consideration the kinship, friendship, or intimacy of the parties concerned, see what their interests were. You may look to the whole dealings with the corporate affairs of Perry's Pharmacy, and from all the circumstances that have been brought out in evidence you are to judge of this question."

12. APPEAL—REVIEW.

Other questions made in the record are not dealt with, as it is not probable that they will arise on the next trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Mitchell County; I. J. Hofmayer, Judge pro hac.

Action by J. M. Spence against Perry's Pharmacy. R. B. Middleton, receiver, filed an intervention. L. W. Nelson, trustee in bankruptcy, and the pharmacy, joined in the intervention. Verdict for plaintiff, and, from an order denying a new trial, the interveners bring error. Reversed.

J. M. Spence filed an equitable petition against Perry's Pharmacy, alleging that he is the holder of a mortgage on the entire stock of merchandise carried by said defendant; that said mortgage, for the sum of $4,200 principal, is due and unpaid; that said stock is not of sufficient value to cover the amount of the mortgage, and that it could be sold for a larger sum at private sale than at public sale. Wherefore he prayed that the mortgage be foreclosed, and that "a receiver be appointed to take charge of all of the assets of said defendant, including all of the property described in said mortgage, all notes and accounts, choses in action, * * * and that the same be sold to satisfy said mortgage." A copy of the instrument sued on is attached to the petition, the material portions of which are as follows: "Six months after date we promise to pay to the order of J. M. Spence $4,200, for value received." It further provides for interest from maturity at the rate of 8 per cent., and 10 per cent. attorney's fees, and contains a waiver of "all homestead and exemption rights which I or my family may be entitled to under the constitution or laws, state or federal. * * * And, in order to secure the payment of the said indebtedness, we hereby bargain, sell and convey to the payees of this note, their heirs and assigns, the following property: * * * All of the stock of merchandise carried by Perry's Pharmacy in their store at Camilla, Ga., consisting of [itemizing said stock], and all other articles carried in their stock not herein mentioned." And, in case said debt was not paid at maturity, the payee was authorized to seize and take possession of said property and sell the same, after advertising the sale for 10 days, at public outcry in front of the courthouse door, and apply the proceeds to the payment of said indebtedness. The instrument was signed as follows: "Perry's Pharmacy [L. S.] T. B. Perry, Sec. & Treas. [L. S.] T. B. Twitty, V. Pres. [L. S.]" After considering the petition, the judge at chambers passed an order appointing T. B. Perry permanent receiver, "to take charge of all the mortgaged property described in said petition, and to take charge of the store of defendant, and to carry on the business of the same in the ordinary way, keeping a full account of his doings until further order of the court." At the following term R. B. Middleton, receiver of the Rodrigues Cigar Company, a creditor of Perry's Pharmacy, filed an intervention, attacking for fraud a certain sale of goods by Perry's Pharmacy to the Robbins-Thompson Drug Company, and alleging that the instrument in favor of J. M. Spence was made for the purpose of delaying, hindering, and defrauding the other creditors of said defendant, "that said so-called mortgage is void and fraudulent, for the reason that it was made to prefer an officer of said corporation after said corporation was insolvent," and that said instrument was a violation of the provisions of the act of the General Assembly relating to the sale of goods in bulk. Acts 1903, p. 92. The intervenor prayed that the mortgage in favor of J. M. Spence be declared to be null and void, and that this intervenor's claim, and all other just claims of such creditors as may hereafter intervene, be proved and allowed against the assets of Perry's Pharmacy, and that T. B. Perry be removed as receiver. Subsequently other creditors intervened, alleging the insolvency of Perry's Pharmacy, and praying that a receiver be appointed under the provisions of the insolvent trader's act. At the hearing the motion to remove T. B. Perry from his position as receiver was denied, and he was ordered to take charge of that part of the goods of the Robbins-Thompson Drug Company which had been purchased from Perry's Pharmacy. After the filing of the original petition by J. M. Spence, Perry's Pharmacy was adjudicated a bankrupt in the District Court of the United States, and L. W. Nelson was appointed and qualified as trustee in bankruptcy. He joined in the intervention of Middleton et al., and prayed that T. B. Perry, receiver, be directed to turn over to him, the trustee in bankruptcy, all the assets of the Perry's Pharmacy. The interveners also filed a demurrer to the foreclosure proceeding instituted by Spence, on the ground that "said alleged mortgage [in favor of Spence] is no mortgage, but shows upon its face that it is a deed to secure a debt," and because it conveys title only to those goods in the stock of Perry's Pharmacy at the time of the execution of the instrument, and does not operate upon after-acquired goods. Nelson, trustee, filed a plea in abatement to the original foreclosure proceeding, based on the latter ground of the demurrer. The intervention was amended by alleging, in substance, that the instrument sought to be foreclosed by Spence was void, because not properly executed by Perry's Pharmacy, that said instrument was tainted with usury, and that Perry's Pharmacy is not indebted to Spence in the sum named in the said instrument. Spence amended his petition by alleging that "It was the intention of the parties to said mortgage from Perry's Pharmacy to J. M. Spence that it should cover the stock of goods in said mortgage described, including the soda fount, as a stock of goods in bulk changing in specifics, and by mutual mistake these words were omitted from the instrument," and prayed that the mortgage be so reformed as to conform to the intention of the parties. The interveners objected to the allowance of this amendment, on the ground that it set up a new cause of action, and because it sought to vary the terms of an unambiguous written instrument. The objection was overruled, and they excepted pendente lite. At the hearing of the application of Nelson, trustee, the court passed an order directing "that the notes, accounts, choses in action, books and papers of the Perry's Pharmacy, also the property received by the receiver from the Robbins-Thompson Drug Company, be delivered by T. B. Perry, receiver, to L. W. Nelson, trustee in bankruptcy, and that the application of the trustee in bankruptcy to have the assets and money taken possession of or arising under the original mortgage foreclosure in favor of J. M. Spence be refused." The interveners excepted pendente lite to this order. Upon the trial the jury returned a verdict finding that "the paper sued on by the plaintiff [Spence] was intended by parties thereto as a mortgage," and that "it was the intention of the parties to include the soda fount," and also in favor of the plaintiff upon the mortgage. The interveners made a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and they excepted, assigning error upon this judgment and upon their exceptions pendente lite.

D. F. Crosland, R. J. Bacon, Jr., and B. B. Lane, for plaintiff in error. E. E. Cox, A. G. Powell, M. E. O'Neal, S. A. Roddiberry, and Theo. Titus, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

SEIFERT v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 4, 1907.)

TELEGRAPHS—DELAY IN DELIVERY—PETITION. A petition in a suit against a telegraph company alleged that a telegram to a physician had been delivered to the defendant for transmission, which showed upon its face that he was called for the purpose of relieving the plaintiff from suffering that she was then enduring; that the telegraph company negligently failed to transmit and deliver the telegram within a reasonable time; that on account of such failure the suffering of plaintiff continued for many hours, which could and would have been relieved if the telegram had been promptly delivered and the physician had responded thereto, which, it is alleged, he would have done; and that after the lapse of many hours the physician came and promptly relieved the suffering of the plaintiff. The only damages alleged were the mental and physical suffering which the plaintiff endured during the time that the physician would have come, if the telegram had been promptly delivered, and the time that he actually arrived. Held, that the petition set forth no cause of action for the damages alleged, and was properly dismissed on demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

Action by Mrs. E. C. Seifert against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Mrs. Seifert sued the telegraph company, alleging: That her husband delivered to the defendant a message in the following words: "To Dr. R. C. Mosely, Bolingbroke, Ga.: Come at once. Mrs. Seifert worse. E. C. Seifert." The defendant received the message and undertook to transmit it with reasonable dispatch. The charges demanded were paid. The message was delivered to the defendant at 12:50 p. m. on July 18th, and was not delivered to the addressee until 8:35 a. m. on the 19th. The delay was due to the gross negligence of the defendant. The message could have been transmitted in 15 minutes, and delivered in 5 minutes after its arrival. The office of the addressee was within 50 yards of the office of the defendant in the village of Bolingbroke, and his residence was also in that village. When the message was delivered to the telegraph company, the agent was informed that the plaintiff was ill and suffering intensely, and that the message was to her physician, and that it was of the utmost importance that it should be transmitted without delay; and the agent agreed to do so. On July 18th the plaintiff became suddenly worse, and began to suffer the most intense pain from an illness which had begun on July 5th. Dr. Mosely was her attending physician. Those with her were unable to offer the slightest relief. The physician would have come at once, had he received the telegram. The home of the plaintiff was only five miles from Bolingbroke, and Dr. Mosely could have reached her in 30 minutes after he received the message, and he could have relieved her within 10 minutes after his arrival, and when he did arrive, on the 19th, he immediately relieved her of her most acute suffering. No other physician was accessible. The husband of the plaintiff was compelled to hire a buggy and drive through the country to Bolingbroke and secure the physician. The failure of the defendant to promptly transmit the telegram caused the plaintiff 19 hours of the most intense suffering, which affected her general health, retarded her recovery, and caused her to fall into an illness from which she suffered and still suffers. The defendant was informed of her suffering, and of its character, and of the necessity for relief, and the importance of prompt transmission and delivery of the telegram; and the telegram was sent by her husband for her and in her behalf, for the reason that she was unable to attend to the matter. The defendant filed demurrers, both general and special, which were sustained, and the plaintiff excepted.

N. E. & W. A. Harris, for plaintiff in error. Jos. H. Hall and Warren Roberts, for defendant in error.

COBB, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). Where an agent sends a telegram for an undisclosed principal, the principal may bring an action in his own name for damages resulting from error in transmission which brought about a delay in delivering the telegram. Propeller Towboat Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co., 124 Ga. 478, 52 S. E. 766; Harkness v. Western Union Tel. Co., 73 Iowa, 190, 34 N. W. 811, 5 Am. St. Rep. 672. An undisclosed principal may bring a suit in his own name for the breach of the contract made by his agent with a telegraph company, in which it agreed to transmit and deliver a telegram with reasonable dispatch, or for a breach of any duty arising out of the contract, and recover such damages as are appropriate to the form of action in which the suit is brought. It is said that the suit by the plaintiff in this case is well brought, for the reason that her husband merely acted as her agent in sending the telegram; that she was the undisclosed principal in the contract made between him and the telegraph company, and therefore any right of action which arose out of the breach of the contract, whether it sounded in contract or in tort, could be asserted by her in her name. The averments of the petition are possibly sufficient, as against a general demurrer, to show that there was an agency, and that the transaction did not arise merely from the fact that the relation of husband and wife existed between the parties. For the purposes of the present case we will treat the action as well brought in the name of the plaintiff.

The purpose of the pleader was evidently to bring an action sounding in tort, and the petition will be so construed. The only damages alleged are those resulting from the physical and mental suffering endured by the plaintiff during the hours that elapsed between the time that the doctor would have arrived if the telegram had been promptly delivered and the time at which he did arrive, being about 19 hours. The averments of the petition made a clear case of gross negligence against the defendant. According to the averments there was absolutely no reason why there should have been such
